PREFACE.

THE present Edition of the Greek Testament is the result of a design formed many years ago, and suggested by the following considerations:—

The history of the Criticism and Interpretation of the Sacred Text of the Evangelical Scriptures during the present century is distinguished by certain remarkable characteristics.

By the blessing of Divine Providence singular benefits have been bestowed upon the present generation, for the elucidation of the inspired Volume. The Manuscripts of the New Testament have been collated with greater labour and accuracy than formerly; the Various Readings thence derived have been recorded with more minute exactness and precision; and new aids and instruments have thus been supplied to the biblical student, which were not accessible in former times. Transcripts, some of them in facsimile, of the most ancient Manuscripts have been published; early Versions have been recovered and printed. The researches of Travellers, Historians, and Chronologers, have shed new light on the sacred page. Indeed it must be confessed, with thankfulness to the Divine Author of Scripture, that the present age enjoys, in certain respects, greater privileges for the due understanding of Holy Writ, than were ever conferred by Almighty God on any preceding generation since the Revival of Letters.

On the other hand, some features of a different kind present themselves to our notice.

In one remarkable respect, the history of the Criticism and Interpretation of the New Testament in our own times bears a striking resemblance to that of the Old Testament among the Jews.

Nothing could be more praiseworthy than the diligence of the Masoretic Critics in collating the Manuscripts and revising the Text of the Old Testament. With unwearied patience and scrupulous fidelity they registered every letter, and the frequency of its occurrence, in the pages of the ancient Scriptures.

Yet, as is well known, with all their indefatigable labours for the guardianship of the letter of the Sacred Volume, they were not able to preserve its spirit. Side by side with the fruits of the minute diligence of the Masora, grew up, like weeds in a fair garden, the extravagances of the Cabbala.

We may recognize a parallel here, in the history of the New Testament, in Christian times and in our own day. Christendom has her Masora, she has also her Cabbala.

The fact is too clear to admit a doubt. It is recognized and deplored by some of the most pious minds¹ in that Country to which we are deeply indebted for critical contributions in the verification of the Text of the New Testament. Contemporaneously with great benefits derived from collation of Manuscripts, discovery or re-examination of ancient Versions, rich stores of illustration from History, Chronology, and Topography, we have to lament, with feelings of disappointment and forebodings of alarm, that the cause of Biblical Criticism, as a high and holy Science, qualifying men for the discharge of the duties of life, and for the enjoyment of the bliss of eternity, appears to be threatened with formidable dangers even from those quarters whence it has received some valuable philological aids for its elucidation.

In evidence of this fact we may refer, by way of specimen, to the critical comments, which have been recently published², on one of the most solemn, beautiful, and affecting histories,—such as, it might have been supposed, would have disarmed all cavil in Christian readers, and have awed doubt into adoration,—the evangelical narrative by St. John of that stupendous miracle of Christ, the prelude of the transactions of the Great Day,—the raising of Lazarus from the dead.

Such criticisms show, that there is scarcely any error, however puerile or preposterous, which may not find some advocates among persons enjoying high literary and scientific advantages for the interpretation of the New Testament, and be propounded by them with an air of superior intelligence, as a true exposition, to be received by the world in the place of ancient interpretations of Holy Writ.

We have also to deplore, that the field of sacred Hermeneutics has been made an arena of fierce fightings and uncharitable disputations. It seems to be too

His own Book in a reverent and loving spirit. "Mysteries are revealed unto the meek¹." "The secret of the Lord is among them that fear Him, and He will show them His covenant²." "Them that are meek shall He guide in judgment; and such as are gentle, them shall He learn His way³." But "He resisteth the proud⁴." He hides His mysteries from "the wise and prudent⁵," that is, from those who esteem themselves such, and "lean on their own understandings⁶." "He turneth wise men backward, and maketh diviners mad⁷." "Quærenti derisori Scientia se abscondit⁸." If men will not receive Him as little children, then a just retribution awaits them. If they will not be children in simplicity, they will be less than children in ignorance; they will fall into childish errors, and become babes in knowledge; "professing themselves wise, they will become fools⁹," and their "folly will be manifest unto all men¹⁰," through their arrogance in parading it before the world, and in vaunting of it as if it were wisdom¹¹.

If there is such a thing as the Church Universal, to which Christ has promised His presence and His Spirit; if there are such words as the following in the New Testament, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world¹²," "The Comforter shall teach you all things, and guide you into all the truth¹³," "The Church of the Living God, the pillar and ground of the truth¹⁴;" if Christ has given us the Holy Scriptures by the Inspiration of the Holy Ghost; and if He has delivered Scripture to the keeping of the Church Universal, and appointed her to be its Guardian and Interpreter; if He has done these things, it is not only folly and presumption, it is a sin against Him and against the Holy Ghost, to say that any of the Books, or any portion of the Books, which have been received, as divinely-inspired Scripture, by the consentient voice of the Church Universal, is not inspired by God, but is a human composition, blemished by human infirmities. And it is vain to expect, that any real progress can be made by the agency of those, who commence their work with an outrage against Christ and the Holy Spirit, by denying the inspiration and inerrancy of Writings delivered by Them.

So, again, it is an illusory hope, that advances can be made in the work of sacred interpretation, by the instrumentality of any who reject the Expositions of Scripture received by the consent of ancient Christendom, and who propound new interpretations invented by themselves, at variance with the general teaching of Scripture as received by the Catholic Church¹⁵. Rather, with our own Reformers¹, if we hope to maintain the truth, and to guard “the faith once for all delivered to the saints²,” and to advance the Redeemer’s Kingdom upon earth, let us have ever before our eyes, in interpreting Scripture, the Formularies of Faith¹ delivered by the Church Universal, as representing the true sense of Scripture; and let us not readily imagine, that any text of Scripture can be properly bent by us to bear a sense at variance with those standards of faith.

If it is indeed true, that there is such a Divine Institution as an Apostolical Ministry, appointed by Christ for the preaching of the Word and administration of the Sacraments; if it is true, that the illuminating and sanctifying graces of the Holy Ghost are vouchsafed to those, who humbly seek for them, by His appointed means, at the hands of that ministry; then it is certain, that no appliances of Literature and Science, and no labour in collating Manuscripts and examining Versions, no skill in Languages, no familiarity with the results of researches Historical, Chronological, Geographical, Antiquarian, nor any amount of toil about the letter of Scripture, will avail us for the attainment of a knowledge of the spirit of Scripture, if we set at nought the means of grace which God offers us for our illumination.

All those instruments of Literature and Science are, indeed, necessary for the right interpretation of the original Scriptures; and it would be fanatical to imagine, that we can dispense with any of them. But it is no less fanatical to rely on them as sufficient. God must open our eyes, if we are to see “the wondrous things of His law³,” in His “light we shall see light⁴.”

The Church of England owes too much to the learning of Germany, to regard her with any other feelings than those of affectionate esteem; and on the still higher grounds of religious truth and charity, she may well long for union with her. In the sixteenth century, Germany and England fought the battle of the Reformation side by side. They shed their blood as allies and martyrs in that holy cause. We have received much from her; we owe her a debt of gratitude; we owe her our love and our prayers. Above all, we owe her the truth. And we should not be paying the debt of love we owe her, if, instead of speaking the truth, we beguiled her with fair speeches, and deceived her by cozening assurances, as if the fruits, which some of her children are now gathering in the field of sacred Criticism, were sound and healthful to the soul, and not rather bitter as wormwood; beautiful, it may be, externally to the eye of unregenerate Reason, but loathsome as poison to the healthful palate of Faith; specious, it may be, in colour to a superficial glance, but when grasped by the hand, full of dust and smoke and ashes, like apples plucked on the sterile shore of the Dead Sea.

own country in this respect:—“Dass man, so zu sagen, die exegetische Tradition unterbrochen hat, sind die bedeutendsten Schätze des gediegensten theologischen Wissens unbenützt liegen geblieben.” 1855.

Let us not “put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter¹,” and dignify with the name of progress that which ought to be wept over as decline.

By no merit of our own, but by the gracious goodness of God, we possess in England Colleges and Cathedrals, which have been schools of the prophets, nurseries of sacred learning. We possess a National Church, which holds in her hands the true Canon of Scripture as received by the Church Universal; and which does not allow Holy Scripture to be rudely torn by discordant Teachers and irreverent Critics, but delivers to us the Creeds of Christendom and her own Formularies of Faith, as an authoritative guide to check our rash speculations, and to control our froward wills in obtruding our own caprices as dogmas of Holy Writ². We enjoy the blessings of visible Communion in the same Divine Doctrine and Discipline, with the Apostolic Churches of America, and of our own Colonial Churches throughout the World.

Let us guard these privileges; let us not degrade the Biblical Criticism of England to the miserable condition of doubt and diversity, of distraction and despair, in which that holy Science now lies prostrate, in some other parts of Christendom. Rather let us endeavour, by God’s grace, meekly and humbly, wisely and charitably, to elevate modern Exegesis to the standard of primitive Christianity; and to help others in recovering its ancient dignity, and in consecrating their learning and sanctifying their labour, and rendering them more conducive to the maintenance of the truth, and to the extension of Christ’s kingdom, and to their own glory and felicity in time and eternity. Then we may have a reasonable hope, that, with their assistance, the evils, which now threaten Christendom, may be averted; the torrent of unbelief and superstition, which seems ready to overwhelm us, may be stemmed and turned back; and we may see new fields reclaimed, and gladdened with rich harvests.

A few words are requisite concerning the Text of this Edition.

It has been already observed, that the present age possesses special advantages in the collations recently made of Manuscripts of the New Testament.

But it must not be forgotten, that it is one thing to possess Manuscripts and collations of them, and another thing to use them aright. Indeed it may sometimes happen, that the very abundance of Manuscripts, and consequently of Various Readings, may become an occasion of error; and so, by a misuse of our advantages in this respect, the Text of the New Testament may be depraved and corrupted, rather than emended and improved.

There is reason to fear that this may be sometimes now the case. Certain canons of criticism, as they are called, have been propounded by Griesbach and others, as directions for the use of Manuscripts of the New Testament. These canons contain true principles; but it may well be doubted, whether some evils may not arise, and may not already have arisen, from an overstrained application of them.

For example; "Proclivi lectioni præstat ardua." This is an excellent rule, if rightly used; for no one can doubt that an easy reading was more likely to be substituted by a transcriber for a difficult one, than a difficult reading for one that is easy. But this rule requires much caution in its application.

There are many concurrent circumstances to be considered, which may modify and neutralize it, and render it wholly inapplicable. For instance; it must also be inquired, whether the difficult reading is supported by the testimony of ancient Versions and Fathers; or whether it stands on the authority of only one or two Manuscripts of a particular family.

To force readings into the Text merely because they are difficult, is to adulterate the divine ore with human alloy; it is to obtrude upon the reader of Scripture the solecisms of faltering copyists, in the place of the Word of God.

Again; it is doubtless true, that special deference is due, on the ground of superior Antiquity, to the Uncial Manuscripts of the New Testament. No one can question, in the abstract, the soundness of the principle propounded by Bentley, revived by Bengel, and recently applied by Lachmann. But the very application of the principle, without adequate restraints and correctives, has proved how dangerous a true principle of criticism may become, when applied beyond the proper limits of its applicability.

The Uncial Manuscripts are of greater antiquity, as far as ink and parchment are concerned, than the Cursive Manuscripts of the New Testament. The consent of all the Uncial Manuscripts, or of a majority of them, is of very high authority. But we do not know, that some of the Cursive Manuscripts may not be transcripts of Uncial Manuscripts still more ancient than any we now possess; and, therefore, to adopt the readings which are found in two or three Uncial Manuscripts, to the exclusion of the testimony of the Cursive Manuscripts, may be to corrupt the Text, while we profess to correct it.

Besides, the Uncial Manuscripts are comparatively few,—and only represent the witness of a few places. But the Cursive Manuscripts are very numerous, and come to us from all parts of the world; and, therefore, to confine ourselves to the testimony of the Uncial Manuscripts, may be to prefer the witness of a few Churches to that of Christendom.

Let, then, the Uncial Manuscripts have all honour due; and it can hardly be doubted, that wherever that honour is rightly paid, it will be found to be more or less authorized by a concurrent testimony of Cursive Manuscripts.

It is likewise certain, as was long since observed by S. Jerome¹, that à priori the shorter readings are preferable, and that the text of one Gospel has often been interpolated from another. But how much caution and circumspection is necessary in the application of these principles!

It is also true, that the Manuscripts of the Greek Testament may be classified in Families. And, eventually, when they have been carefully examined, such an arrangement, according to Recensions, may be made. But it is premature, before such an examination has been faithfully and scrupulously completed, to prefer the readings of those particular Manuscripts which belong, as it is supposed, to one favoured class, and to reject others, because they are not of the same pedigree, or because they do not seem to us to bear an affinity to those of that class on which we ourselves, in the exercise of our critical prerogative, may have been pleased to confer certain privileges of rank and nobility. Yet, on this principle, some of the Editions seem to have been constructed which profess to give an improved Text of the Greek Testament.

Some other illustrations of a similar kind might be added. Suffice it to say, on the whole, that though the canons of criticism which have been applied to the revision of the Text of the New Testament, are of unquestionable value, yet great circumspection is necessary, lest, by a vicious application of them, we do more to mar the Text, than has yet been done by their means to amend it.

The Text of the present edition is not a reprint of that hitherto received in any impression of the New Testament. The Editor has endeavoured to avail himself of the collations of manuscripts which have been supplied by others, and to offer to the reader the result at which he has arrived after an examination of those collations. He has not thought it requisite or desirable to lay before the eye a full apparatus of various readings. It would have swollen the volume to too great a bulk, and have occupied the place reserved for exposition. Besides, that important work has been done, or is now in course of being done, by others. And to their labours he would refer those, who are desirous of ascertaining the data, upon which the Text of the present Edition has been formed.

At the same time, he feels it his duty to state, that he has not deviated so far from the text commonly received, as has been done in some recent editions. Indeed he cannot disguise his belief, that a superintending Providence has ever been watching over the Text of the New Testament, and guiding the Church of Christ, as the Guardian and Keeper of Holy Writ, in the discharge of her duty. A seventh Edition of the New Testament has recently been published under the Editorship of a learned person, to whom the present age is deeply indebted for his labours in collating manuscripts, and publishing Transcripts of early copies of the New Testament, Constantine Tischendorf. It will be found, on examination of the prospectus of that seventh Edition, that he frankly confesses that he had been induced to follow too implicitly the lead of certain favourite manuscripts in his earlier editions. And in his seventh Edition he abandons his former readings, and generally returns to those of the received Text, in *more than a hundred places in the Gospel of St. Matthew alone*¹.

The Ammonian Sections have been marked in the Text of the Gospels in this edition, and the Eusebian Canons relating to them have been prefixed; the use of which, as forming an Evangelical Harmony, and indicating at a glance the correspondence of the Evangelists where they concur, and their independence where each stands alone, cannot be too strongly commended to the student of Holy Writ.

An explanation perhaps may be necessary of the reasons for which some of the materials in the following Commentary have been adopted.

The best instrument of Education is Holy Scripture in its original language. The Bible alone of all books in the world addresses itself to the whole man. It exercises his memory, strengthens his reason, controls his passions, informs his judgment, regulates his conscience, sanctifies his will, enlivens his fancy, warms his imagination, cherishes his affections, stimulates his practice, animates his faith, quickens his hope, and enlarges his charity.

But these purposes seem to be impaired, if an Interpreter of Scripture confines himself to verbal criticism, and material facts of history, chronology, and antiquities. These are necessary. But something more is requisite. And in an Edition, like the present, designed especially for the use of Students in Schools and Colleges, and Candidates for Holy Orders, the Expositor's first duty appears to be, to supply them with food derived from Scripture itself, for the hallowing of their affections, and for elevating their imaginations, and for nourishing their piety and animating their devotion; and for enabling them to see and recognize with joy, that Holy Scripture best interprets itself, and supplies the best discipline for the mind, as well as satisfies all the aspirations of the soul.

In the illustration of the phraseology of the New Testament, special use has been made of the Version of the Septuagint, which has been happily called by Professor Blunt "the viaduct between the two Testaments²." Here the present Editor has been much indebted to Mr. Grinfield's valuable works, and to the excellent Lexicon of Mintert.

With regard to the Notes which accompany the present Edition, one main purpose in the Editor's work, as already stated, has been, to recover some of the expository teaching of ancient Christendom. If it be asked, why he has laid so much stress on the interpretations of Christian Antiquity, and why the names of ancient Expositors occur so frequently in the following pages, he had rather answer that question in the words of others than in his own;

And first, with regard to the Apostolical Fathers,—for example, Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp,—he may refer to the words of *Archbishop Wake*¹.

“1. They were contemporary with the Apostles, and instructed by them. 2. They were men of an eminent character in the Church, and therefore such as could not be ignorant of what was taught in it. 3. They were careful to preserve the doctrine of Christ in its purity, and to oppose such as went about to corrupt it. 4. They were men not only of a perfect piety, but of great courage and constancy, and therefore such as cannot be suspected to have had any design to prevaricate in this matter. 5. They were endued with a large portion of the Holy Spirit, and, as such, could hardly err in what they delivered as the Gospel of Christ. 6. Their writings were approved by the Church in those days, which could not be mistaken in its approbation of them.”

Dr. Waterland writes as follows on this subject²;—

“1. The ancients who lived nearest to the Apostolical times are of some use to us, considered merely as contemporary writers, for their diction and phraseology. . . 2. A further use of the ancient Fathers is seen in the letting us into the knowledge of antiquated rites and customs, upon the knowledge of which the true interpretation of some Scripture phrases and idioms may depend. 3. They are further useful as giving us an insight into the history of the age in which the sacred books (of the New Testament, I mean) were written. 4. The ancientest Fathers may be exceedingly useful for fixing the sense of Scripture in controverted texts. Those that lived in or near the Apostolical times might retain in memory what the Apostles themselves or their immediate successors said upon such and such points.—Their nearness to the time, their known fidelity, and their admirable endowments, ordinary and extraordinary, add great weight to their testimony or doctrine, and make it a probable rule of interpretation in the prime things. 5. It deserves our notice, that the Fathers of the third and fourth centuries had the advantage of many written accounts of the doctrine of the former ages, which have since been lost; and therefore their testimonies also are of considerable weight, and are a mark of direction to us, not to be slighted in the main things. . . . 6. There is one consideration more, tending still to strengthen the former, and which must by no means be omitted; namely, that the charismata, the extraordinary gifts, were then frequent, visibly rested in and upon the Church, and there only.” He adds³: “A very particular regard is due to the Public Acts of the Ancient Church appearing in Creeds made use of in baptism, and in the censures passed upon heretics. It is not at all likely that any whole Church of those times should vary from Apostolical doctrine in things of moment; but it is, morally speaking, absurd to imagine, that all the Churches should combine in the same error, and conspire together to corrupt the doctrine of Christ.”

To this it may be added, that, while it is freely allowed that Modern Expositors enjoy some advantages which were not possessed by the Ancient, and that the works of the Ancient Writers cannot be read profitably without sobriety of judgment, yet it is also certain that the Ancient Interpreters are never chargeable with some errors which impair the value, and mar the use, of some Modern Expositions. They are never flippant and familiar; they are never self-conceited and vain-glorious; they are never scornful and profane. They handle Scripture with reverence. Their tone is high and holy; produced by careful study of Scripture, with humble prayer for light to the Divine Author of Scripture. They reflect some of that light, and spiritualize the thoughts of the reader, and raise them to a serener atmosphere, and do not depress them into the lower and more obscure regions of clouds, which hang over the minds of those who approach Scripture with presumption and irreverence, and which disable them from seeing its light, and, much more, from displaying it to others.

In reciting the interpretations of Ancient Writers, the Editor desires it to be understood that he does not profess to give always their very words, or a literal version of them. He has often abridged and condensed them; but in no case, he trusts, has he misrepresented their sense. Where their names occur without any mention of the particular treatise from which their words are quoted, it may generally be inferred that they are from a commentary on the passage in question. In other cases the treatise has usually been specified from which the citation is taken.

There is another source from which the present Commentary is partly derived—the Theological Literature of the Church of England. In some respects the Divines of England have enjoyed advantages for the doctrinal exposition of truth, which were not possessed even by the Fathers themselves. As S. Augustine often observes, the cause of Truth is cleared by means of Error. Orthodoxy gains by the oppositions of Heresy; and the Heresies which have arisen in Christendom since the times of the Fathers, have stimulated and constrained the faithful student of Scripture to examine more closely the truths which the Scriptures teach. Thus from time to time disseminations of false doctrine have afforded occasions and means for the clearer elucidation and stronger confirmation of the Truth. They have shown the inexhaustible riches of Scripture, in the never-failing supply of antidotes against ever-varying forms of error.

It was observed long since by Lord Bacon², that one of the best Commentaries

² “That form of writing in divinity, which in my judgment is of all others most rich and precious, is positive divinity, collected upon particular texts of Scripture in brief observations, not dilated into common-places, not chasing after controversies, not reduced into method of art; a thing abounding in sermons, which will vanish, but defective in books, which will remain, and a thing wherein this age excelleth. For I am persuaded, and I may speak it with an absit invidia verbo, and no ways in on Scripture might be extracted from the writings of English Divines. Especially is this true of those who were imbued with a spirit of reverence for the works of Christian Antiquity, and who applied the teaching of the Fathers to the exposition of Holy Writ, and to the refutation of the errors of their own times. Who can excel Hooker and Bishop Andrewes in expounding the words of St. John? Who more successful than Bishop Sanderson in applying to cases of conscience the reasonings of St. Paul; or than Bishop Pearson in bringing together a well marshalled array of Scriptural testimonies in defence of the doctrines of the Christian Faith?

These prefatory remarks may be closed with some observations, suggested by the circumstances of the times, on the Inspiration of the writers of the New Testament.

It may be submitted for consideration, whether it would not be wiser to abstain from disquisitions upon modes and degrees of Inspiration, as a subject beyond the reach of our faculties. If it be said, that this would be too timid a course, let it be observed that it is no other than that which was pursued by our Blessed Lord Himself in His dealings with the Old Testament. He received, and delivered to the Christian Church, all the Books, and every portion of the Books, of the Old Testament, as the Word of God. But though He has solemnly declared, that every part of the Old Testament is inspired, He never vouchsafed to say a word concerning degrees of Inspiration. The same may be said of St. Paul. He was content with affirming that "Every Scripture being inspired by God is also profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness ¹."

derogation of antiquity, but as in a good emulation between the Vine and the Olive, that if the choice and best of those observations upon texts of Scripture, which have been made dispersedly in sermons within this your Majesty's island of Britain by the space of these forty years and more, leaving out the largeness of exhortations and applications thereupon, had been set down in a continuance, it had been the best work in divinity which had been written since the Apostles' time." (Bacon, Adv. of Learning, p. 268.)

The following remarks from the same source may find a proper place here. Lord Bacon thus speaks (Adv. of Learning, p. 267, ed. 1828):—"The two latter points, known to God and unknown to man, touching the secrets of the heart and the successions of time, do make a just and sound difference between the manner of the exposition of the Scriptures and all other books. For it is an excellent observation, which hath been made upon the answers of our Saviour Christ to many of the questions which were propounded to Him, how that they are impertinent to the state of the question demanded; the reason whereof is, because, not being like man, which knows man's thoughts by his words, but knowing man's thoughts immediately, He never answered their words, but their thoughts. Much in the like manner it is with the Scriptures, which, being written to the thoughts of men and to the succession of all ages, with a foresight of all heresies, contradictions, differing estates of the Church, yea, and particularly of the elect, are not to be interpreted only according to the latitude of the proper sense of the place, and respectively towards that present occasion whereupon the words were uttered, or in precise congruity or contexture with the words before or after, or in contemplation of the principal scope of the place; but have in themselves, not only totally or collectively, but distributively in clauses and words, infinite springs and streams of doctrine to water the Church in every part; and therefore, as the literal sense is, as it were, the main stream or river, so the moral sense chiefly, and sometimes the allegorical or typical, are they whereof the Church hath most use; not that I wish men to be bold in allegories, or indulgent or light in allusions; but that I do much condemn that interpretation of the Scripture which is only after the manner as men use to interpret a profane book."

In the act of inspiration, the Holy Spirit did not impair the human faculties, much less did He destroy the personal identity, of those whom He inspired. Inspiration was a mental and spiritual Transfiguration. On the Mount of Transfiguration, the disciples saw "*two men talking with Jesus, which were Moses and Elias*¹." Moses was not changed into Elias, nor Elias into Moses; nor were they transmuted into some third person different from either. But they "appeared in glory." They were transfigured. So in Inspiration. Peter is not changed into Paul, nor Matthew into John. They retain their personal identity, distinguishable by men. They appear in glory. They are transfigured.

This work of Transfiguration is a Mystery. It is like other mysteries, where that which is human touches, and is blended with, the divine. We feel a similar process going on in our own being. We all know that we are free agents, and we are all conscious that we need and receive divine Grace. But who can say where our Free-will ends, and where divine Grace begins? The fact we know, the modes and degrees we cannot analyze; we confess our ignorance, we adore the mystery; we do not discuss it, but we act hourly upon the consciousness of the fact, as a law of our moral being.

May we not even say, that the Mystery of Inspiration bears some likeness to the highest of all mysteries, in which the human is joined with the divine, the Mystery of the Incarnation itself? There, in that Mystery, is the union of God and Man in One Person, without any confusion of substance. But who will venture to attempt to draw the line, where God's Nature and work begin, and man's end, in the Person of Christ? Who will venture to speak of modes and degrees of inspiration there? The mystery dazzles the eye, it baffles all our faculties of analysis. And yet, like the mid-day sun, at which we cannot gaze, while it blinds us with its glory, it alone enables us to see; all would be dark without it. It is the central orb of Christianity.

So it is, in a certain sense, with Inspiration. We cannot define its degrees. It would seem to be our wisdom to decline the attempt, to confess our ignorance, and to act on what we know. We know that "*holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost*²;" and that therefore the Scriptures, which the Holy Ghost has given by them, are "*the things*³ that are able to make us wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus."

This may be proved by arguments external and internal. And since it may be proved, we are firmly persuaded, that there are not any, even the least, errors or inaccuracies in the New Testament. If one man alleges that there are two or three inaccuracies in the Gospels, another person may allege that there are four or five; and so on, indefinitely, till at last the claim of the Scriptures to be regarded as the Word of God, and the Rule of Faith, is destroyed.

It is indeed true, that the Apostles and Evangelists, whose instrumentality was used by the Holy Spirit, in dictating Scripture to the World, were not infallible in practice; they were men, and liable to err. The Scriptures themselves record their errors. The unerring Word records errors of those who were employed by God in writing it. St. Paul says, in the Epistle to the Galatians, that St. Peter “was to be blamed,” and “walked not uprightly”¹. The Epistle to the Galatians is a part of Holy Scripture, and we are sure that the Apostle Peter erred, because the Holy Ghost, writing by St. Paul in Holy Scripture, affirms that he erred; and relates what his error was².

In fact, the human fallibility of those persons, by whose instrumentality Holy Scripture was written, and the inerrancy of Holy Scripture itself, written by their instrumentality, constitute together the very essence of Inspiration. We do not say that God is inspired. No; God is infallible, and inspires. But we say, that the writers of Scripture are inspired, because they, being fallible men, were preserved from all error, and *guided into all truth*³ necessary for us to know for our everlasting salvation, by the Inspiration of the Infallible God.

If, therefore, to our fallible senses, there seems to be any error in Holy Scripture, we are sure that the cause of this seeming error is not in Him Who wrote what is written, or in that which is written by His agency, but in us, who read what He wrote.

The sentiments of the Ancient Church on this subject are thus expressed by one of her greatest Theologians, S. Augustine, in one of his letters to S. Jerome.

“I have learnt, I confess, to pay such deference to the Books of Scripture, and to them alone, that I most firmly believe, that none of their writers has ever fallen into any error in writing. And if I meet with any thing in them, which seems to me to be contrary to truth, I doubt not that either the Manuscript is in fault, or that the Translator has missed the sense, or that I myself have not rightly apprehended it. I read the books of other writers in such a spirit, as not to deem a thing true, because they think it so, however holy and learned they may be, but because they are able to persuade me of its truth by the authority of Scripture, or by probable inference from it. Nor do I imagine, my dear brother, that you differ from me in this, or desire your own books to be so read, as if they were writings of Prophets and Apostles; to doubt concerning which, whether they are altogether free from error, is impiety⁴.”

Ep. lxxxii. :—“At enim,” says the objector, “satiùs est credere, Apostolum Paulum aliquid verè non scripsisse, quàm Apostolum Petrum non rectè aliquid egisse;

And, again, "we must take care to approach the reading of Scripture with such a spirit of reverence, as rather to pass by what we cannot understand, than to prefer our own sense to the Truth¹." "I owe this free servitude solely to the Canonical Scriptures, that I follow them alone, with the conviction that their writers have not fallen into any error²."

These words were addressed to S. Jerome, who speaks in the same spirit,—
"I know that I regard the Apostles in a different light from other writers; the former always say what is true; the latter, as men, sometimes err³."

From among the Divines of our own Church, we may cite the language of *Richard Hooker*⁴;

"We count these things perfect which want nothing requisite for the end, whereto they were instituted. As therefore God created every part and particle of Man exactly perfect, that is to say, in all points sufficient unto that end for which He appointed it; so the Scripture, yea, every sentence thereof, is perfect, and wanteth nothing requisite unto that purpose for which God delivered the same."

Much has been written recently on what is called Verbal Inspiration.

Words are symbols of things. The words of Scripture are the instruments used for the conveyance of a knowledge of the things of God to the mind of man. And in order that the things of God may be rightly conveyed to the human mind, it is necessary, that the verbal symbols should correctly represent, as far as human language can represent, what is in the Divine Mind. And if we say, that the writers of the New Testament were not under the control and direction of the Holy Spirit in their use of words, but were liable to human errors and infirmities in their representations of the words and works of Christ, we do in fact deny their inspiration. How far this control and direction extended, it would, as was before said, be presumptuous to attempt to define. St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans, and Tertius wrote that Epistle⁵; they wrote the same thing, but not in the same way. Tertius was not inspired,—St. Paul was. Tertius wrote as a mechanical instrument in the hand of a man; St. Paul wrote as a free agent in the hand of God. And St. Paul himself affirms that the words which he writes in his Epistles, veritati, nihil aliud quàm vel mendosum esse codicem, vel interpretem non assecutum esse quod dictum est, vel me minimè intellexisse, non ambigam. Alios autem ita lego, ut quantàlibet sanctitate doctrinâque præpolleant, non ideo verum putem, quia ipsi ita senserunt, sed quia mihi vel per illos auctores canonicos, vel probabili ratione, quod à vero non abhorreat, persuadere potuerunt. Nec te, mi frater, sentire aliquid aliter existimo; prorsus, inquam, non te arbitror, sic legi tuos libros velle, tamquam Prophetarum et Apostolorum; de quorum scriptis, quod omni errore careant, dubitare nefarium est."

are “not words which man’s wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth”¹. St. Paul therefore, we are sure, was under the guidance of the Holy Spirit in his words, as well as thoughts; and in the letter as well as in the substance of what he wrote for the teaching of the Church of Christ, in those writings which were received as canonical Scripture by her, to whom Christ promised His own presence and that of the Holy Ghost.

It is alleged, indeed, by some, that such a belief as this is inconsistent with the facts of the case, as presented to us in the Gospels;

How is it, it has been asked, that we have so many verbal coincidences in the Gospels, especially in the first three? How is it that we have in one Gospel, what appear to be mere literal transcripts from another? The mere mechanical act of copying cannot be a work worthy of the Holy Ghost.

How, again, it is asked, can we account for the fact, that we have different recitals from different Evangelists of the same Discourses of our blessed Lord, if the Evangelists were under the control of the Holy Spirit in their use of words? How is it, that we have different accounts of the words used by Him in the Institution of the Lord’s Supper? How is it, that we have different reports of the inscription written by Pilate on the cross? How are these variations in the Gospels to be explained?

These questions will be considered hereafter, in the Introduction to the Four Gospels.

It has also been alleged, that the existence of Various Readings in the New Testament is a proof that the writers could not have been under the control of the Holy Ghost in their use of words. Why, it is asked, if they were under His guidance, have we not received a stereotyped edition of the New Testament?

To this question we may reply by another. It is allowed, that the substance of Scripture is from God. Why then have we not a stereotyped Creed? Why has God allowed Heresies to arise, perverting the sense of Scripture? Why has He permitted so many various readings, so to speak, of that one sense, which is confessedly from Him? All these things are trials of our vigilance and faith. They are parts of our moral probation in this world. And if those Various Readings of the sense of Scripture are quite consistent with a belief—as assuredly they are—in the Inspiration of that sense; so the Various Readings of the letter of Scripture, which may be confined within much narrower limits than those of the sense, and are of comparatively little importance², are quite compatible with a belief that the writers of Scripture were under the direction of the Holy Spirit in the letter, as well as the sense.

Ibid. ix. 44:—“In universum observetur, inter millenas illas varias lectiones à Codd. scriptis N. T. collectas, quæ adeo videntur nonnullis tericulo, admodum paucas dari, quæ alicujus sint momenti; multò adhuc pauciores, quæ sensum immutent. Pleræque omnes sunt scribarum aberrationes, leves admodum; ortæ autem sæpius è differentiâ quâdam prononciandi, et pænè indignæ quæ à nobis tanto studio annotentur.”

It has not pleased Almighty God to preserve to us the original autographs of the Gospels. Various Readings of the Sacred Text existed even in the second century. No Manuscript of the first or second century is now known to exist, and only four or five Manuscripts are still extant, that can be assigned to a date prior to the seventh century. After all the labours of Collators and Critics, we shall never be sure that we have the precise words of the Apostles and Evangelists in every minute particular.

If then we are disposed to be over-captious, if we desire to busy ourselves with scrupulous curiosity about mint, anise, and cummin, we may say that we have not the authentic language of Scripture; and that we cannot allow ourselves to believe that we have in the New Testament the words of a message dictated by the Holy Ghost.

But, when we come to examine the evidence of the case, we find, that, after the elimination of manifest errors of copyists, and after the application of the rules of sound Criticism to the revision of the Text, the verbal discrepancies of the Manuscripts of the New Testament are so slight and trivial, as scarcely to be of any account.

But this is not all. These discrepancies, being such as they are found to be, are of inestimable value. They show, that there has been no collusion among our witnesses, and that our Manuscript copies of the Gospels, about five hundred in number, and brought to us from all parts of the world, have not been mutilated or interpolated, with any sinister design; that they have not been tampered with by any religious sect, for the sake of propagating any private opinion as the Word of God. These discrepancies are, in fact, evidences of the purity and integrity of the Sacred Text. They show that the Scriptures which we now hold in our hands, in the nineteenth century, are identical with those which were received by the Church in the first century as written by the Holy Ghost.

Indeed, the Various Readings of the Text of Holy Scripture are a striking proof of God's providential care watching over the Text of Holy Scripture. For whence do they arise? From the vast number of ancient Manuscripts of the Scriptures; a number far exceeding in amount that of any other ancient Book in the world. If there were only a few Manuscripts of the Scriptures, there would be only a few Various Readings; and if there was only one Manuscript, there would be no Various Readings at all. But then how precarious and uncertain would be the foundations of our faith¹!

“If there had been but one Manuscript of the Greek Testament at the restoration of learning about two centuries ago, then we had had no Various Readings at all. And would the Text be in a better condition then, than now we have 30,000? So far from that, that in the best single Copy extant we should have had hundreds of faults, and some omissions irreparable. Besides that the suspicions of fraud and foul play would have been increased immensely. It is good therefore, you'll allow, to have more anchors than one; and another MS. to join with the first would give more

Although it has not pleased Almighty God to preserve to us the Original Autographs of the Apostles and Evangelists, yet He has preserved to us many hundreds of ancient Manuscripts of the New Testament written in all parts of the world; and He has thus given us as strong an assurance of the integrity of the Text of the New Testament, as if we had the Autographs themselves.

If we had those Autographs, it might be alleged by some, that they were not genuine, or had been tampered with; and it would not have been easy to refute such allegations. But these countless ancient Manuscripts coming to us from every quarter of Christendom are Guardians of the Text of Scripture, and Wit-authority, as well as security. Now chuse that second where you will, there shall still be a thousand variations from the first, and yet half or more of the faults shall still remain in them both.

"A third therefore, and so a fourth, and still on, are desirable; that by a joint and mutual help, all the faults may be mended: some Copy preserving the true reading in one place, and some in another. And yet the more Copies you call to assistance, the more do the Various Readings multiply upon you: every Copy having its peculiar slips, tho' in a principal passage or two it do singular service.

"And this is fact, not only in the New Testament, but in all antient books whatever.

"It is a good Providence and a great blessing, that so many Manuscripts of the New Testament are still amongst us, some procured from Ægypt, others from Asia, others found in the Western Churches. For the very distances of places as well as numbers of the books demonstrate, that there could be no collusion, no altering nor interpolating one Copy by another, nor all by any of them.

"In profane authors (as they are call'd) whereof one Manuscript only had the luck to be preserv'd, as Velleius Paterculus among the Latins, and Hesychius among the Greeks, the faults of the scribes are found so numerous, and the defects so beyond all redress, that notwithstanding the pains of the learned'st and acutest critics for two whole centuries, those books still are, and are like to continue, a mere heap of errors.

"On the contrary, where the Copies of any author are numerous, tho' the Various Readings always increase in proportion, there the text, by an accurate collation of them made by skilful and judicious hands, is ever the more correct, and comes nearer to the true words of the author. In the Manuscripts of the New Testament, the variations have been noted with a religious, not to say superstitious exactness. Every difference, in spelling, in the smallest particle or article of speech, in the very order or collocation of words without real change, has been studiously registered.

"Nor has the text only been ransacked, but all the Antient Versions, the Latin Vulgate, Italic, Syriac, Æthiopic, Arabic, Coptic, Armenian, Gothic, and Saxon; nor these only, but all the dispersed citations of the Greek and Latin Fathers in a course of 500 years. What wonder then, if, with all this scrupulous search in every hole and corner, the varieties rise to 30,000? when in all antient books of the same bulk, whereof the MSS. are numerous, the variations are as many or more; and yet no Versions to swell the reckoning?

"And yet in these and all other books, the text is not made more precarious on that account, but more certain and authentic.

"The present text was first settled almost 200 years ago, out of several MSS. by Robert Stephens, a printer and bookseller at Paris, whose beautiful and (generally speaking) accurate edition has been ever since counted the standard, and followed by all the rest. Now this specific text in your doctor's notion seems taken for the sacred original in every word and syllable; and if the conceit is but spread and propagated, within a few years that printer's infallibility will be as zealously maintained as an Evangelist's or Apostle's.

"Dr. Mill, were he alive, would confess that this text fix'd by a printer is sometimes by the various readings rendered uncertain, nay is proved certainly wrong. But then he would subjoin, That the real text of the sacred writer does not now (since the originals have been so long lost) lie in any single MS. or Edition, but is dispers'd in them all. 'Tis competently exact, even in the worst MS. now extant; nor is one article of faith, or moral precept, either perverted or lost in them; chuse as awkwardly as you can, chuse the worst by design out of the whole lump of readings. But the lesser matters of diction, and among several synonymous expressions, the very words of the writer must be found out by the same industry and sagacity that is used in other books; must not be risk'd upon the credit of any particular MS. or Edition, but be sought, acknowledg'd, and challenged wherever they are met with." (Bentley, Discourse on Freethinking, pp. 90—97. Cambridge, 1743.)

nesses to us of its purity in all essentials, in which they all agree. And, in the comparatively insignificant minutiae in which they differ, they afford the means, by their number and variety, of adjusting these differences, and of settling the Text of Scripture. It is the province of the Church of Christ to protect and declare the true sense of Scripture, and it is the office of sound Criticism to aid her in defending and promulgating the true letter of Scripture; and by its means we may rest assured, that in reading Scripture we are receiving divinely-inspired doctrine, and are also reading *words, which not man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth*¹.

Thus it appears even from the Various Readings themselves, that the letter of Scripture, no less than the substance, has been guarded and authenticated by God.

One word, in fine, concerning that letter.

Some have disparaged the style of Scripture as barbarous; and others have apologized for it as the work of illiterate and unlearned men. But surely these notions concerning it are very erroneous. The diction of Scripture, it is true, is not the language of any other composition in the world. The Greek of the New Testament is not the Greek of Xenophon, Plato, or Demosthenes. It is a language of its own. And we need not scruple to affirm, that, in precision of expression, in pure and native simplicity, in delicacy of handling, in the grouping of words and phrases, in dignified and majestic sublimity, it has no rival in the world.

The more carefully it is studied, the more clearly will this appear. “Nihil otiosum in Sacra Scriptura”². “Nihil vacuum, neque sine signo, apud Deum”³. Every sentence—we might almost say every phrase—is fraught with meaning. As it is in the book of Nature, so is it in the pages of Holy Writ. Both are from the same Divine Hand. And if we apply to the language of Holy Scripture the same microscopic process, which we use in scrutinizing the beauties of the natural world, and which reveals to us exquisite colours and the most graceful texture, in the petals of a flower, the fibres of a plant, the plumage of a bird, or the wings of an insect, we shall discover new sources of delight and admiration in the least portions of Holy Writ, and believe that it may be one of the employments of Angels and beatified Saints, in another state of existence, to gaze on the glorious mysteries of God's Holy Word.

ON THE AMMONIAN SECTIONS

AND

THE EUSEBIAN CANONS OF THE FOUR GOSPELS.

IN the middle of the third century Ammonius divided the Gospels into Sections, for the purpose of constructing a Harmony, in which the four narratives might be combined.

The numbers which denote these Ammonian Sections are often found in the margin of MSS. of the Greek Testament.

In the following century the celebrated Historian of the Church, Eusebius, Bishop of Cæsarea, drew up the Tables which are commonly called his Canons. In these the Ammonian Sections are so distributed as to show in a tabular form what portions of the other Evangelists correspond to that Gospel which stands first in order in each Canon. They exhibit as follows :

- I. Sections found in all the four Gospels.
- II. Sections common to three ; Matthew, Mark, and Luke.
- III. " " " Matthew, Luke, and John.
- IV. " " " Matthew, Mark, and John.
- V. Sections common to two ; Matthew and Luke.
- VI. " " " Matthew and Mark.
- VII. " " " Matthew and John.
- VIII. " " " Mark and Luke.
- IX. " " " Luke and John.
- X. Sections in which each several Gospel contains matter peculiar to itself.

The numbers of the Canons were subjoined by Eusebius to the Ammonian Sections ¹ as they stood in the margin of a Greek copy of the Gospels ; hence they became generally known and used.

In some MSS. they appear as placed by Eusebius ; in others, the Ammonian Sections

Εὐσέβιος Καρπιανῷ ἀγαπητῷ ἀδελφῷ ἐν Κυρίῳ χαίρειν.

ἈΜΜΩΝΙΟΣ μὲν ὁ Ἀλεξανδρεὺς, πολλὴν, ὡς εἰκός, φιλοπονίαν καὶ σπουδὴν εἰσαγογχὼς, τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων ἡμῖν καταλέλοιπεν εὐαγγέλιον, τῷ κατὰ Ματθαῖον τὰς ὁμοφώνους τῶν λοιπῶν εὐαγγελιστῶν περικοπὰς παραθεῖς, ὡς ἐξ ἀνάγκης συμβῆναι τὸν τῆς ἀκολουθίας εἰρμὸν τῶν τριῶν διαφθαρῆναι, ὅσον ἐπὶ τῷ ὕφει τῆς ἀναγνώσεως. Ἵνα δὲ σωζομένου καὶ τοῦ τῶν λοιπῶν δι' ὅλου σώματος τε καὶ εἰρμῶ, εἰδέναι ἔχοις τοὺς οἰκείους ἐκάστου εὐαγγελιστοῦ τόπους, ἐν οἷς κατὰ τῶν αὐτῶν ἡνέχθησαν φιλαλήθως εἰπεῖν, ἐκ τοῦ πονήματος τοῦ προειρημένου ἀνδρὸς εἰληφὼς ἀφορμὰς, καθ' ἑτέραν μέθοδον κανόνας δέκα τὸν ἀριθμὸν διεχάραξά σοι τοὺς ὑποτεταγμένους· ὧν ὁ μὲν πρῶτος περιέχει ἀριθμοὺς ἐν οἷς τὰ παραπλήσια εἰρήκασιν οἱ τέσσαρες, Ματθαῖος, Μάρκος, Λουκᾶς, Ἰωάννης.

Ὁ δεύτερος, ἐν ᾧ οἱ τρεῖς, Ματθαῖος, Μάρκος, Λουκᾶς.

Ὁ τρίτος, ἐν ᾧ οἱ τρεῖς, Ματθαῖος, Λουκᾶς, Ἰωάννης.

Ὁ τέταρτος, ἐν ᾧ οἱ τρεῖς, Ματθαῖος, Μάρκος, Ἰωάννης.

Ὁ πέμπτος, ἐν ᾧ οἱ δύο, Ματθαῖος, Λουκᾶς. Ὁ ἕκτος, ἐν ᾧ οἱ δύο, Ματθαῖος, Μάρκος.

Ὁ ἕβδομος, ἐν ᾧ οἱ δύο, Ματθαῖος, Ἰωάννης.

Ὁ ὃγδοος, ἐν ᾧ οἱ δύο, Λουκᾶς, Μάρκος.

Ὁ ἔννατος, ἐν ᾧ οἱ δύο, Λουκᾶς, Ἰωάννης.

Ὁ δέκατος, ἐν ᾧ περὶ τίνων ἕκαστος αὐτῶν ἰδίως ἀνέγραψεν.

Αὕτη μὲν οὖν ἡ τῶν ὑποτεταγμένων κανόνων ὑπόθεσις· ἡ δὲ σαφὴς αὐτῶν διήγησις, ἔστιν ἡδε. Ἐφ' ἐκάστῳ τῶν τεσσάρων εὐαγγελίων ἀριθμὸς τις πρόκειται κατὰ μέρος, ἀρχόμενος ἀπὸ τοῦ πρώτου, εἴτα δευτέρου, καὶ τρίτου, καὶ καθέξης προῶν δι' ὅλου μέχρι τοῦ τέλους τοῦ βιβλίου. Καθ' ἕκαστον δὲ ἀριθμὸν ὑποσημείωσις διὰ κινναβάρεως πρόκειται, δηλοῦσα ἐν ποίῳ τῶν δέκα κανόνων κείμενος ὁ ἀριθμὸς τυγχάνει. ο ον εἰ μὲν Α', δηλον ὡς ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ· εἰ δὲ Β', ἐν τῷ δευτέρῳ· καὶ οὕτω καθέξης μέχρι τῶν δέκα. εἰ οὖν ἀναπτύξας ἐν τι τῶν τεσσάρων εὐαγγελίων ὁποιονδήποτε, βουλευθείης ἐπιστῆναι τινι ᾧ βούλει κεφαλαίῳ, καὶ γνῶναι τίνες τὰ παραπλήσια εἰρήκασιν, καὶ τοὺς οἰκείους ἐν ἐκάστῳ τόπῳ εὐρεῖν, ἐν οἷς κατὰ τῶν αὐτῶν ἡνέχθησαν, ἥς ἐπέχεις περικοπῆς ἀναλαβὼν τὸν προκείμενον ἀριθμὸν, ἐπιζητήσας τε αὐτὸν ἐνδον ἐν τῷ κανόνι, ὃν ἡ διὰ τοῦ κινναβάρεως ὑποσημείωσις υποβέβληκεν, εἴῃ μὲν εὐθὺς ἐκ τῶν ἐπὶ μετώπου τοῦ κανόνος προγραφῶν, ὅποσοι καὶ τίνες τὰ παραπλήσια εἰρήκασιν· ἐπιστήσας δὲ καὶ τοῖς τῶν λοιπῶν εὐαγγελίων ἀριθμοῖς τοῖς ἐν τῷ κανόνι ᾧ ἐπέχεις ἀριθμῷ παρακειμένοις, ἐπιζητήσας τε αὐτοὺς ἐνδον ἐν τοῖς οἰκείοις ἐκάστου εὐαγγελίου τόποις, τὰ παραπλήσια λέγοντας εὐρήσεις.

Then follow the X Canons.

alone are found in the margin, while at the foot of the page those numbers are repeated with a short Table of the Sections in the other Gospels which correspond.

This latter plan has its convenience in one respect, that the Sections are mentioned, not in the order of Matthew (or whichever Evangelist happens to be first in each particular Canon), but in connexion with each Gospel.

An inconvenience has been found in using the Tables as they generally stand, if the student wished to compare a Section in one of the Gospels with the others, unless the Section were in St. Matthew, or in that Gospel which stands first in those parts of the Table which do not comprise the first Gospel.

Thus, if he wished to compare the 74th Section of St. Luke (as there marked on the margin) with the other Evangelists, he had to search for that number through the first Table, where he would find it between 260 and 269, and he would then see that it corresponds to 276 in Matthew, 158 in Mark, and 98 in John.

In order to remove this inconvenience, an endeavour has been made¹ to arrange the Canons in such a manner as will exhibit the Sections of each Gospel arranged in its own order.

For this purpose, the Greek numerals being exchanged for Roman, as had been already done by *S. Jerome*² in his Latin Version, the Canons are here repeated, as often as is necessary, so as to allow each Gospel to take the lead: thus Canon I. is given four times, with the Sections of each Gospel in their own order; Canons II., III., and IV. are given three times; Canons V., VI., VII., VIII., and IX. are given twice.

By means of the Sections and Canons thus arranged, the reader is able at once to compare parallel statements in the Gospels. They also show to the eye the transpositions, &c., of events as narrated by the different Evangelists, and what each Evangelist has in common with all the others, or with how many of them, as well as peculiar to himself.

For examples of the use of these Canons, the reader may turn to Luke xi. 1—4. He there sees $\frac{123}{v}$ in the margin; he turns to Table V. in the order of Luke; and at 123 he finds Matt. 43, and he thence learns that the parallel Section will be found marked 43 in order in the text of St. Matthew.

Again, in the text of John xviii. 28 he sees $\frac{176}{I}$, and thence knows that this Section will be found in all the other Evangelists; and by turning to Canon I. (in the order of St. John), 176, he sees where the parallel Sections are in the other Gospels.

² Canones quoque, quos Eusebius Cæsariensis Episcopus Alexandrinum sequutus Ammonium in decem numeros ordinavit, sicut in Græco habentur, expressimus. Jerome, Præfat. in IV. Evangelia, tom. i. p. 1426. He then proceeds to explain the use of the Canons.

INTRODUCTION TO THE FOUR GOSPELS.

I. On the Composition, Order, and Design of the Four Gospels.

IN recent times endeavours have been made to trace the origin of the Gospels, either

1. To some primitive Aramaic document¹; or
2. To fragmentary narratives, anterior to their composition².

But these theories have no historic foundation; and have not led to any satisfactory results³.

The testimony of Christian Antiquity is clear and consistent,

- (1) That the four Gospels were delivered by the Holy Spirit to the Church of Christ through the instrumentality of those persons whose names they bear.
- (2) That St. Matthew's Gospel was the first written, and St. John's Gospel the last.
- (3) That these four Gospels, and they alone, were received from the beginning as divinely inspired histories of our Blessed Lord⁴.
- (4) That two of the Gospels (the first and last) were written by APOSTLES; the other two were written under the direction of Apostles;—that of St. Mark in connexion with St. Peter; that of St. Luke, with St. Paul.
- (5) That the former three Gospels having been publicly received and read in the Churches of Christendom, were solemnly sanctioned by the Apostle St. John, who added his own Gospel to complete the Evangelical Canon⁵.
- (6) That these Four Gospels were read in the Church as of equal authority with the writings of Moses and the Prophets, and as inspired by One and the same Spirit, Who had spoken in the Old Testament, and Who was given by One and the same Lord, the Everlasting Logos or Word, Jesus Christ.

“The Divine Logos” or Word (says *Irenæus*⁶), “the Creator of all things, Who sitteth upon the Cherubim, and holdeth all things together, after that He was manifested to men, gave us the Fourfold Gospel, which is held together by ONE SPIRIT.”

“He (says *Augustine*⁷), Who had sent the Prophets before His own descent from Heaven, sent

“Tertius Lucas medicus, natione Syrus Antiochensis, cuius laus in evangelio (2 Cor. viii. 18); qui et ipse discipulus apostoli Pauli in Achaïæ Boeotiæque partibus volumen condidit, quædam altius repetens: et ut ipse in proemio confitetur, audita magis quàm visa describens.

“Ultimus Joannes Apostolus et Evangelista, quem Jesum amavit plurimum, qui supra pectus Domini recumbens purissima doctrinarum fluentia potavit, et qui solus de cruce meruit audire, ‘Ecce mater tua.’ Is cum esset in Asiâ, et jam tunc hæreticorum semina pullularent Cérinthi, Hebionis, et ceterorum qui negant Christum in carne venisse, quos et ipse in Epistolâ suâ Antichristos vocat (1 Joh. ii. 18. 22), coactus est ab omnibus penè tunc Asiæ Episcopis, et multarum Ecclesiarum legationibus, de divinitate Salvatoris altius scribere, et ad ipsum (ut ita dicam) Dei Verbum non tam audaci quàm felici temeritate prorumpere. Unde et Ecclesiastica narrat Historia, cum à fratribus cogeretur ut scriberet, ita facturum se respondisse, si indicto jejunio in commune omnes Deum deprecarentur; quo expleto, revelatione saturatus, illud proœmium è coelo veniens eructavit, ‘In principio erat Verbum, et Verbum erat apud Deum, et Deus erat Verbum; hoc erat in principio apud Deum.’” Joh. i. 1.

the Apostles after His Ascension into Heaven. And whatsoever He willed us to read concerning His own actions and words, that He commanded them to write as it were by His own hands."

"It is the Holy Ghost Who in the Old Testament inspired the Law and the Prophets, and the Evangelists and Apostles in the New ¹."

The Christian Church, looking at the origin of the FOUR GOSPELS, and at the attributes which God has in rich measure been pleased to bestow upon them by His Holy Spirit, found a prophetic picture of them in the Four living Cherubim, named from heavenly knowledge, seen by the Prophet Ezekiel at the river of Chebar ². Like them, the Gospels are Four in number: like them, they are the Chariot of God, Who sitteth between the Cherubim ³: like them, they bear Him on a winged Throne into all lands: like them, they move wherever the Spirit guides them: like them, they are marvelously joined together, intertwined with coincidences and differences; wing interwoven with wing, and wheel inwound with wheel: like them, they are full of eyes, and sparkle with heavenly light: like them, they sweep from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven, and fly with lightning's speed, and with the noise of many waters. Their sound is gone out into all lands, and their words unto the end of the world.

These Four Living Creatures were seen by St. John in heaven; and he heard their voices crying Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come ⁴.

These symbolical representations were regarded by the Ancient Church as expressive of the characteristics of the four Gospels respectively. All the Four Gospels proclaim Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world.

But, together with this general purpose common to all the Four, each Evangelist appears to have designed to display Christ in a light peculiarly his own ⁵.

The Evangelist St. Matthew (says Augustine ⁶) more fully declares in his Gospel, and dwells on more constantly, those things which concern Christ's Kingly character and office. He begins his Gospel with tracing Christ's Genealogy from David the King, by a line of Kings. Here wise men come from the East to do homage to the King of the Jews, whose birth strikes fear into the heart of Herod the King.

St. Luke dilates more on what belongs to Christ as our Priest. He alone mentions the relationship of Mary to the wife of Zacharias the Priest. He relates the Angelic Vision to Zacharias ministering in the Priest's office. He describes the sacrificial offerings made for Christ, an Infant, in the Temple (ii. 22—24). He oftener than the rest reveals to us Christ in prayer, and intimates to us the mediatorial office of Him Who ever liveth to make intercession for us ⁷.

St. Luke, "the beloved Physician," "the brother whose praise is in the Gospel," the companion and historian of St. Paul, may be called the Evangelist of the Gentiles, as St. Paul was their Apostle. And, like the Apostle of the Gentiles, he is careful to teach the inefficacy of the Mosaic Law, as an instrument of reconciliation with God; and to proclaim the doctrines of the saving efficacy of Christ's Sacrifice, and the blessedness of the Atonement made by Him on the Cross; and Justification by Faith in His Blood.

congruit vitulo hic Evangelii liber, quia à sacerdotibus inchoavit, et consummavit in vitulo, Qui omnium peccata suscipiens, pro totius mundi vitâ est immolatus; sacerdotalis enim est Ille vitulus. Idem quippe et vitulus et sacerdos: sacerdos, quia propitiator est noster; advocatum enim ipsum habemus apud Patrem: vitulus, quia suo sanguine nos diluit, et redemit. Et bene accidit, ut quoniam Evangelii librum secundum Matthæum diximus esse moralem, opinio hujuscemodi non prætermitteretur; mores enim propriè dicuntur humani.

"Plerique tamen putant Ipsum Dominum nostrum in quatuor Evangelii libris, quatuor formis animalium figurari, quod Idem homo, Idem leo, Idem vitulus, Idem aquila esse comprobatur. Homo, quia natus ex Maria est: leo, quia fortis est: vitulus, quia hostia est: aquila, quia resurrectio est. Atque ita in libris singulis forma animalium figuratur, ut unicuique libri series propositorum videatur animalium aut naturæ, aut virtuti, aut gratiæ, aut miraculo convenire. Quæ licet omnia in omnibus sint, tamen plenitudo quædam in singulis virtutum est singularum. Ortum hominis alius descripsit uberius, mores quosque hominis præceptis uberius erudit. Alius à potentiæ cepit expressione divinæ, quod ex Rege Rex, fortis ex forti, verus ex vero, vivida mortem virtute consumserit. Tertius sacrificium sacerdotale præmisit, et ipsam vituli immolationem stylo quodam pleniore diffudit. Quartus copiosius cæteris divinæ miracula resurrectionis expressit. Unus igitur omnia, et unus in omnibus, sicut dictum est: non dissimilis in singulis, sed verus in cunctis."

⁷ Heb. vii. 25.

He is careful also, as the Apostle is, to show that the doctrine of Justification by Faith in Christ alone, is not a speculative doctrine, but a practical principle, and that it is the root of Christian Virtue;

"Blessed are your eyes, for they see," says Christ in this Gospel to His disciples¹. "For I tell you, that many Prophets and Kings have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them." And in reply to the Jewish Lawyer, who was desirous to *justify himself*², He propounds the Parable of the Good Samaritan, wherein He represents, as in a figure, His own Blessed Person, and His own work in saving the world³, and sums up all by saying, "Go and do thou likewise."

Thus He teaches, that all who would be saved by His death, must imitate His life. He teaches us that the Christian life does not consist in seeing and hearing Him, but in doing and suffering as He did. Christ, the Good Samaritan, has made us all neighbours to one another in Himself, by His own Incarnation and by our Incorporation in Him. And "he that saith that he abideth in Him, ought himself also so to walk even as He walked⁴." For He who "suffered for us, has also thereby left us an example that we should follow His steps⁵." And "hereby perceive we the love of God, because He laid down His life for us; and we ought also to lay down our lives for the brethren⁶."

"We concur with those," says S. Augustine, "who, in interpreting the Vision of the Four Living Creatures in the Apocalypse, which represent the Four Gospels⁷, assign the Lion, the King of all Beasts, to St. Matthew; and the Ox, the Sacrificial Victim, to St. Luke. The Apocalypse itself says, 'The Lion of the Tribe of Judah prevailed to open the book⁸;' and thus it designates the Lion as symbolical of Christ our King.

"St. Mark follows St. Matthew, and relates what Christ did in His Human Nature, without special reference to His functions as King or Priest, and is therefore fitly symbolized in the Apocalyptic vision as the Man.

"These three Living Creatures—the Lion, the Calf, the Man—walk on the earth. The first three Evangelists describe specially those things which Christ did in our flesh, and relate the precepts which He delivered, on the duties to be performed by us while we walk on earth and dwell in the flesh. But St. John soars to heaven as an Eagle, above the clouds of human infirmity, and reveals to us the mysteries of Christ's Godhead, and of the Trinity in Unity, and the felicities of Life Eternal; and gazes on the Light of Immutable Truth with a keen and steady ken.

"The first three Evangelists inculcate the practical duties of Active Life; St. John dwells on the ineffable mysteries of the Contemplative: the former speak of Labour, the last speaks of Rest: the former leads the Way, the last shows our Home. In the former, we are cleansed from sin, in the last we enjoy the beatific Vision promised to the pure in heart, who will see God.

"He, who is the last in order, declares more fully the Divine Nature of Christ, by which He is Equal to and One with the Father⁹, and in which He made the World¹⁰; as if this Evangelist, who reclined on the bosom of Christ at Supper, had imbibed in a larger stream the mystery of His Divinity from His lips.

"This Evangelic Quaternion is the fourfold Car of the Lord¹¹, upon which He rides throughout the world, and subdues the Nations to His easy yoke. The Mystery of His Royalty and Priesthood, which was foretold by Prophecy, is proclaimed in the Gospel. The same Lord Christ, Who sent the Prophets before His descent from heaven into this world, has now sent His Apostles after His Ascension. He is the Head of all His Disciples; and since His Disciples have written those things which He did and said, we are not to affirm with some, that Christ wrote nothing. They wrote, as His members, what they knew from the dictation of Him who is their Head. Whatsoever He willed that we should know of His own Words and Deeds, this He commanded them to write, as it were, by His own hand. Whoever, therefore, rightly comprehends the fellowship of Unity, and the Ministry of His Members acting harmoniously in different functions under their Divine Head, will receive what he reads in the Gospel from the narration of the Evangelists, with no other feeling these symbols occur in Holy Scripture, the three other symbols interchange their order, but the Eagle is always last. Thus, in Ezek. i. 10, the order is, the Man, the Lion, the Ox. In Ezek. x. 14, Cherub, Man, Lion. In Rev. iv. 7, Lion, Calf, Man. The Royal, the Sacerdotal, the Human in Christ is presented to the sight in a various order at various times; but the contemplation of the Divine Nature is reserved always to the last. Cp. S. Gregor. in Ezekiel, lib. i. homil. 2 and 3. Mede's Works, book iii. p. 594.

than if he saw the very hand of Christ Himself, which He has in His own body, performing the act of writing¹.

“In the first three Evangelists, the gifts of active virtue,—in the last, St. John, those of contemplative, shine forth. *To one man is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit*². One drinks wisdom from the bosom of Christ; another man is raised to the third heaven, and hears unutterable words³. But as long as they are in the body, all are *absent from the Lord*⁴. And all who believe with good hope, and are written in the Book of Life, have this promise reserved to them,—*I will love him, and will manifest Myself to him*⁵. In proportion as we make greater progress in knowledge and intelligence in this mortal pilgrimage of life, let us be more and more on our guard against two devilish sins, Pride and Envy. Let us remember, that as St. John elevates us more and more to the contemplation of the Truth, so much the more does he instruct us in the sweetness of Love. That precept is most healthful and true,—*The greater thou art, the more humble thyself, and thou shalt find favour before the Lord*⁶. The Evangelist who reveals to us Christ more sublimely than the rest, he also shows us the humility of Christ washing His Disciples’ feet⁷.”

Although other writings were extant in ancient times, pretending to evangelical authority, yet it is evident, from these symbolical figures⁸, that the Church of Christ rejected those writings, and recognized four Gospels, and four only.

In further evidence of their fourfold character, we may observe that one of the earliest Christian writers employed himself in making a “Harmony of the Gospels;” and from the name⁹ (Diatessaron) which he gave to his work, it is clear, that four Gospels, and four only were then received by the Church. And these four Gospels were identical in name, in form, and in matter, with those received by ourselves at this day.

If we trace the four Evangelical streams back toward their source, we find that they are all derived, through Apostolic channels, from CHRIST HIMSELF.

The author of the first Gospel, St. MATTHEW, was an Apostle of Christ. He wrote for the special use of his own countrymen¹⁰ and of the Christian Church of Jerusalem, the mother of all Christian Churches, which was first governed by St. James, the Lord’s brother, and continued to flourish during the earlier part of the second century¹¹. The first written Gospel, that is, the first Evangelical Record of Christ’s Miracles, Preaching, Death, Resurrection, and Ascension, was composed for the use of that country in which our Lord’s life was passed. The Gospel was first offered to the Jews. And the fact that St. Matthew’s Gospel is designed for Jews, is a strong evidence of its priority. It was circulated in that City in which our Lord suffered. Here is a proof of the confidence of the Apostles in the truth of Christianity. They did not shrink from inquiry, but challenged and courted it. This Gospel, so written, was received as Scripture by the Christian Church at

Mibi videntur, qui ex Apocalypsi illa quatuor animalia ad intelligendos quatuor Evangelistas interpretati sunt, probabilius aliquid attendisse illi, qui leonem in Matthæo, hominem in Marco, vitulum in Lucâ, aquilam in Joanne intellexerunt, quam illi qui hominem Matthæo, aquilam Marco, leonem Joanni tribuerunt. De principiis enim librorum quendam conjecturam capere voluerunt, non de totâ intentione Evangelistarum, quæ magis fuerat perscrutanda.

Multò enim congruentius ille, qui regiam Christi personam maximè commendavit, per leonem significatus accipitur: unde et in Apocalypsi cum ipsa tribu regia leo commemoratus est, ubi dictum est, Viciit leo de tribu Juda. Secundum Matthæum enim et Magi narrantur venisse ab Oriente ad regem querendum et adorandum, qui eis per stellam natus apparuit: et ipse rex Herodes regem formidat infantem, atque ut eum possit occidere tot parvulos necat.

Quod autem per vitulum Lucas significatus sit, propter maximam victimam sacerdotis, neutri dubitaverunt. Ibi enim à sacerdote Zachariâ incipit sermo narrantis; ibi cognatio Mariæ et Elisabeth commemoratur; ibi sacramenta primi sacerdotii in infante Christo impleta narrantur: et quæcumque alia possunt diligenter adverti, quibus appareat Lucas intentionem circa sacerdotis personam habuisse.

Marcus ergo, qui neque stirpem regiam, neque sacerdotalem vel cognationem vel consecrationem narrare voluit, et tamen in eis versatus ostenditur, quæ homo Christus operatus est, tantum hominis figurâ, in illis quatuor animalibus, significatus videtur.

Hæc autem animalia tria, sive leo, sive homo, sive vitulus, in terrâ gradiuntur: unde isti tres Evangelistæ in his maximè occupati sunt, quæ præcepta mortalis vitæ exercendæ carnem portantibus tradidit. At verò Joannes super nubila infirmitatis humanæ lucem immutabilis veritatis acutissimis atque firmissimis oculis cordis intuetur.

Tres isti Evangelistæ in his rebus maxime diversati sunt, quas Christus per humanam carnem temporaliter gessit: porro autem Joannes ipsam maximè divinitatem Domini, qua Patri est æqualis, intendit, eamque præcipuè suo Evangelio, quantum inter homines sufficere credidit, commendare curavit. Itaque longè à tribus istis superius fertur, ita ut hos videas quodammodo in terrâ cum Christo homine conversari: illum autem transcendisse nebulam, quâ tegitur omnis terra, et pervenisse ad liquidum cælum, unde acie mentis acutissimâ atque firmissimâ videret, in principio Verbum Deum apud Deum, per quem facta sunt omnia; et ipsum agnosceret carnem factum, ut habitaret in nobis: quod acceperit carnem, non quod fuerit mutatus in carnem.

Has Domini sanctas quadrigas, quibus per orbem vectus subigit populos leni suo iugo et sarcinæ levi, quidam vel impiâ vanitate, vel imperitâ temeritate, calumniis appetunt. See also ibid. iv. 11.

Jerusalem. And this reception and public reading of St. Matthew's Gospel, as not only a true history, but as divinely inspired, in the Church of Jerusalem at that period, is a strong evidence of its Veracity and Inspiration.

ST. MARK wrote his Gospel under the dictation of the Apostle St. Peter¹, who calls him *his son*² in the faith: and it is observable, as in full accordance with this account of the authorship of these two Gospels respectively, that from St. Matthew's Gospel³ alone, we learn that the Evangelist belonged to the despised class of Publicans, while it is not he, but another Evangelist⁴, who tells us the honourable fact that Levi left all, rose up, and followed Christ. And in like manner the infirmities of St. Peter are recorded with the most circumstantial fulness in the Gospel of *Marcus his son*⁵; but we are left to gather our knowledge of St. Peter's virtues, and of the praises with which he was honoured by his Divine Master, from the other Gospels.

ST. LUKE'S Gospel, as Christian Antiquity testifies⁶, was written under the eye of St. Paul, who was made an *able minister of the New Testament*⁷, by *knowledge given him above measure, in visions and revelations of the Lord*⁸; and to St. Luke's fidelity St. Paul bears testimony, when he speaks of him as the *beloved physician*⁹, and as one who *alone is with him*¹⁰, and probably, as the *brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the Churches*¹¹.

St. Paul was the Apostle, St. Luke the Evangelist of the Gentiles¹². The same spirit was in them both. Hence, in St. Luke's Gospel especially, there is a rich storehouse of comfort and hope for all who sit in darkness and the shadow of death. Here the good Samaritan, Christ Himself, pours oil and wine into the wounds of the broken-hearted. Here He calls them home in the parable of the Prodigal. Here He accepts them in the Publican. Here He visits them in Zacchæus. Here He pardons them in the penitent thief¹³.

The fourth and last Gospel, which was written at the close of the first century, or soon after, is from the beloved disciple, the Apostle St. JOHN.

Thus all the four Gospels are seen to be due to Christ's APOSTLES, who received special promises from Him, that *He would send them the Holy Ghost to teach them all things, to bring all things to their remembrance, and guide them into all truth*¹⁴, and of whom it is said, that *when He had ascended up on high, He gave some Apostles, and some Evangelists, for the edifying of His Church*¹⁵. Thus the four Evangelical streams, when traced upward, are seen to issue from the Apostolic wells which spring up from the One Divine Fountain of living waters, Who said, *Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life*¹⁶.

St. John was the disciple *whom Jesus loved*¹⁷; he was the disciple who leaned on His breast at supper, when He instituted the Feast of Love, in which the Church will show forth her Lord's death *till He come*¹⁸; he was the disciple to whom Jesus said on the Cross, Behold thy Mother, and who thenceforth *took her unto his own home*¹⁹.

The other Apostles were taken away, one after the other, by violent deaths,—by the cross, by the sword, by wild beasts, and by the stake. St. John survived them all. He was miraculously rescued from the furnace²⁰, and at length died a natural death, at the age of above a hundred years²¹. The other Apostles were sent to Christ by force; St. John tarried, till Christ came for him, and gently took him to Himself. Theirs was the martyrdom of death, his the martyrdom of life²².

The beloved Disciple of the Incarnate Word was providentially preserved to a great old age, not only to refute the heretics who denied the Lord that bought them, and to convince us of the Divinity of the Uncreated Word, Who was in the beginning with God, but also to complete the witness of the Written Word, and to vindicate its Inspiration from the forgeries of false teachers, and to assure us of its fulness and divine character.

²² John xix. 27.

This assertion is attested by ancient and unexceptionable witnesses¹. Towards the close of his long life, copies of the three Gospels of St. MATTHEW, St. MARK, and St. LUKE, which at that time, we are informed, had been diffused throughout Christendom, were publicly brought to St. JOHN, in the city of Ephesus, of which he was the chief Pastor, by some of the Bishops of the Asiatic Churches²; and in their presence St. John openly³ acknowledged these three Gospels as inspired, and, at their request, composed his own Gospel in order to complete the Evangelical Record of the Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ.

The second Evangelist, St. Mark, authenticated the first, St. Matthew, by repeating much of his gospel; so, the third, St. Luke, guaranteed the first and second; the fourth, St. John, omitted much that the preceding three had related, and related much that they had omitted; and so canonized them⁴.

The three earlier Gospels were at that time received by the Church as inspired. They were received and read by the Church as of divine authority equally with the Books of the Old Testament, which Christ Himself had received and owned as inspired by God. And if St. John had not been fully persuaded of their Inspiration,—he, who writes to others, *Beloved, believe not every Spirit, but try the Spirits whether they are of God*⁵,—would not have approved them as inspired, as he did, but he would have rejected them as falsely claiming to be divine.

Nor, again, acknowledging them as divine, would he have presumed to add his own Gospel as the consummation of theirs, unless he had been also sure, that what he himself wrote, was dictated by the same DIVINE SPIRIT, Who had inspired the other three.

It is also clear, that, by composing his own Gospel as the complement of the three preceding ones, he has given an infallible assurance to us, that we, who have the four Gospels, possess a complete, divinely inspired, History of our Lord's Ministry.

Thus we find that all the Gospels are brought together into One. They come to us through St. John from the hands of JESUS CHRIST⁶.

II. On the verbal coincidences in the Gospels.

1. It appears from ancient testimony, that the Gospels were written by Divine Inspiration, in order to be publicly read in the Christian Church in every age and country of the world.

2. And that they were so read, wherever Christianity was received.

The commands of St. Paul, that his own Epistles should be thus *read*⁷, and the fact that the Scriptures of the Old Testament were read in the Synagogues and in the Church, confirm the testimony that the Gospels were read in the Church as soon as they were published⁸.

3. What had been written by any preceding Evangelist in his Gospel could not be unknown to his successors;

It is well said by *S. Augustine*⁹, that “although each of the Evangelists severally followed his (See Acts xiii. 1—3.) He then proceeds to state that Peter went to Rome to encounter Simon Magus, and St. John to Ephesus. And he thus proceeds: γίνεται τοῖνυν ἐν τούτοις τῶν λοιπῶν Εὐαγγελίων ἑκδοῖς Ματθαίου τε καὶ Μάρκου ἔτι μὴν καὶ Λουκᾶ τὰ οἰκεία γεγραφότων Εὐαγγέλια, διεδόθη τε καὶ κατὰ πάσης ἐν ἀκαρεὶ τῆς οἰκουμένης, καὶ ὑπὸ τῶν πιστῶν ἐσπουδάετο πάντων μετὰ πολλῆς, ὡς εἰκός, τῆς διαθέσεως. He then proceeds to recount how at the request of the Christians in Asia St. John wrote his own Gospel, as supplementary to the former three, which he acknowledged as divinely inspired Scripture.

own method in writing his Gospel, yet no one of them intended to write as if he were ignorant of what had been written by any of his predecessors; nor did any of them omit, as if by ignorance, what a previous Evangelist had written; but according as each respectively was inspired to write, he added the not superfluous co-operation of his own labour."

4. The Holy Spirit, for the sake of greater assurance, often repeats by one Prophet what He had said by another; and similar repetitions are found also in the Historical Books of the Old Testament. "The Holy Bible abounds in quotations, but they are introduced in a way which is peculiar to Revelation. When a Prophet mentions one of his own holy brethren, as when Ezekiel names Daniel, or Daniel Jeremiah,—when they mention them, they do not quote them; and when they quote them, they do not mention them¹."

This principle of repetition is characteristic of Divine Revelation. The Prophetical Books of Daniel and the Apocalypse abound with examples of it².

5. It is probable à priori, that the Holy Spirit would adopt a similar practice in the New Testament, to that which He had employed in the Old. And we find it so in fact.

By means of the second and third Evangelists, St. Mark and St. Luke, He warrants the truth and genuineness of the first Gospel. This He does by repeating much of its contents³. In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word is established. Thus the Evangelists became joint vouchers for the truth of the genuine GOSPELS, and, at the same time, joint opposers of the spurious ones, which were obtruded on the world.

The fourth Evangelist, St. John, pursued a different course for doing the same thing; he declared his approval of the foregoing Gospels, not by repeating, but, for the most part, by omitting, what they had related, and by supplying what they had omitted⁴.

The same is true of the Apostolic EPISTLES; they also are entwined with one another by an intertexture of words and sentiments. And the Inspiration of one aids in proving the Inspiration of all.

St. Peter, in his first Epistle, repeats parts of the Epistle of St. James. In his second Epistle he recognizes as Scripture all the Epistles of St. Paul⁵, and there is a remarkable affinity between that Epistle and the Epistle of St. Jude.

This mutual intertexture is a striking characteristic of the Books of Scripture.

Thus the Unity of plan, on which the Gospels and Epistles are written, bears witness to their derivation from One and the Same Spirit. And this plan is similar to what the Holy Spirit had adopted, in dictating the Books both historical and prophetical of the Old Testament.

In fine, we may thus trace the agency of the same Divine Hand in the Sacred Volume, whose component parts were given to the world by the ministry of different persons living in different countries, from time to time, at intervals throughout a period of about fifteen centuries; and whose subject-matter extends over no less a time than forty centuries; and, indeed, reaches from the Creation of the World to the Last Day.

III. On the variations in the Gospels.

If the Evangelists were under the control of the Holy Spirit in their use of words, how, it has been asked, can we account for the fact, that we have different recitals from different Evangelists of the same Discourses of our blessed Lord? How is it that we have different accounts of the words used by Him in the institution of the Lord's Supper? How is it that we have various reports of the inscription written by Pilate on the cross?

In strictness of speech, we must say that not one of the Evangelists gives us the exact words of Christ. He conversed in Syro-Chaldaic, and they wrote in Greek.

But the fact, that they sometimes give different—but never give contrary—reports of the same sayings of our blessed Lord, in no degree disproves their inspiration as to words. Rather we may say, it is characteristic of it, and confirmatory of our belief in it.

The mind of Christ is divine. The Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit alone, knows what was in the mind of Christ⁶. And Holy Scripture was not written to tell us merely that which Christ taught by means of words, which are only human coinage, but to unlock the inner treasury of quendam narrandi ordinem tenuisse videantur, non tamen unusquisque eorum, velut alterius præcedentis ignorans, voluisse scribere reperitur, vel ignorata prætermisisse, quæ scripsisse alius invenitur; sed sicut univique inspiratum est, non superfluum operationem sui laboris adjecit."

⁶ 1 Cor. ii. 11. 16.

*Wisdom of Him Who is Divine*¹. If the Holy Spirit had given us only one verbal account of Christ's sayings, He would have given a far less clear view of Christ's mind than we now possess. This arises, not from any imperfection in the working of the Spirit, but from our imperfection, and from that of the instrument to be used by the Spirit for the conveyance of a knowledge of Christ's mind to us,—namely, human language. He has given to us a fuller knowledge of that mind, by presenting its sense to us in different points of view; just as a Painter gives us a clearer idea of a countenance or a landscape, by representing it to us from different sides. He has given us, so to speak, a panoramic view of Christ's meaning.

For example; if we had but one account of the Institution of the Lord's Supper, we should have a far less complete notion of what was in the Divine Mind of Him Who instituted it, than we have now by reason of the varieties of expression, by which the Holy Spirit represents in the several Gospels the Divine thoughts which were in the Mind of Christ at its Institution².

The same may be said of the various reports which we read of Christ's Discourses. Their varieties are like so many contributions from the Hand of the Divine Author of Scripture, making human language less inadequate, than it otherwise would be, to give us a clear revelation of what was in the mind of Him Who uttered them.

But it may be said, Pilate's words are not like the words of Christ. How is it that we have different accounts of what Pilate wrote on the cross?

To this question we may reply by a sentence which is never to be forgotten by the reader of the Gospels: "Qui plura dicit, pauciora complectitur; qui pauciora dicit, plura non negat." Perhaps one Evangelist gives the Inscription as it stood in one language; and another as it stood in another. The several accounts are quite consistent with each other, and doubtless the Holy Spirit had good reasons for their varieties³. If the Evangelists had been mere servile copyists, they would have done what any legal clerk or notary might do, and have given us one and the same transcript of the words written by Pilate. They have not done this; and they thus suggest to the candid and humble inquirer, that there may be good reasons for their varieties, in this and other cases; and though he may not be able to discern those reasons, he will not therefore deny that they may exist. Some good reasons, however, he may see; by the very variety of their record, they remind the reader that they are independent witnesses; and thus their agreement is of more weight. And if still there should remain some difficulties, in this and other minor details, they may be of great use; they may serve to prove the limited powers of his own mind, and thus be exercises of his humility, his faith, and hope for a better and happier time, when his faculties will be enlarged, and his vision clarified, and he *will know even as he is known*⁴.

The following remarks on this subject, by *S. Augustine*⁵, may be commended here to the reader's consideration:—

"There are varieties, but not contrarieties, in the Gospels; and by means of these varieties we may learn some very useful and necessary truths. We are thus reminded, that the main thing for us, is to ascertain the meaning, to which the words are ministerial; and we are not to imagine, that the Sacred Writers deceive us, because they do not give us the precise words of Him, Whose meaning they desire to express. Otherwise we shall be like mere miserable catchers at syllables⁶, who imagine that the truth is to be tied to the points of letters; whereas, not in words only, but also in all other symbols of the mind, it is the mind itself which is to be sought for⁷."

It would indeed be very derogatory to the dignity of the sacred writers, to apologize for the varieties in the Gospels;

Those varieties, when carefully examined, will be found to be very instructive; and to have been, doubtless, adopted designedly, to serve beneficial purposes, in confirming our Faith, and guiding our Practice.

Let us consider, as a specimen, the different modes in which the Evangelists represent the call of St. Matthew by Christ. St. Matthew, narrating that event, names himself Matthew; St. Mark and St. Luke call him Levi.

Hence some Expositors have taken occasion to affirm, that Matthew and Levi were two different Matt. iii. 11, and what he says in the same Treatise, de Cons. Evan. ii. 29. Utilis igitur modus, et memoriæ maximè commendandus, cum de convenientiâ dicimus Evangelistarum, non esse mendacium, cum quisque etiam dicens aliquid aliud, quod etiam ille non dixit, de quo aliquid narrat, voluntatem tamen ejus hanc explicat, quam etiam ille, qui ejus verba, commemorat. Ita enim salubriter discimus, nihil aliud esse quærendum, quam quid velit ille qui loquitur.

persons. But others, who have looked more deeply into the matter, have seen that there was a good reason for this variety; and that while the one Evangelist, St. Matthew, by calling himself Matthew, teaches a lesson of humility; the other two Evangelists, St. Mark and St. Luke, by calling him Levi, teach a lesson of charity¹.

Another example may be seen in the various manner, in which the Sermon on the Mount is reported by the two Evangelists, St. Matthew and St. Luke.

St. Matthew wrote for the special benefit of his *Jewish*² fellow-countrymen. He therefore, in his recital of that Sermon, takes care to record what would convey necessary warning and instruction to them. St. Luke wrote for the Heathen World. He omits those portions which specially concerned the Jews, and their Law: and reiterates those admonitions which were requisite for *all*³.

Here, it is true, is variety in form; but there is the essential beauty and unity of Wisdom and of Truth.

Let us cite another instance. St. Matthew, in describing our Lord's visit to Jericho, a little before His Passion, relates that two blind men were healed by Christ. St. Mark mentions only one, and specifies his name—Bartimæus. St. Luke also mentions but one. Some persons have imagined that there is a discrepancy here. But they, who have carefully considered the several narratives, and have reflected on the design with which the Gospels, respectively, were composed, have seen an important purpose served by this variety, and an evidence of the gracious purpose with which all the Gospels were written⁴.

The same may be said with regard to the Evangelical narratives of our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem;

The first Evangelist, St. Matthew, relates, that the disciples brought "the ass and its colt" to Jesus⁵. The other three Evangelists say nothing of the mother; they all mention the foal, and the foal only. Here at first there may seem to be a discrepancy. There is certainly a variety. But, if the difference of design is considered, with which the several Evangelists wrote, the reasons of this variety will appear; and the variety itself will be seen to be in perfect harmony with the general plan of the Gospels⁶.

The various circumstances of the different Evangelists, and the various circumstances of the different classes of persons for whom they wrote, exercised a powerful modifying influence on the language of the several Gospels.

This is a subject which is very fertile in interesting and instructive meditation; and is frequently adverted to in the following pages⁷. The same cause, which produced a variety of diction, led also to a variety in choice of matter, and to a variety of method in handling it: and exhibits an edifying example of thoughtful preparation, and discriminating adaptation, in providing suitable food and medicine for the souls of men, according to their several constitutions and peculiar necessities; and is specially instructive to those, whose office it is to be Pastors of Christ's Flock, and to be Physicians of souls, and to minister food and medicine to every one in due season.

This then may be asserted, in fine, that there are many varieties in the Evangelical narratives, but not a single contradiction; and that these varieties were designed by the One Spirit who inspired the Evangelists; and that they are conducive to the one blessed end, for which all the Gospels were written, the Glory of God in the salvation of Man; and that, if they are examined, not with a cavilling and carping temper, eager to display its own fancied shrewdness and self-satisfied acuteness, in detecting flaws and blemishes in the Word of God, but in a reverential and humble spirit, comparing *spiritual things with spiritual*⁸, and carefully considering the position and circumstances of the several Evangelists; and the purposes for which the several Gospels were written respectively; and the classes of persons for whose especial benefit each Evangelist wrote; and the time and order in which the Gospels were written; it will be readily seen and acknowledged, that these Evangelical varieties have their own proper and important uses; and that they are means and instruments in the divine hand, for our intellectual and spiritual refreshment and edification, and that they are in the world of grace, what the harmonious intertexture of various colours, and the sweet concord of various voices, are in the natural world, ministerial to the comfort and delight of man, and to the praise and glory of the Great Creator of all.

INTRODUCTION

TO

ST. MATTHEW'S GOSPEL.

On the design and date of this Gospel.

1. OUR Blessed Lord said that He was “not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of *Israel*¹,” and He gave charge to His Apostles, that they should “not go into the way of the Gentiles, nor enter into any city of the Samaritans, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of *Israel*².” And although St. Paul was the Apostle of the *Gentiles*³, yet it was his uniform practice to offer the Gospel in the first instance to the *Jews*⁴.

On these grounds it may reasonably be inferred, that the first written Gospel would be designed specially for the Jews; and that the Gospel, which from internal evidence appears to have been designed specially for Jewish use, was the first written.

The Gospel of St. Matthew proclaims itself, by its matter and manner, to have been composed for the benefit of the Jews.

He commences with a Genealogical table, which proves that Jesus Christ was sprung from *Abraham*⁵, the father of the faithful, and from *David the King*⁶, “in whose Seed all nations were to be blessed⁷.”

He relates that Jesus was born at Bethlehem, the City of David, in which the Messiah was to be born according to Hebrew prophecy⁸; that He was born of a Virgin, also according to Hebrew prophecy⁹. And he recites the prophecies, by which these events had been predicted. He shows that our Lord's journey into Egypt¹⁰, and the murder of the Innocents¹¹, and His subsequent abode at Nazareth¹², and the preaching of the Baptist, preparing His way in the wilderness¹³, had all been preannounced in those prophetic Books which the Jews had in their hands, and which they heard “in their Synagogues every Sabbath day¹⁴.” These and numerous other Prophecies, concerning the Messiah's Person and Office, His Actions and Sufferings, are rehearsed in the Gospel of St. Matthew; and many of them are rehearsed in that Gospel alone; and they serve to show that it was St. Matthew's design, to prove that Jesus of Nazareth was He “of whom Moses in the Law and the Prophets did write¹⁵,” the Messiah or Christ, promised in the beginning to Adam¹⁶, and afterwards to Abraham, and to David; Whose Coming was looked for by all¹⁷ faithful Israelites, at the time when Jesus was born.

This distinguishing characteristic of St. Matthew's Gospel points it out as the first written of the four Evangelical histories.

2. We find that this inference is confirmed by the testimony of Christian Antiquity. Thus, for example, S. Irenæus says, “The Gospel of St. Matthew was written for the Jews, who specially desired that it should be shown that the Christ was of the Seed of David; and St. Matthew endeavours to satisfy this desire, and therefore commences his Gospel with the Genealogy of Christ¹⁸.” So *Origen*¹⁹, “St. Matthew wrote for the Hebrews, who expected the Messiah from the seed of Abraham and David.”

And he asserts the priority of this Gospel. “The first of the four Gospels was that written by him who was formerly a publican and afterwards an Apostle, Matthew¹." And so *S. Jerome*², "The Church, which according to the word of Christ is built upon a Rock³, has four Evangelic rivers of Paradise: The first Gospel is that of Matthew the publican, called Levi, who composed his Gospel in the Hebrew tongue for the special use of those Jews who believed in Christ, and no longer followed the shadows of the Law, after the revelation of the substance of the Gospel."

3. Another proof of the priority of St. Matthew's Gospel is suggested by the following consideration. It was evidently of primary importance, in the preaching of Christianity to the Jews, to lay the groundwork of the argument in a clear demonstration, by reference to their own Scriptures, that Jesus of Nazareth was He who had been promised to their fathers as the Christ.

Now, as has been already observed, this work of demonstration has been accomplished with great minuteness by St. Matthew.

We do not find, that the Apostle St. Paul, in his Epistles to the Galatians, Romans, and Hebrews, where he is specially endeavouring to convince the Jews that Jesus is the Christ, ever considers it requisite to dwell on this important argument from Hebrew Prophecy. Nor do the other Evangelists enlarge on the evidence derivable from this source.

How is this to be explained?

Doubtless it was due to the fact, that this important argument had been already exhausted by a preceding writer; and that the other Evangelists and Apostles were fully satisfied that nothing need be added to his labours in this department of Christian Evidence. And who was that previous writer? Where had this argument been handled? The answer is, In the Gospel of St. Matthew.

4. It has been shown by many writers⁴, that the language of St. Matthew's Gospel is adopted in many places by St. Mark and St. Luke; and hence it is evident, that the Greek Gospel of St. Matthew, which we possess, is prior in composition to that of any other Evangelist.

5. There is also a considerable amount of ancient testimony in favour of the opinion, which has been accepted by many critics, that the Gospel of St. Matthew was written by him originally in Hebrew or Syro-Chaldaic, the common language of Palestine in his age.

This is asserted by *Papias*⁵, a Scholar of St. John, and a companion of St. Polycarp; it is affirmed also by *Ireneus*⁶, and probably by *Pantænus*⁷, by *Origen*⁸, by *Eusebius*⁹, and by *S. Jerome*¹⁰, and others¹¹.

This testimony is strong, and there is an à priori probability in its favour.

A Christian Evangelist and Apostle, writing for the special benefit of the Jews living in Palestine, would use every suitable expedient for the purpose of allaying their prejudices, and soothing their jealousies, and conciliating their good will, and disposing them to accept the Gospel.

One of the most efficient methods of accomplishing this wise and charitable purpose, would be to address them in their own vernacular tongue. This is evident from the fact related in the Acts of the Apostles concerning St. Paul, standing on the stairs of the castle above the Temple at Jerusalem. In order to show his own friendly disposition to his Jewish audience, and to gain their favourable attention, he spake to them in Hebrew; and the effect of this address is specially remarked by the Historian, "He spake unto them in the Hebrew tongue, . . . and when they heard that he spake in the Hebrew tongue to them, they kept the more silence¹²."

The same motives that actuated St. Paul speaking to the Jews at Jerusalem, and induced him, though not a Jew of Palestine, but of Tarsus in Asia, to address the Jews at Jerusalem in Hebrew, may be presumed to have had some influence with St. Matthew, a Jew, living in Palestine, and writing for the special benefit,—as is related by credible authorities,—of the Jews of that country; and may have led him to compose his Gospel in his own and their native tongue.

6. Some objections, however, have been made to this testimony of ancient writers.

It has been alleged, that, if St. Matthew had written his Gospel in Hebrew, that Hebrew Original would have been preserved; and would have been frequently cited by early Christian Authors.

Secondly, it is urged, that, if St. Matthew had written originally in Hebrew or Syro-Chaldaic, there would have been no need of a translation of his Gospel into that language; and that consequently, the Authors of the Peschito, or Syriac, Version of the Gospels, would not have translated St. Matthew's Greek Gospel, but have reproduced the Apostolic original in Hebrew.

To the first of these objections it may be replied, that some Ancient Writers, as they themselves affirm, had personally inspected copies of the original Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew. The principal of these witnesses is S. Jerome, who lived in Palestine, and who, among the Fathers, was the most skilled in the Hebrew tongue. He asserts that he himself saw such a document, and had an opportunity of transcribing and translating it¹. Similar evidence is given by Epiphanius, one of the most learned among the Fathers of the Eastern Church².

But, if such an Original ever existed,—how is it, it may be asked, that the ancient notices of it are on the whole so scanty, and that it has now disappeared?

To this inquiry it may be answered, that few of the ancient Christian writers were familiar with the Hebrew language. Their knowledge of the Old Testament was derived, mainly, from the Septuagint or Greek Version. And since a Gospel of St. Matthew existed in the Greek language, with which they were familiar, and which indeed was written and spoken by the Fathers of the Eastern Church, and since that Greek Gospel was confessedly of Divine authority, there is no reason for surprise, that they should not have taken much pains to examine and describe the Hebrew original.

If they made little use of the Hebrew Original of the Old Testament, but accepted the Greek Version, which is not inspired, as their standard, we need not be surprised, that they should not have bestowed much pains on a Hebrew Gospel, when they had a divinely inspired Version of it in Greek.

The Jewish Historian Josephus, as he himself informs us³, wrote his great work, the History of the Jewish Wars, originally in Hebrew, his native tongue, for the benefit of his own nation; and he afterwards translated it into Greek. No notices of the original Hebrew now survive: it has perished: but the Greek Version is often referred to by the early Christian Fathers, and is now extant. The History of the Jewish Historian seems to present a parallel, in these respects, to the Gospel of the Hebrew Evangelist, St. Matthew.

7. Besides, it is affirmed by some early Christian writers, that the Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew was used, and alone adopted of all the Gospels, by certain heretical sections of the ancient Church, the Ebionites⁴, and the Nazarenes; and was mutilated and interpolated by them⁵.

This being the case, the Hebrew copies of St. Matthew's Gospel, being connected with such associations, would probably be regarded by many of the early Christians with distrust; and the Christians would rest content with the Greek Gospel, which they knew to be received by all the Churches of Christendom as the Gospel of St. Matthew.

This consideration supplies also a reply to the objection derived from the translation of the Greek Gospel, by the Authors of the Peschito, or ancient Syriac Version.

The framers of that Version were composing a work which was to be read publicly in the Churches where the Syriac language was used. They would be careful to render their work acceptable to all; and to guard it against all suspicion of heretical blemish or admixture. The Greek Gospel of St. Matthew, and the Greek only, was received as the authentic standard by the Catholic Church throughout the world; the Hebrew was in the hands only of a few, and some of those few, the Ebionites and Nazarenes, were tainted with heresy; and a document associated with them would be liable to the imputation of having been tampered with by them to suit their tenets.

Consequently there existed strong reasons to deter the framers of the Peschito from adopting the Hebrew recension; and equally cogent ones to induce them to ground their Version on the Greek Gospel of St. Matthew, which was received as divinely inspired Scripture by the unanimous voice of Christendom. If these inferences are sound, we have, in the translation made by the Authors of the Peschito from the Greek, an additional attestation to the authentic character of the Greek form, in which the Gospel of Matthew now exists. A similar observation may be made on another very ancient Syriac recension of St. Matthew⁶ recently discovered and published⁷.

⁷ By the Rev. W. Cureton, D.D., Canon of Westminster.

8. We may also hence explain the varieties of ancient testimony concerning the date of St. Matthew's Gospel. Some ancient writers assign the composition and publication of the Gospel to as early a date as six or eight years after the Ascension of Christ¹. Others say fifteen² years. But S. Irenæus affirms that his Gospel was published at the time "when Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome and founding the Church there³." These discrepancies may be reconciled by the supposition that those Authors, who assign an earlier date to its publication, are speaking of the Hebrew Gospel; and they, who speak of a later date, are referring to the Greek edition of it.

However, since the identical Greek words of St. Matthew's Gospel are often found incorporated in the Gospels of the succeeding Evangelists St. Mark and St. Luke, and since the date of St. Mark's and St. Luke's Gospels is probably prior to St. Paul's preaching at Rome⁴, we are thence led to infer, that the Greek edition of the Gospel of St. Matthew was earlier than that date which is assigned to it by Irenæus.

9. Perhaps also such considerations as these may serve to explain certain phenomena in St. Matthew's Greek Gospel. St. Matthew's Gospel is universally acknowledged by Christian Antiquity to have been published before any other of the four Gospels. And yet there are certain incidental expressions in it, which appear to intimate, that, while in its main substance it is prior to all the other Gospels, yet in its present form it has received some later touches from the Author's hand. Such indications as these are found⁵ in the expression in ch. xxvii. 8, "that field was called the field of blood unto this day," and in ch. xxviii. 15, "this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day." These incidental notices may have been added by the Author, when he published his Gospel in its present Greek form.

10. What is known from Holy Scripture of St. Matthew's personal history may be seen in chapter ix. 9, and in the notes on that passage.

In proof of the genuineness of his Gospel it may be observed, that the Author of this Gospel alone adds the epithet τελῶνης, or Publican, to the name of Matthew in the catalogue of the Apostles (x. 3); and that the other Evangelists do not associate his former profession of Publican with his Apostolic name Matthew, but with his other name Levi; and that, whereas he says only, that Matthew, when called by Christ, "arose and followed Him" (ix. 9), it is recorded by St. Luke (v. 28; cp. Mark ii. 14) that "Levi left all and followed Him," and "made Him a great feast in his own house," intimating thereby, that St. Matthew made considerable worldly sacrifices for the sake of Christ. In a like spirit St. Matthew in his Catalogue of the Apostles, places himself after St. Thomas (x. 3); but he is placed before Thomas by St. Mark (iii. 18) and St. Luke (vi. 15).

These are internal evidences confirmatory of the ancient testimony which ascribes the first Gospel to St. Matthew; and they are indications also of the Evangelist's modesty. It has been observed, that the Author faithfully records speeches in which the Publicans are ranked with sinners and heathens (ix. 11; xi. 19; xviii. 17; xxi. 31, 32);—another evidence of his humility; and of his gratitude to Christ for choosing himself, a member of that despised class; and a proof of the Truth of Christianity, which could convert the world by such instruments as the world most despised⁶.

Matthew, the Publican, after his call, "made a great feast" for Jesus in his house; to which he invited "many publicans and sinners," who reclined with Christ at the table⁷, and heard His gracious words, "They that are whole need not a Physician, but they that are sick; for I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance⁸."

Matthew, the Apostle and Evangelist, has indeed made a great feast, a spiritual entertainment, a banquet of the soul, in his Gospel, to which he has invited all Nations; and there Jesus sits at meat; and He calls all the weary to come and recline with Him, and promises them rest for their souls⁹, and remains with them "even unto the end of the world¹⁰;" and there He refreshes the hungry with heavenly food, and makes the thirsty to drink divine wisdom from His lips. May we have grace so to profit by this heavenly repast, that we may hereafter be admitted to sit down at His table in the Kingdom of God¹¹!

³ S. Iren. Hæres. iii. 1. This testimony can hardly be accepted in a literal sense. For St. Paul, as he himself intimates, cannot be said to have founded the Church at Rome. See Rom. i. 7, 8. 13—15, where he says that "their faith is spoken of throughout the whole world," and expresses his regret that he himself had been hindered as yet from coming to them. Perhaps S. Irenæus in speaking of St. Paul as a founder of the Church at Rome may have had a view to what the Apostle did by his Epistle.

Εὐαγγέλιον] Gospel. The word εὐαγγέλιον is used by the LXX for Hebr. תְּשׁוּרָה (besorah), from בָּשָׂר (basar), 'flesh,' as representing some good thing in bodily reality, and so very descriptive of the good tidings of Emmanuel, God manifest in the flesh (1 Tim. iii. 16). Hence S. Ignat. (Phil. 5), προσφυγὼν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ ὡς σαρκὶ Ἰησοῦ. Cf. c. 9. We find the word εὐαγγέλιον applied to the Gospels early in the second century. Justin, Dial. c. κατὰ Ματθαῖον] according to Matthew. On the antiquity of this title see Routh, R. S. i. 405. Euseb. iii. 24 has Ματθαῖος γραφῇ παραδοὺς τὸ κατ' αὐτὸν εὐαγγέλιον. The preposition κατὰ prefixed to the names of the four Evangelists shows that there is one Gospel of living water flowing by four Evangelic streams: as Origen says in Ioan. t. 5, τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων ἐν ἑστὶν εὐαγγέλιον. Cp. Grot. and Hammond here, and Valck. in Luc. init. p. 4, and Meyer, p. 34.

Two uncial MSS. (B and D) have the form Ματθαῖον here, and so Tisch., Alf., Tregelles. But B has also κατὰ Ἰωάννην, which no Editor has ventured to adopt in St. John's Gospel; and the preponderance of MS. authority is in favour of Ματθαῖον. CH. βίβλος γενέσεως = תְּשׁוּרָה סֵפֶר (sepher toledoth), a genealogical roll, Gen. ii. 4, where the LXX has βίβλος γενέσεως: it was a 'formula solennis,' hence the absence of the article. סֵפֶר (sepher = βίβλος) is used for a letter, 1 Kings xxi. 8; for a deed of sale, Jerem. xxxii. 11; for a writing of divorce, Deut. xxiv. 1. ON THE GENEALOGIES.—On this Genealogy in St. Matthew it may be observed,

That in St. Matthew's age public tables of Jewish Genealogies existed, and were carefully preserved. (Lightfoot.)

That in all probability the Genealogy inserted here was transcribed thence.

VOL. I.

That St. Matthew cannot have introduced at the beginning of his Gospel a document which could be refuted from those tables.

That our Lord was often addressed as Son of David (Matt. ix. 27; xv. 22), and that the Jews, in all their cavils against Him, never denied that He was the Son of David. (Cp. Matt. xx. 30; xxi. 9. 15. John i. 45.)

That St. Matthew wrote for the Jews, and before St. Luke.

The first thing to be proved to the Jews was that Jesus was King of the Jews; and to show this, St. Matthew would refer to public genealogies of the royal race. It seems, therefore, most probable, that the genealogical table inserted by the first Evangelist would be the official pedigree of Christ. And this corresponds with what we find in St. Matthew's Genealogy.

The principle on which it is constructed, is not one of direct personal descent by natural generation, but of royal succession from David to Jechonias; that is, during the whole period of the Jewish Monarchy to the Captivity; it is a table of Kings. This statement is not contravened by St. Matthew's use of the word ἐγέννησε. This word ἐγέννησε, like its equivalent Hebrew יָלַד (yaladh), is not limited to natural procreation, but has a far wider signification, and so ἐγέννησε in the LXX (see Mintert in v.), and describes not only natural generation, but adoption, or other succession (cp. Hammond, p. 6). Hence in St. Matthew's list we find, v. 11, Josiah ἐγέννησε Jechoniah, and v. 12, Jechoniah (cp. Jer. xxii. 28. 30; xxiii. 5, 6) ἐγέννησε Salathiel. And St. Matthew in v. 16 and in v. 20, applies this word to generation by the Holy Ghost. This has been clearly shown by many, e. g. Dr. W. H. Mill, p. 173, and by Lord Arthur Hervey in his Volume on the Genealogies, pp. 51—61.

The names inserted after Jechoniah are the names of those who would have reigned, if the Monarchy had continued, and who were Kings of the Jews de jure, though not de facto.

Why then, it may be asked, was another Genealogy added by St. Luke? (iii. 23—38.) Because it would be satisfactory to know that the Son of Mary descended by her husband in a direct personal lineage from David. This is what appears to be shown in the Genealogy given by St. Luke, who wrote with St. Matthew's Genealogy before him; and so Jesus is proved both by public right and by personal lineage, to be, by his mother's husband, the Son of David. See further, note on i. 12.

According to their grammatical construction, both the Genealogies (i. e. that in St. Luke iii. 23—38, as well as that in St. Matthew) appear to be Genealogies of Joseph; and if they were not designed to be his, the Evangelists would never have so presented them to the reader that he could hardly fail to mistake them for his.

The Manichæans objected to St. Matthew's Genealogy, that it did not prove Jesus to be the Son of David; because it is traced from Joseph, who was not the natural father of Jesus. The same objection had been made by Celsus and Julian. (Origen, c. Cels. ii. Cyril, c. Julian. viii.) Now how did the Ancient Fathers answer this objection? Not by saying that Jesus was proved to be the Son of David by his mother's side, by the Genealogy of St. Luke; which they certainly would have done, if St. Luke's Genealogy had been the Genealogy of Mary. Besides, it is probable, that not Heli, but Joakim was the father of Mary. See Epiphan. Hær. 78, and Routh, R. S. ii. 356.

Indeed, the opinion that St. Luke's Genealogy is that of Mary, was unknown to Christian Antiquity. It was first propounded in the 15th century by some Romanist Divines, to do honour (as they thought) to the Blessed Virgin; and was thence, singular to say, adopted from them by some Protestant Theologians. Cp. Mill, p. 183. Patrit. ii. p. 84—87, who observes that "not one of the Fathers ever supposed that Mary's genealogy was traced by St. Luke: and that the first person who broached that notion was Annus of Viterbo, who died A.D. 1502." Maldonatus and some writers in our own day ascribe that opinion to Augustine, but erroneously.

Christian Antiquity was agreed,—

That both the Genealogies are Genealogies of our Lord by Joseph the husband of Mary.

That Joseph was the son of Jacob or of Heli, either by adoption (see Aug. Qu. Ev. ii. 5, de Cons. Ev. ii. 2 and 3, and Serm. 51, "De concordia Evangelistarum in generationibus Domini"); or Because Jacob and Heli were either whole brothers (see i. 15), or half brothers, and because on the death of one of the two brothers without issue, the surviving brother married his widow (cp. xxii. 24), who became the mother of Joseph by this second marriage, and so he was called the Son of Jacob, and the Son of Heli. Ambrose* in Luc. iii. regards Heli (not Jacob) as the natural father of Joseph; and Jacob as the legal parent.) This opinion may be represented thus:—

MATTHAN ex familiâ Salomonis ortus genuit	Estha Matthani mox Melchi uxor,	MELCHI ex familiâ Nathanicâ, qui ex Esthâ Matthani viduâ procreavit
JACOB, qui uxore ductâ viduâ Heli fratris sui uterini verus pater factus est	Mulier ἀνάνυμος.	HELI, qui obiit sine prole, sed per fratrem uterinum, Jacobum, pater legalis factus est
JOSEPHI.		JOSEPHI.

The Genealogy of St. Matthew is Christ's official succession to David as a King (see v. 6, where David is twice called ὁ βασιλεὺς). That of St. Luke is the derivation of His origin from David as a man. And this His human and personal, and direct derivation from David, and also from Abraham, harmonizes with St. Luke's plan in tracing our Lord's pedigree further backward, even to the first man, Adam, the father of the human race. And so St. Luke suggests the reflection, that He who is the promised Seed, the Son of David, the King of the Jews, is also the Second Adam, the Saviour and Restorer of the whole family of man.

Enough is stated in Holy Scripture to show that Mary, as well as Joseph, was of the House of David. (See on 2 Tim. ii. 8, and in the next column of the present note.) But it was no part of the Divine plan to bring forth the Blessed Virgin from her retirement. She was ha-almah, the Virgin,—an example of all Virgins,—and, as her name Almah intimates, secluded from public view.

It is most in harmony with this plan, to suppose,—as the grammatical construction of the Genealogies constrains us,—that neither of these pedigrees are hers, except so far as, by the ties of a common origin and by the bond of Holy Matrimony, she was Joseph's, and what was his was hers, and what was hers was his; and that, consequently, as Christ, her true Son according to the flesh, owed and paid filial obedience to him who was united by holy Matrimony to His mother; so what belonged by royal and personal heritage, to His mother's husband, was due to Him who was her firstborn and only Son. Hence the Angel calls Mary Joseph's wife (i. 20), and the Holy Spirit does not scruple to say οἱ γοεῖς (Luke ii. 27. 41), nor to record Mary's words ὁ πατήρ σου, Luke ii. 48. Hence Aug. (Serm. li. 16), in reply to those who made objections to the genealogies "quia 'per Joseph,' et non per Mariam, numerantur. 'Non,' inquit, 'per Joseph debuit.' Quare non? Numquid non erat maritus Mariæ? Scriptura enim dicit 'Noli timere accipere Mariam conjugem tuam: quod enim in illâ natum est de Spiritu Sancto est.' Et tamen paterna ei non aufertur auctoritas, cum jubetur puero nomen imponere; denique et ipsa Virgo Maria, benè sibi conscia quod non ex ejus complexu et concubitu conceperit Christum, tamen eum patrem Christi dicit." This has been well stated by Grotius and by other Expositors as follows;

"Non aliena à Christo existimanda est origo Josephi, cum natus sit Christus ex eâ quam Josephus in matrimonio retinuerit (Grotius). Nam si ea vis est Legis, ut partus viduæ ex agnato defuncti viri conceptus in omne sui defuncti succedat, non aliter quàm si ex ipsius geniturâ ortum traxisset (Grot. and Spalatensis) et proles à fratre genita, semen vocatur, non illius per quem suscepta est, sed illius cui suscepta est, nempe fratris sine liberis defuncti, vide Gen. xxxviii. 9. (Spalat.) quidni id quod sine humanâ operâ ex legitimâ filius conjugis natum est, quasi ipsius solo divinitus insitum, ipsius proprium censeatur? Atque hinc est, nimirum, quod non tantum ab Evangelii scriptoribus Josephus pater Christi (Luke ii. 27. 33. 41. 48), nuptiis videlicet patrem demonstrantibus, nominatur; sed et Christus omnia obsequia atque operas illi præstitit quæ expectari possunt à filio in sacris paternis constituto. Quod si ubique gentium adoptivi liberi ex ejus gentis, cui velut insiti sunt, nobilitate censentur, quantò justius omnia jura gentilitia Josephi, ac promissiones Divinæ ipsius Majoribus factæ, ad Dominum Jesum pertinebant?" (Grot.)

"Josephi legitimus hæres Jesus fuit quippe filius ejus, non quidem naturalis nec tantum putativus neque adoptivus, sed reipsâ proprius ac legitimus, ipsi legitimè natus ex uxore, quæ ipsi legitimo matrimonio juncta est, ideòque una erat cum Josepho caro, Deo legitimè operante, qui nihil non legitimè operatur, cujus libero dominio non subtrahit uxorem mariti auctoritas. Cum autem succedat jure Gentium in paternam hæreditatem is qui solius publicæ famæ testimonio filius habetur, quantò magis filius legitimus? Quocirca à Josephi morte Christus erat Regni Davidici hæres. Quod cum Matthæus demonstrare vellet, fuit ei Josephi Genealogia condenda, non nuda Mariæ, quæ, viris relictis, hæres esse Regni non potuit." (Lucas Brugensis.)

We know, from the testimony of St. Matthew and St. Luke, that Christ was born of her, and that she was a virgin, and that He was of the seed of David according to the flesh (Gal. iii. 8, 9. Rom. i. 3. 2 Tim. ii. 8), and yet born of a Virgin; and that therefore Mary His mother was of the lineage of David. This may also be presumed from the fact in Luke i. 27. 32; ii. 5, that Mary, though ἄγκυος, goes up to Bethlehem to be registered. Greg. Thaumaturg. (early in the third century) says, p. 25, ἡ ἀρχὴ παρθένος ἐκ γένους Δαβὶδ ἐτόνυχε καὶ τὴν Βηθλεὲμ πατρίδα ἐκέκτητο κατὰ τὴν Ἰωσήφ κατὰ νόμους (as an ἐπίκληρος, Numb. xxxvi. 6. 8. Ruth iii. 12) ἐμεμήστευτο. Cp. Athanas. c. Apollinar. p. 738. Leo M. Serm. xxix. p. 87, "electa Virgo de semine Abrahæ et radice Jesse." Cp. Routh, R. S. i. 354—356. Hence S. Jerome says, "It may be asked why the genealogy of Christ is traced through Joseph? We reply, that it is not usual to trace genealogies from women; and that Joseph and Mary were of the same tribe and house." See also the statement of Hegesippus in Routh, R. S. p. 213. Euseb. iii. 32, concerning the δεσπόδωνοι, and see other testimonies and arguments that Joseph and Mary were of the same lineage, in Patrit. ii. 15—17. 48. But, as far as Mary is concerned individually, Christ, like His great prototype Melchizedek, is ἀγενεαλόγητος (Heb. vii. 3) in Holy Writ.

God's ways are not man's ways. Man would have expected a genealogy of Mary. And if the Gospel had been dictated by men, such a genealogy would assuredly have been given. But the Gospel is not of man; and, perhaps, by beginning the Gospel in a different way from what man would have done, He designs to teach the reader of the Gospels a necessary lesson, that à priori reasonings are of no account whatever, in regard to Divine Revelations; and that when it has once been proved by logical deduction, that the Gospel is of God, Reason should make way for Faith, and should wait patiently for the time when Faith will be perfected in fruition, and Reason will rejoice in that perfection, for Faith is Reason in Glory.

Hence, then, an argument may be derived for the Inspiration of the Evangelists. The eagerness with which some in modern times have endeavoured to wrest aside the words of the Gospel, in order to make one of the Genealogies to be the Genealogy of Mary, and the questions more modestly, but yet anxiously, put by the ancient Fathers,—Why it pleased God to trace the Genealogy of Christ through Joseph alone, at the same time that He revealed the fact that Joseph was not the natural father of Christ, afford proofs that if men had been the framers of the Genealogies, they would either have deduced our Lord's human origin through Mary, or, if at all by Joseph, not by Joseph alone.

One of the most full and elaborate dissertations that have been published in modern times on the Genealogies, will be found in Patritius de Evang. ii. p. 35—105.

His conclusions are as follows: p. 105:—

It appears from Holy Scripture and the Fathers that Mary and Joseph were of the same lineage, and it is probable that their marriage was jure agnationis, i. e. she was married to him, according to the Law, as her nearest of kin.

That almost all his ancestors were hers (p. 103).

That both the Genealogies are traced through Joseph, and are rightly called Genealogies of Christ.

See also Dr. Mill, ii. 102—215, and Rev. Lord Arthur Hervey on the Genealogies, 1853. Williams on the Nativity, p. 103—120. Burgon, p. 8—13.

3. Θάμαρ. 5. Ῥαχάβ—Ῥούθ] Thamar, Rahab, Ruth. “Why,” says Chrysostom, “having begun the genealogy with men, does he make any mention of women? and why, if he names women, does he pass by the most illustrious, such as Sarah and Rebekah, and enumerate some famous for ill? One of these was born of unlawful wedlock, another a harlot, and the third was a stranger; and he introduces also the wife of Uriah.” “This was so designed,” says Jerome, “in order that He who had come for the sake of sinners might, being born of sinners, blot out the sins of all, and because He came not now as a Judge, but as a Physician, to heal our diseases.” And Jerome (in Jovinian, p. 165) suggests another reason; viz. that these women were types of the Heathen world, recovered from sin and misery, and espoused as a Church to Christ.

As Chrysostom says, “God married our nature, which was in poverty, and misery, and exile, and estranged from Him, and had committed harlotry against Him. Such was the Church; but she left her Father’s house (Ps. xlv. 10), was espoused to Christ, and became the mother of princes.”

Perhaps, also, in this mention of Thamar, Rahab, and Ruth, in our Lord’s Genealogy, we may see an evangelical protest, by anticipation, against the novel dogma of the original and actual sinlessness of Mary, grounded by some on the plea that He Who was without sin could only be born of one who was sinless. See on Luke i. 27.

That Rahab here mentioned was the Rahab of Jericho, see Mill, p. 132—138. Patrit. ii. 49—51. As Bengel observes, this may be presumed from the article τῆς Ῥ.

The mention of Rahab shows that the Evangelists had access to materials that we have not, for it is no where said in the Old Testament that Rahab was mother of Boaz. The same remark may be applied to Cainan in Luke iii. 36.

5. Ὠβὴδ] Some editors have Ἰωβὴδ, on good MSS. authority: but the reading of the LXX is not lightly to be abandoned. Besides Ἰωβὴδ is inconsistent with the Hebrew etymon יבד, and seems to have arisen from a supposed connexion with Ἰάβ. See below, v. 10, where Ἀμὼς, for Ἀμὼν (ימון), seems to be due to a similar confusion with Ἀμὼς, the name of the Prophet, and of Isaiah’s father.

6. Δαυὶδ τὸν βασιλέα] David the King. The repetition of these words is a clue to the design of this Genealogy, showing the Royalty of Christ, Messiah the King.

and some MSS. Cp. xii. 42. Luke xi. 31. John x. 23. Acts iii. 11. v. 12, see Winer, p. 63.

8. Ἰωράμ δέ] The Evangelist omits three names here, Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah, 2 Kings viii. 25. 1 Chron. iii. 11. 2 Chron. xxii. 1; xxiv. 27 (Jerome), because the race of Jehoram was mingled with the seed of Jezebel, 2 Kings viii. 16, 26, therefore its memory is blotted out from the Genealogy of Christ, even to the third generation. Three generations were omitted intentionally, and thus there became fourteen generations. (Hilary.) Cp. Surenhus, p. 126, who shows that it was not unusual for the Hebrews to omit names designedly (see above, v. 3) in their genealogies, as in Ezra, cap. vi., compared with 1 Chron. i. 3—15, five generations are omitted. See also Lightfoot.

—Ὀζιαν] Uzziah, called also Azariah (help of God), 2 Kings xiv. 21. 1 Chron. iii. 12, for God had mercy on him, and did not destroy him when he profaned the sanctuary, 2 Chron. xxvi. 21. Surenhus, p. 126.

11. Ἰωσίας δέ ἐ. τ. Ἰεχονίαν καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς αὐτοῦ] Porphyry hence derived an objection (see Jerome). For Jechoniah, the father of Salathiel, was not the same as Jechoniah the son of Josiah; but was the grandson of Josiah by Joakim or Jeconiah. Cp. 1 Chron. iii. 15. 2 Kings xxiii. 34; xxiv. 6. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 8.

To this S. Jerome replies, that under the same word Jechoniah two different persons are to be understood; and thus the fourteen generations are complete. This is to be explained thus. Josiah had four sons, Johanan, Eliakim (or Jeconiah), Zedekiah = Mattaniah, Joahaz = Shallum. The Jechoniah first mentioned by the Evangelist is the same as Eliakim or Joakim, who was the father of Joachin, or Jechoniah (or Jeconiah) the second mentioned by the Evangelist. It is observable, in confirmation of this view, that יְחִיָּה (Jechoniah), the grandson of Josiah, is called also Ἰωάχιμος by Josephus, Antt. x. 8, and by some MSS. of the LXX, in 2 Kings, xxiv. 6 (see Rosenmüller), as well as by the name Ἰεχονίας. Cp. other authorities in Mill, p. 108, and Hervey, p. 70—72.

The second tessarodecad begins with David and ends with Jechoniah = Joakim. The third begins with Jechoniah, and ends with Christ (Jerome in Daniel i.).

S. Augustine supposes that the same Jechoniah is reckoned twice—“in figuram Christi à Judæis ad gentes transeuntis;” and as a “lapis angularis.” Serm. li. 15. De Cons. Ev. ii. 4.

—ἐπὶ τῆς μετοικεσίας] ἐπὶ (see Mark ii. 26): in the time of the transmigration, which began under Joakim, 2 Kings xxiv. 7. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, was repeated at several times, Jer. lii. 28—30. He does not call it αἰχμαλωσίας or captivity: for

That was not effected then;

Though the city was destroyed, yet the family of David, to which the promise was given, was only removed;

And though Salathiel was born after the migration, yet not after the seventy years’ captivity.

—Βαβυλῶνος] On this use of the genitive, see x. 5. Winer, G. G. p. 169.

12. ἐγέννησε] begat, by adoption, or other legal assumption (see p. 1): not by natural procreation; for Jeconiah had no natural successor in the royal line (Jer. xxii. 30), but the regal line of Solomon terminated with him (cp. S. Basil, iii. p. 362, and Bengel here), and the royal inheritance passed into another channel, derived through Nathan from David, to whom it was divinely promised that there should be no failure of royal progeny, 2 Sam. vii. 8—16. 1 Chron. xvii. 7—15. Ps. lxxix. 3. 35; cxxii. 12, but no such promise of perpetuity was made to Solomon. Salathiel, or Shealtiel (Ezra iii. 2. 8; v. 2), who followed Jechoniah, was son of Neri (Luke iii. 27).

The following is from Grotius. "Mihi certissimum est, à Matthæo spectari Juris successionem.

"Nam eos qui Regnum obtinuerunt, quod erat τῶν πρωτογόνων, privato nemine admittito, recenset.

"Cum Salathieli (nam cur diversos Salathieles putemus non video) Neri parentem adscribit Lucas, privatum hominem, Matthæus autem Jechoniam, apertissimum est, à Luca jus sanguinis, à Matthæo jus successionis et præcipuè jus ad Regiam dignitatem, spectatum; quod jus, sine liberis mortuo Jechonia, et si qui alii erant à Salomonis posteris, ad Salathielem, caput familiæ Nathanis, legitimo ordine devolutum est; nam inter Davidis filios Salomonem Nathan sequebatur.

"Lucæ numerus plenior est, quàm Matthæi. Matthæus non numerari à se personas, sed generis summam breviter indicare in τεσσαρεσκαίδεκάδας tres memoriæ causâ digestam satis apertè profitetur. Nam et inter Joramum Regem et Oziam, qui Azarias, Achaziam, Joam, Amaziam, silentio transmittit, nempe ut ordini ad memoriæ facilitatem instituto consulat: quod in Juris successionis demonstranda parum refert. Nam, ut dici solet, hæres hæredis mei hæres meus est. At qui naturalem seriem sequi velit, quod facit Lucas (eam enim ob causam, à Davide ad Salathielem usque, privatæ fortunæ homines memorat, ne ab eo ordine discedat) eum decet de gradu ad gradum, quâ sanguis ducit, progredi, quod eum fecisse non dubitamus. At si quis tempora rectè putet à Zorobabele ad Christum, videbit secundum id quod plerumque accidit, totum id tempus personis ab illo recitatis rectè expleri. Quare hinc quoque discimus à Matthæo τὸ νομικόν, à Luca τὸ φυσικόν spectari."

— Ζοροβάβελ] Zorobabel, i.e. the royal seed זְרָא (zera) at Babylon (Chrys.); and the prince, or head and leader, of the Jews on their return from captivity (Hagg. i. 1. 12; ii. 2. Ezra ii. 2; iii. 2. 8; v. 2. Neh. xii. 1), and so was a remarkable type of CHRIST. (Mill, p. 158.)

From Zorobabel the family of David starts, as it were, afresh; it branches out into two lines by the two sons of Zorobabel, Abiud (in St. Matt. i. 13), and Rhesa (in St. Luke iii. 27). Zorobabel, here (and in Luke iii. 27, and in Ezra, Nehemiah, and Haggai) called the son of Salathiel, is called the son of Pedaiah in 1 Chron. iii. 19, probably by a levirate marriage. Cp. Mill, 138, 139.

13. Ἀβιούδ] Perhaps Hodaiah (1 Chron. iii. 24). See further on Luke iii. 27.

15. Ματθάν] Perhaps the same as the Ματθάρ in St. Luke iii. 24, whose name is written Ματθάν in some MSS. and by some of the Fathers, Aug. qu. 46, in Deut., Greg. Naz., and Epiphani. See the authorities quoted in Mill, p. 77. 189—192. Hervey, 129, 130. Patrit. ii. p. 80. 82.

We now see another reason why the Genealogy of St. Luke was added to that of St. Matthew.

It was necessary to show that Joseph was the son of David. St. Matthew traces David's line through Solomon.

But that line ended in Jechoniah, in the captivity.

And yet we see that Jechoniah has a successor assigned him by St. Matthew, viz. Salathiel.

Now how does it appear that Salathiel so adopted was of David's line?

From the Genealogy of St. Luke, who traces him from David, through David's son Nathan.

The two Genealogies coalesce for two generations, i.e. in Salathiel and in his son ZOROBABEL. But then they diverge again in two lines by Zorobabel's two sons Abiud and Rhesa.

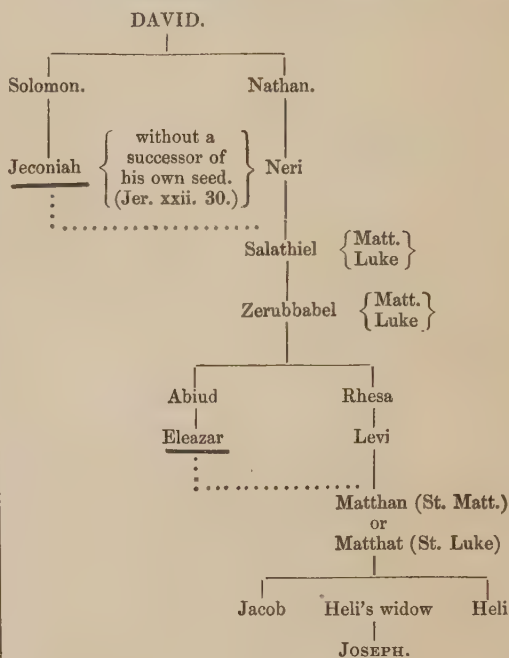

Now it may be, that as David's line by Solomon failed in Jechoniah, and was to be supplied from David's line by Nathan given by St. Luke; so perhaps Zorobabel's line through Abiud (which St. Matthew gives) may have failed likewise, and was to be supplied by Zorobabel's line through Rhesa given by St. Luke.

There seems to be some intimation of such a failure. As David's two lines coalesce in Salathiel, just above Zoro-babel, so Zorobabel's two lines seem to coalesce in Matthan or Matthat (see note on v. 15), just above Jacob, the grandfather of Joseph.

Or suppose that Matthan and Matthat are not identical. There are two lines from Zorobabel. And it might have been alleged that Joseph was not sole heir of Zorobabel and David, if it had not been shown, as it is shown by the Genealogy of St. Luke, added to that of St. Matthew, that both lines terminate in Joseph.

The following diagram will illustrate what has now been said.

16. Ἰακῶβ δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰωσήφ] Jacob begat Joseph, who is therefore called by the angel 'Son of David,' vñs Δαυὶδ, i. 20. Cp. Luke i. 27. By virtue of his marriage with Mary, Joseph is called by the Holy Spirit the husband of Mary (i. 16. 19), and she is called his wife (i. 20), and the husband is head of the wife (Ephes. v. 23), and therefore he had a jus paternum over her offspring; and God authorized this by giving to Joseph the paternal office of imposing the name on her Son (i. 21). Cp. Luke ii. 41. 43.

Consequently, her firstborn and only Son had an hereditary claim to Joseph's privileges, whatever they were, by virtue of Joseph's descent from 'David the King,' and therefore the angel says (Luke i. 32), God shall give him the throne of his father David. (Cp. Aug. Sermon. 51.) We nowhere read that Joseph had any children by natural generation, or that the Blessed Virgin was more than once a mother; therefore the direct line of David's race seems to have been ended in Christ. Cp. Olshausen on Luke iv. 22.

There is an ancient tradition that Joseph had the cognomen of Panther, and the same name is assigned by some to Jacob his father. Epiphanius, 78, hæc. § 7. Cp. Mill, p. 189. Patrit. p. 101.

Damascene (de Fid. Orth. iv. 14) says that Melchi and Panther were brothers; that Panther was the father of Barpanther; and Barpanther the father of Joakim, the father of Mary.

Celsus (ap. Origen. i. 32) "Jesum Pantheræ patrem ortum aiebat."

Epiphanius. (hæc. 66; al. 78) says, and so the Talmud (Patrit. 101), that Joseph and Cleophas (Alphæus) were brothers; by the same father, Panther. Cp. Euseb. iii. 11.

17. Πᾶσαι αἱ γενεαὶ — δεκατέσσαρες] Observe αἱ —. Not all generations, but all the generations recited by the Evangelist. (See Winer, G. G. 101.)

δεκατέσσαρες, fourteen = twice seven; a number, in Scripture, symbolizing completeness. The sixth seventh brings us to Christ.

It is observable, that the number fourteen may be expressed in Hebrew by letters which make the word David, דוד. (Surenhus. p. 143.)

The three fourteens, or six sevens of this Genealogy = forty-two, a number which had been already distinguished in Holy Writ as the number of Mansions or Stations by which the People of God came to the Land of Promise. "So," says S. Jerome, "by forty-two generations the seed of the faithful is brought to Christ." On the number forty-two, often signifying in Scripture a time of trial leading to rest, see on Rev. xi. 2, 3; xii. 14; xiii. 5.

18. Τοῦ δέ] See Irenæus, iii. 16.

— ἡ γένεσις] the origin, not simply birth; and therefore this reading (γένεσις), authorized by B, C, P, S, Z, Δ, and received by most modern editors, seems preferable to that of Elz. γέννησις.

— οὕτως ἦν] was thus, i. e. as follows.

— μνηστευθείσης] being espoused. Why was our Lord conceived of a Virgin espoused?

That the lineage of Mary might be shown through the Genealogy of Joseph.

That she might not be stoned as an adulteress.

That in her flight to Egypt she might have a protector and comforter.

The martyr Ignatius, the disciple of St. John (ad Ephes. 19) adds another reason, that his birth might be concealed from the devil. (Origen, Hom. 6, in Luc., and S. Jerome.) Compare also the words of Chrys. God concealed from the Jews at first that Jesus was born of a Virgin. He kept the mystery as it were in shade for a time, as He did other mysteries, which He revealed more fully by degrees. If after our Lord had wrought so many miracles as He did they were loth to believe that He was born of a Virgin, it is not probable that they would have received this truth before those miracles were wrought. Even Joseph, a just and good man, required the evidence of an angel to "convince him" (and his conviction, and his consequent reception of the Virgin as his wife, is the strongest assurance that could be given us for our conviction). "Hence the Apostles in their preaching did not begin with proclaiming our Lord's birth from a Virgin; and the Virgin herself kept it in reserve for a time; she said even to her Son, 'Thy Father and I have sought thee, sorrowing.'" (Luke ii. 48.) (Chrys.) S. Ambrose adds (in Luc. 1), "Maluit Dominus quosdam de sua generatione, quam de matris pudore, dubitare." Cp. below on Luke i. 27.

— εὗρεθῇ] she was found. ἐφάνη (Euthym.). The Angel and the Evangelist state the fact, but not how it was done. We know not how He who is infinite was in the womb, how He who comprehends all things was conceived by a woman. Do not inquire how such things were done, but receive what is revealed, and do not repine for what is hidden. (Chrys.) A salutary caution is given by Greg. Naz. (Orat. xx. p. 382): ἀκούεις γέννησιν τὸ πῶς μὴ περιεργάζου—εἰ δὲ πολυπραγμονεῖς, κἀγὼ σοι πολυπραγμονῶ τὸ κράμα ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος. "On the Incarnation of our Lord," see Barrow, Sermons xxiii. and xxiv.

19. δίκαιος] just, good. "Sæpe in N. T. ubi aliquis δίκαιος dicitur, plures omnino virtutes comprehendi solent." Vorst, de Hebr. p. 56. Cp. Luke i. 6; ii. 25. Acts x. 22.

— παραδειγματίσαι] to expose her to shame. This reading is adopted in C, E, K, L, M, P, S, U, V, Δ. Some editors have authorized δειγματίσαι from B, Z.

— ἐβουλήθη] was minded. On the distinction between βούλομαι and θέλω, see on 2 Cor. i. 17. Philemon 13.

20. ἰδοὺ] lo! הִנֵּה (hinneh), a Hebrew formula introducing the history of some remarkable event; very frequent in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and in the Acts; not so common in St. John's Gospel, but very frequent in the Apocalypse; rare in St. Paul's Epistles.

— ὄναρ] No communications by dreams are mentioned in the N. T. except those to Joseph at the beginning of the Gospel, ii. 13. 19. 22, and to the Magi, ii. 12, and to Pilate's wife, a Gentile, xxvii. 19 (cp. Bengel on Acts xvi. 9).

— υἱὸς Δαυὶδ] son of David. See v. 17. "Recognosce quod promissum est domui David (Isa. vii. 13, 14) de qua tu es et Maria, et vide impletum in eâ." (Gloss. Ord.)

21. καλέσεις τὸ ὄνομα—ἁμαρτιῶν] thou shalt call his name. See below, v. 25 and v. 16, and on the sense of καλεῖν τὸ ὄνομα see Vorst, de Hebr. p. 349. The meaning is, Thou shalt give Him this name, and He shall be in act what His Name, Ἰησοῦς, or Saviour, signifies; αὐτὸς γὰρ, for He, Ipse, by Himself, and no other, shall save His people, not (as many will suppose) from their temporal enemies the Romans, but from their deadly foes, their own sins. Cp. Aug. de Cons. Ev. ii. 2.

On the typical relation between Jesus or Joshua the son of Nun and Jesus the son of Mary, see Cyriil Hierosol. Catech. x. § 11, p. 142, and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii. and below on x. 2.

— αὐτός] "Casu recto, semper habet emphasis—hic maximam." (Bengel.) [ipse, solus, nemo alius." Cp. 1 Pet. ii. 24, and see on Matt. iii. 12. Luke i. 17. Winer, G. G. p. 136.

22. γέγονεν] has been done.

— ἵνα πληρωθῇ] That it might receive its full and final accomplishment; intimating that though other previous results may have emerged from the prophecy, they were only partial, prelusive, and preparatory to this fulfilment, which was the aim and end of the prophecy. The ἵνα is not therefore ἐκβατικόν, but preserves its true sense as αἰτιατικόν. Cp. Bengel here, and see Lee on Inspiration, pp. 105, 328.

The emphatic word in this formula is ΠΛΗΡΩΘΗ, intimating that now the Prophecy, which had been gradually mounting to this point, had attained its zenith, or culminating point. Or, to use another figure; the Ancient Prophecies concerning the Messiah are like beautiful vessels, which received a partial infusion, from time to time, in certain preparatory events, which kept up the memory of them, and refreshed the hope and faith of the believer, in the coming Deliverer, till they were all filled up to the brim, and ran over in Christ, who is the fulness of all in all. See further below, ii. 17. 23.

In strictness of language, an action is already done in the counsels of God before He utters a prophecy that it will be done. "Non res sunt propter prophetias, sed prophetiæ propter res." (Luc. Brug.) But prophecies are God's promises to man. God is here speaking to men. And He says that such an event happened in order that a prophecy, which concerned Christ, might be fulfilled visibly to us, and so we might believe that Jesus is the Christ.

On the consistency of this with Human Freewill, see on Acts iv. 28, and cp. Spanheim, Dub. Evang. 33.

— διὰ τοῦ προφήτου] by means of the prophet. Observe how the Jewish Publican St. Matthew proves to the Jews, for whom his Gospel was specially designed, that Jesus of Nazareth is He of whom their Hebrew prophets did write, as the Christ;

(1) as to the person of His Mother and as to His Birth from a Virgin (i. 23).

(2) as to the place of His Birth, Bethlehem (ii. 6).

(3) as to His sojourn in Egypt (ii. 15).

(4) as to the place of His education, Nazareth, see on ii. 23 and Luke ii. 5.

(5) as to His Forerunner, John the Baptist (iii. 3).

(6) as to the place of His preaching and Ministry, Galilee (iv. 15, 16).

23. ἡ παρθένος] the Virgin. So the LXX, a conclusive argument against all Jewish objections to St. Matthew's translation of this text, Isa. vii. 14. For the LXX version was made by Jews, and was read in their Synagogues (Tertullian, Apol. 18. Cp. Grinfield, Scholia Hellenist. p. viii—x). Cp. Justin M. c. Tryph. § 67. Iren. iii. 21, Euseb. v. 8, who relate that the word rendered the Virgin by St. Matthew was falsely translated a young woman by the two Jewish Proselytes Theodotion and Aquila.

Besides the word ἡ ἀλμαῖ (ha-almah)—from root ἄλμ (alam) 'to hide,' 'to keep at home,' as Eastern virgins were kept, and therefore rendered ἀπόκρυφος by Aquila—is well translated ἡ παρθένος, which is more descriptive of the Blessed Virgin than Betulah would have been, for it denotes youth, as well as virginity. See Jerome on Isa. vii. vol. iii. p. 70. Surenhus. p. 152. Spanheim, Dub. Ev. 34. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii. pp. 323—325.

For the New Test. Quotations of the Old Test. in relation to the Septuagint Version, see Grinfield, ed. Hellen. p. 4, and Citata et Parallele, p. 1447.

The article ἡ, Hebr. הַ, the Virgin, is to be observed, "mag-nam habet emphasim, Virgo per excellentiam dicta." (Valck. p. 19.) "Insignis illa Virgo cujus Filius erat contritus semen serpentis." (Glass. Phil. p. 319.) "Singularis illa Virgo." (Cp. Aug. Serm. 191.)

The Virgin.—The Prophet Isaiah, speaking in the spirit, had a vision of the Virgin as present, who would conceive and bear a Son, Emmanuel, God with us. He sees before him the Messiah; a most satisfactory proof to the House of David, then menaced by enemies, that it would not be destroyed; whereof, also, the Prophet gave assurance by bringing with him his own son, whose name Shear-jashub (vii. 3), though it spake of captivity,—which was to come to Judah from that very power, Assyria, to which the faithless king of the house of David, Ahaz, now looked for help instead of to God,—yet spoke also of return from captivity, "a remnant shall return."

See Theodoret and Chrys. in Isa. vii. Athanas. de Incarn. pp. 33. 60. Jerome, iii. 70, who well expounds the prophecy thus: "O domus David, non mireris ad rei novitatem, si Virgo Deum pariat, qui tantam habebat potestatem ut multo post tempore nasciturus te nunc liberet invocatus." There was a punishment to Ahaz the King for his stubbornness. He should not see the Sign; it should appear many ages afterwards; but the effects of the Sign should be felt by the house of David, even in the age of Ahaz. Emmanuel, yet un-born, should deliver it. And the truth, now revealed, that He should be born of a Virgin of that house, was a sure pledge that the house of David would not perish.

The prophet goes on to say, v. 15, 16, "butter (milk) and honey shall he eat until he know to refuse the evil and choose the good," that is (as Irenaeus, Jerome, Chrys., and Basil explain it), though He is "EMMANUEL," "God with us," yet He shall be also an infant, and have a human body, and (not be born, like the first Adam, in full manhood, but) pass through infancy and childhood, and gradually come to maturity. For an excellent modern exposition, see Hengstenberg, Christol. i. pp. 11. 45, and Patrit. ii. 139—146, who also refutes the opinion recently propounded by some, that the Jews did not expect the Messiah to be born of a Virgin. And see Justin M. c. Tryph. §§ 18. 67.

St. Matthew fitly refers to this prophecy, in speaking of the birth and infancy of Christ, "God manifest in the flesh." The Prophet, having the Virgin and her Divine child before his eyes, naturally makes the growth of the Messiah, from birth to years of discernment, the measure of time of an event then about to happen. He turns to Ahaz, and says, "Before the child born of the Virgin shall know to reject the evil and choose the good, the land which thou abhorrest, i. e. thy enemy's land, shall be forsaken of both its kings." (Cp. Vitringa on Isaiah, l. c.) This destruction did take place in a very few years afterwards (2 Kings xv. 29. 2 Chron. xxviii. 5), and so was a proof of the truth of the prophecy, and a pledge of its fulfilment in the Virgin and in Christ of the House and Seed of David.

Though St. Matthew traces our Lord's Genealogy through Joseph, yet he takes care that we should not suppose that He was the son of Joseph κατὰ σάρκα, by stating, at the same time, that He was born of a Virgin.

— καλέσουσι τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἐμμανουήλ] they shall call His Name Emmanuel. He shall be (see on v. 21 and ii. 23) Emmanuel, ἡμᾶς, 'God with us;' i. e. God, not united to any one person among men already existing, but God in us, i. e. in the common nature of us all, and so He is Jesus, or Saviour of the World. See Hooker, V. lii. 3. Tertullian c. Jud. 1. Jerome (in Isa. vii. 14). The deliverance of Ahaz, and of the kingdom of David, is ascribed by the Prophet to Christ, who even then proved Himself God with His People, and would afterwards show Himself to be the Saviour of all.

On this mode of speaking, by which a Person or Thing is said to be called what its actions or attributes prove it to be, although it never actually bears the name, see Chrys. in 1 Cor. xv. 45 (where is a similar phrase), who says, "Christ is no where literally called Emmanuel, but his Actions proclaim this Name for Him."

25. οὐκ ἐγίνωσκεν αὐτὴν ἕως οὗ] "Non sequitur, ergo post." (Bengel.) "Helvidius," says Hooker, V. xlv. 2, "greatly abused these words of Matthew, gathering that a thing denied with special circumstance doth import an opposite affirmation, when that circumstance is expired."—οὐκ ἐγίνωσκεν αὐτὴν ἕως οὗ ἔτεκεν υἱόν— and it might be added, οὐκ ἐγίνωσκεν αὐτὴν μετὰ τὸ τεκεῖν,—if it were not the first duty of a student of Holy Scripture to know when to be silent. See next note.

— υἱόν] αὐτῆς—not of Joseph.—τὸν υἱὸν αὐτῆς τὸν πρωτότοκον D and others, and so Vulg. "filium suum primogenitum." Cp. Luke ii. 7, and so Jerome, who says, "From this passage some have imagined (Helvidius, Jovinian, and the Ebionites), most erroneously, that Mary had other children, whereas it is the practice of Scripture to designate as the firstborn that child who is born first, not that child who is followed by other children." See S. Jerome here, and adv. Helvidium, tom. iv. pars 2, pp. 130—142. Aug. de Catech. Rud. 40, and Serm. 188 and 191. See also *Bp. Similar instances of the use of 'until' after a negative may be seen in Gen. viii. 7; xxviii. 15 Deut. xxiv. 6. 1 Sam. xv. 35. 2 Sam. vi. 23. See below, xvi. 28; xxii. 44; xxviii. 20.

Concerning those who are called our Lord's brethren, see Routh, R. S. i. 16. 43. 212—249; ii. 32. 234. Dr. Mill, 224—236, and the note below on xii. 46.

One Joseph was appointed to be a guardian of the Saviour's human body before His first birth from the Virgin's womb. Another Joseph was appointed to be a guardian of it before His Resurrection, or second birth from the Virgin tomb (Matt. xxvii. 57—60. Luke xxiii. 50. John xix. 41). And both one and the other Joseph is called ἄνθρωπος δικαῖος in Holy Writ (Matt. i. 19. Luke xxiii. 50).

— ἐκάλεσε] he called, i. e. Joseph exercised a paternal right over Him as Jesus the name He then received as man. See v. 21.

CH. II. 1. Τοῦ δὲ Ἰησοῦ γεννηθέντος] When Jesus was born. As to the day of Christ's birth, see Patrit. de Evangelis, pp. 280—291, and the comparative tables inserted by him p. 277, who maintains, p. 290, the ancient Tradition (sanctioned by Hippolyt., Athanas., Jerome, Ambrose, Aug.), which fixed the Nativity on Dec. 25; see also Bp. Pearson, Minor Works (ed. Churton), i. pp. 153—162.

It was kept by the Western Church in early times on the 25th Dec., and that day was thence received by the Eastern Church at the middle of the fourth century, where it was called Θεοφάνια, γενέθλια. See Monit. ad Greg. Nazian. Orat. xxxviii. p. 662. Chrys. Hom. de Nativ. iii. p. 352, ed. Bened. Casaubon, Exc. Baron. p. 166. Patrit. 281, and note below on Luke ii. 8.

The word Epiphany came afterwards to be applied to the day of the arrival of the Magi, and also of Christ's Baptism, τὰ ἅγια φῶτα (Greg. Naz. p. 677), and the word Θεοφάνια was also applied to that day. See Hippolyt. homily with that title, and Greg. Thaumaturg. p. 30.

As to the year of the Nativity, see on ii. 20.

On the place of the Nativity, see Justin Martyr (c. Tryphon. § 78), who describes it as a cave near the village of Bethlehem, and says also that the Magi coming from Arabia found Him there (ἐν σπηλαίῳ τινὶ σύνεγγυς τῆς κώμης), which Jerome calls (ad Eustoch. and ad Paulin.) "specus Salvatoris," Cp. Origen c. Cels. i. 51. Euseb. v. Const. iii. 41. 43, who speak of a cave.

— Βηθλεὲμ] Bethlehem. סֹהַר-בֵּית, 'the house of bread,' of the Living Bread that came down from heaven (John vi. 35. Greg. M. Hom. in Ev. i. 8); called Bethlehem Ephrata (Ruth i. 2; iv. 11. Mic. v. 2) for its fertility; and Bethlehem Judah to distinguish it from a Bethlehem in Zabulon, Josh. xix. 15 (Jerome), six miles south of Jerusalem.

On the prophetic signification of Names in N. T. see on xxvi. 36; xxvii. 33.

— Ἡρώδου τοῦ β.] Herod made king by Roman influence, particularly of M. Antony, and called 'Herod the Great' (Joseph. A. xiv. 11. 18). On his history and character, see Joseph. A. xiv.—xvii. Casaubon, Exc. Baron. Art. 3—5. Mill, p. 335—342. Winer, R.-W.-B. i. p. 481.

— μάγοι] Magi. Not such as were known among the Greeks as professors of Magical Arts (see Origen c. Celsus, i. p. 35), but such as those whose title before the time of Zoroaster was Magus or Magh (whence mag in Jerem. xxxix. 3), the sacerdotal caste of the Medes and Persians (Cic. Div. i. 23. Plin. N. H. xxiv. 29. Justin. i. 9. 7. Hyde de vet. Pers. rel. c. 31. Patrit. ii. p. 317), dispersed in the ἀνατολή and called Μαγωναῖοι by Epiphanius, p. 1094, and not idolaters, but hating idolatry, εἰδῶλα βδελυρόμενοι. Hence perhaps they were distinguished among the Heathens by God (as Cyrus had been in an eminent manner, and as the Persians were favoured generally for their freedom from idolatry, and their hatred of it), and were chosen as the ἀπαρχή, or firstfruits, of Gentilism, to behold and worship Christ. See Dr. Jackson's Works, v. 404—411.

It is observable that the Prophecy concerning Messiah the Prince delivered in the East by the Prophet Daniel (ix. 24), who was Prime Minister of the East for two dynasties, is connected with Cyrus, as a terminus à quo, and with the edict due in the first instance to him who was of the same origin as the Magi, and favoured (as it would seem) by Almighty God for the same reasons as they, and made an instrument in God's hands for punishing the Idolatry of Babylon.

Cp. Casaubon, Exc. Baron. ii. num. 19, who regards them as toparchæ; see Tertullian, adv. Jud. 9, ad Marcion. iii. 13, "Magos reges ferè habuit Oriens," and they were of the sacred caste. Cp. Spanheim, Dub. Ev. ii. 20, and Mill, p. 331—342, and Dissertation in Patrit. ii. p. 309. Williams on the Nativity, p. 121—139.

We find them described as three in Leo M. (A.D. 450), p. 88: "Tribus Magis stella novæ claritatis apparuit;" and p. 90, "adorant in tribus Magis omnes populi Universitatis Auctorem."

On the time of their visit, see on chap. ii. 11.

On the Epiphany, see Aug. Sermones 199—204.

— ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν] from the east. Though, probably, of Persian origin, yet it does not therefore follow that they now came directly from Persia. The Fathers are divided in opinion between Persia and Arabia. See the authorities in Patrit. ii. pp. 317, 318. Perhaps both opinions are true, viz. that, being of Persian extraction (as is most likely), they came now from Arabia. The prophecies of the Old Testament seem to point that way. Ps. lxxii. 10. Isa. lx. 1—7. Also the gifts which they bring. Isa. lx. 6.

Perhaps their visit to the Prince of Peace was typified by that of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon (1 Kings x. 1. 2 Chron. ix. 1).

Time will show whether these μάγοι ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν were typical of the βασιλεῖς ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν ἡλίον in Rev. xvi. 12.

— παρεγένοντο] they came. After the Circumcision and Presentation in the Temple (Bengel). Cp. on v. 11.

— Ἱεροσόλυμα] St. Matthew only uses Ἱερουσαλὴμ once, in quoting Christ's words, xxiii. 37. St. Mark never. St. Luke rarely uses Ἱεροσόλυμα in his Gospel, often in Acts; and often uses Ἱερουσαλὴμ in both. St. John never uses Ἱερουσαλὴμ in his Gospel; four times in his Apocalypse, where he never uses Ἱεροσόλυμα.

2. εἶδομεν αὐτοῦ τὸν ἀστέρα] we saw his star.

The main reason which led them to believe that the Star they saw was the Star of a King born in Judæa, was the persuasion then prevalent in the Eastern world; see Sueton. in Vesp. c. 4. Tacit. Hist. v. 13. Patrit. ii. 352. Joseph. B. J. i. 5. 5; vii. 31. Dio Cass. xlv. 1.

This persuasion was grounded on the prophecy of Balaam delivered in the East, Numbers xxiv. 17. "This star (says Jerome) arose in the East according to the prophecy of Balaam, whose successors the Magi were, and it was ordained to be a rebuke to the Jews that they might learn Christ's Nativity from the Gentiles; and the Wise Men are led by it to Judæa, that the Priests being interrogated by them where Christ was to be born, might be left without excuse for ignorance of His Advent." (S. Jerome.) And more,

This persuasion was also grounded on the prophecy of Daniel (ix. 24—26) delivered in the East, that Messiah the Prince, who was to be born in Judæa, should arise at that time and have universal dominion.

That his appearance would be signified by a Star, would have been suggested by Balaam's prophecy; and the name Barcochba, or Son of a Star, given by the Jews to one of their false Messiahs (Euseb. iv. 6), shows the prevalent expectation in this respect.

What the ἀστήρ or Star was?

It has been supposed by some to have been a conjunction of Planets. Kepler, Münter, and Ideler, Handbuch der Chronologie, ii. p. 410. Winer, Real-W. ii. p. 523. Wieseler, p. 62. But this is a groundless conjecture. Cp. Spanheim, Dub. Ev. ii. 27, 28. Mill, pp. 322. 360—372, where this opinion is confuted, and Patrit. ii. p. 331. The luminary is not called ἀστρὸν, a constellation, but ἀστήρ, a single star; and it is described as standing over the house where the young child was (v. 9). And primitive testimony calls it a new star. S. Ignat. (ad Ephes. 19) says ἀστήρ ἐν οὐρανῷ ἔλαμψεν, ὑπὲρ πάντας τοὺς ἀστέρας, καὶ ξενισμὸν παρέχεν ἢ καινότης αὐτοῦ. So Chrys. and Aug. c. Faust. ii. 5, who says that it was created at the Nativity. Cp. Protev. Jacob. § 21. It is called 'lingua cæli' by Aug. (Serm. in Epiph.)

In the History of the Old Testament we have a similar instance of a luminous moveable body created in the Pillar of Fire (Exod. xiii. 21) to lead the People of Israel through the wilderness to the promised land. See Chrys., whose Comment on this history is deserving of attention. "This star was not like other stars; for it was visible in the daytime; and it led the wise men to Palestine, and then disappeared for a time; it had, as it were, a rational power, and may be compared to the pillar of fire which led the people in the wilderness; and it descended from its altitude in heaven, and marked the place where the young child lay, and stood over His head.

"And why did it appear? to penetrate the insensibility of the Jews, and to take all excuse from them, if they would not receive Christ. He Who had now come from heaven was about to abrogate the ancient Polity, and to invite the world to His worship, and to be adored in Sea and Land. He begins with opening a door to the Gentiles, in His desire to teach His own people by means of strangers. For since the Jews would not attend to what their own Prophets had said concerning His Advent, He brought foreigners from afar in quest of the King of the Jews, who hear first from the language of Persia what they would not learn from their own Prophets; in order that if they are disposed to listen they may have a strong motive to obedience; but if they are contentious, they may be without excuse. Observe also, God in His condescension teaches us by things familiar to us. He teaches the Magi by the stars with which they were conversant. He calls us by our occupations. So St. Paul preached to the Athenians by an inscription from their altar (Acts xvii. 23), and by a verse from their Poets (Acts xvii. 28), and instructs the Jews from the rite of circumcision, and from their own sacrifices.

"And when God has taught us by our own occupations, He raises us higher, if we listen to Him, as He did those wise men, whom He first taught by a star, and afterwards by a vision (v. 12). As Solomon says, 'Give instruction to a wise man and he will be yet wiser (Prov. ix. 9).'"

There is a remarkable confirmation of St. Matthew's account in Chalcid, in Timæum, in the edition of S. Hippolytus by Fabrianus, p. 325.

A miraculous sign in the heavens was a fit harbinger of the birth of Him who made the heavens (Col. i. 16), as also of his death (xxvii. 45); and so it will be at his Second Coming to judge the world (xxiv. 30). Cp. Arnoldi.

A question arises, How is it that the Star has not been noticed by heathen writers?

Suppose this to be so, then it may be replied, that if (as appears to be the case) the Magi were the firstfruits of the Gentile World coming to Christ, and the Star appeared to them as such, it is probable that it was manifested specially and singly to them.

God often reveals to some what He conceals from others at the same place, at the same time. The Angel in the way was not at first visible to Balaam, but it was to the ass (Num. xxii. 23) on which he was; and by this contrast God revealed to Balaam his own blindness. The servant of Elisha did not see the horses and chariots around his master till his master prayed that his eyes might be opened (2 Kings vi. 17). The sound in the heavens was heard by those who journeyed with Saul (Acts ix. 7; xxii. 9), but the words were articulate to Saul alone. Thus God showed that they were addressed to him. The darkness at the Crucifixion seems to have been local at Jerusalem; intimating to them at mid-day that they were then spiritually at midnight.

The Star then, it is probable, was visible to the Magi alone. It was a message from heaven to them.

— προσκυνῆσαι] to adore by prostration, see iv. 9, and 1 Cor. xiv. 25. Gen. xliii. 26, LXX. Herod. i. 134; and the authorities in Welstein's note here.

3. ἐταράχθη] was troubled, lest he, an usurper, should be dispossessed by the rightful king. And Jerusalem was troubled with him, as fearing his anger; and as ill prepared for the severe discipline of the Messiah's coming (Mal. iii. 2, 3; iv. 1). (Chrys.)

— Ἱεροσόλυμα] Feminine form, iii. 5, and so Josephus and Philo. (Meyer. Winer, p. 64.) Welstein regards it as a neuter plural with πόλις understood.

4. ἀρχιερεῖς] Chief Priests. A word suggestive of the confusion now introduced into the nominations to the office of High Priest, when the True High Priest came from heaven to "purify the sons of Levi" (Mal. iii. 3). Instead of one High Priest for life, there were many High Priests, made and unmade, in rapid succession. As Spanheim says (Dub. Ev. ii. 37), "Ἀρχιερωσύνη confusa, Christo exhibitio. Summum sacerdotium pessimè habitum, Herodis et Romanorum licentia." See below on Luke iii. 2.

They who had held the office, and the deputies of the High Priest, were now included in the term.

Also (as some suppose) the Heads of the twenty-four ἐφημερίαι, or courses of Priests. Grotius, Welstein, and Winer, Real-W. ii. p. 271. Cp. Patrit. ii. 354, 355, who observes that the Chief Priest was called ἱερεὺς (not ἀρχιερεὺς) by LXX, and see on Acts iv. 23.

— γραμματεῖς] סופרים (sopherim), scribes learned in the Law of Moses and the Prophets, probably Members or Assessors of the Sanhedrim (Lightfoot, ii. 422. 652), who supposes them to have been Levites, and Masters of colleges and schools (1. 439. 469. 654.) Cp. Welstein here.

— ποῦ ὁ Χρ. γεννᾶται;] what is Christ's birthplace? See Winer, p. 238.

5. Οἱ δὲ εἶπον] But they said. They could send others to Christ, but would not go themselves, like many of the builders of the Ark, who provided a refuge for others, but were themselves drowned by the Flood. (Aug. Sermon. 373, 374.)

So now the Jews carry the Scriptures, but do not believe them. "Codicem portat Judæus unde credat Christianus." (Aug. in Ps. lvi.)

Here is a strong argument for Christianity. We bring documents in its proof which are in the hands of the Jews our enemies, and no one therefore can say that they have been forged or tampered with by us. See Justin M. ad Græcos, c. 13. S. Aug. in Ps. xl. lvi.; c. Faust. xii. 13.

— οὕτω γὰρ γέγραπται] Observe the perfect tense in this formula (γέγραπται), signifying, that what is cited has been written, and remains written. (See Winer, § 40, p. 243.) The quotation is from Micah v. 2.

The Exposition given by the Chief Priests and Scribes of Micah's prophecy is adopted here by St. Matthew. The Holy Spirit authorizes it as true; and the mode of it, giving briefly the sense of Prophecy (not the exact words), and prefacing the exposition with an οὕτω γέγραπται διὰ τοῦ προφήτου, is a remarkable exemplification of the manner in which the official Jewish Expositions of St. Matthew's age dealt with Scripture, and may serve to confute the cavils of some against the Holy Spirit dealing with His own Prophecies in a similar way in the Gospels, particularly in the first and second Chapters of St. Matthew. Indeed, we may suppose that the Spirit who deigned to speak by a Balaam and a Caiaphas, guided here the words of the authorized Expounders of Scripture at Jerusalem in this interpretation, which He adopts by St. Matthew as His own.

It seems, at first, as if here the Scribes deny what Micah affirms:

But here, as elsewhere, the Holy Spirit, speaking in the New Testament, records the sense (and not the letter) of what had been spoken by Him through the Prophets in the Old Testament.

He begins with calling Micah's "Bethlehem Ephrata" by its newer name, "Bethlehem Judah" (for Ephrata was now obsolete), and thus prepares us to understand that His words are not to be regarded as a literal quotation, but as a Paraphrase.

It is to be remembered, that, in Micah's age, Bethlehem was of small account, its very name, as "the City of David," being transferred to Jerusalem, and its glories being eclipsed by those of the capital. And so it was little. But yet Micah was inspired to predict (what then seemed very improbable) its future grandeur and glory, for "out of thee shall go forth One to be a Ruler in Israel; and His Goings forth are from of Old, from the Days of Eternity."

Thus the Holy Ghost proclaimed by Micah the human birth and the Eternal Generation of Christ. On the two goings forth of Christ, one from Eternity, and the other in time at Bethlehem, and both mentioned here by Micah, see Waterland, Sermon. vii. vol. ii. p. 144.

The Prophet had spoken of the greatness of Bethlehem, then small in the world. And now, that the Prophecy is fulfilled, and now that Bethlehem, once little, is become more great than it was even in the age of David, the Holy Spirit delivers the sense of His own prophecy, as spoken of old by Micah, and says, "Thou, Bethlehem Judah (so small and despised by men), art by no means the least among the princes of Judah." Compare Po-cocke, i. p. 134, and Lightfoot, i. 440. Hengstenberg, Christol. 916, who well says, "The apparent contradiction that Micah calls Bethlehem 'small,' the Evangelist 'by no means small,' had been satisfactorily explained by ancient and modern Interpreters. Thus Euthym. ad loc. εἰ καὶ, τὸ φαινόμενον, εὐτελὲς εἶ, ἀλλὰ γε τὸ νοούμενον οὐκ ἐλαχίστη. Hence Michaelis, 'Parvam vocat Michæas, respiciens statum externum; minime parvam Matthæus, respiciens nativitatem Messiae.'"

6. ἐν τοῖς ἡγεμόσιν] among the rulers. Micah has Alephëy, thousands. But the word is here elevated to a higher meaning, i. e. to Aluphrim, leaders; not without reference to the ἡγούμενος who was to come forth from Bethlehem and rule the Rulers (Hengst.), being no other than King of Kings and Lord of Lords.

d Ps. 72. 10.
Isa. 60. 6.

This was a very natural modification. For the Israelites were distributed into Alaphim, families or thousands, which were presided over by Princes of thousands (Exod. xviii. 21. Num. i. 16. Judg. vi. 15). Hence the Heads of families are fitly put for the families themselves. He who was the Head of the thousands was rightly called the Head of the Rulers themselves, and the City in which He was born was pre-eminent among them. Cp. Surenhus. p. 174.

⁹ ἰδοὺ, ὁ ἀστὴρ] behold, the star. The following is from Chrys. "The star which they saw in the East went before them. It had been hidden from them, in order that they might inquire of the Jews," "and that the appearance might be made known to all. And when they had learnt from the Prophet, it appeared to them again. Observe here the sequence of events. First, the star sets them forth on their journey, then they are received by the Jews—their people and King—who introduce to them the Prophet, the written Word of God," "which teaches them concerning what had appeared. And thus they are brought to Bethlehem, and then the star re-appears and goes before, and leads them by the hand in broad daylight, that they may be assured that the star is not an ordinary one, and brings them to Bethlehem to the cradle of Christ. Thus they receive an additional assurance of faith, and they rejoice greatly because they have found what they had sought, and have become messengers of the truth, and have not journeyed in vain. The star stood over the head of Christ, showing that He who was born is Divine, and it invites and induces them to fall down and worship."

"Here also let us recognize a prophetic figure of what would afterwards take place,—that the Gentiles would come to Christ, and anticipate the Jews in coming to Him. Let us arise, and (though kings and people are troubled, and conspire against Christ) hasten to Bethlehem,—the house of spiritual bread,—to worship Him." Chrys.

—ἐπάνω] above the house, to distinguish it from other dwellings. Some of the Fathers supposed the visit to have taken place while our Lord was still in the φάτνη at Bethlehem. Justin M. c. Tryph. § 78, and Aug. Sermon 200, "In præsepi tum jacebat et Magos ab oriente ducebat, abscondebatur in stabulo, agnoscebatur in celo." So Greg. Nyssen. in Natal., and Chemnitz, cap. x., and others in Patrit. p. 340. Euseb., Epiphani., Theophyl., suppose that Mary had removed to a house in Bethlehem, and Eusebius (Qu. ad Stephan. Mai 16) and Epiphani. (hæres. 51) are of opinion that the Parents returned to Bethlehem often, on account of the wonderful events there revealed to them. Cp. on ii. 22, a passage cleared up by this consideration. And this is probable, and that the Visit of the Magi at Bethlehem was after the Presentation in the Temple (which was forty days after the birth), and so Photius (quæst. Amphiloch. 36).

The Parents would not have taken the child Jesus to Jerusalem for the Presentation (Luke ii. 22) after the alarm of Herod had been excited by the Magi.

Herod would not have extended his cruelty to children of two years old (v. 16).

The flight into Egypt seems to have been immediately after the Visit of the Magi (v. 13).

It is not probable that Christ should have been manifested to the Gentiles before His manifestation in the Temple at Jerusalem.

Immediately after the Presentation, the Parents and the child Jesus returned to Nazareth. See on ii. 23, Luke ii. 39.

VOL. I.

It seems, therefore, that the sequence of events was this: Nativity.

Presentation in the Temple.

Return to Nazareth.

Return to Bethlehem (probably on the occasion of one of the great annual Feasts at Jerusalem).

Visit of Magi.

Settlement at Nazareth. See on Luke ii. 51 and Patrit. ii. 328—331.

10. σφόδρα] ῥῆμα.

11. εἶδον] they saw. So the best MSS.—Elz. has εἶδον.

—πεσόντες προσεκύνησαν—δῶρα—σμύρναν] they fell down and worshipped Him, and opened their chests and offered to Him gifts, gold, and frankincense and myrrh.

The Magi did three things:

They fulfilled in part a prophecy concerning Christ. Ps. lxxii. 10. 15. Isa. lx. 6.

They themselves had a prophetic character. They pre-figured Heathendom coming to worship Christ. And if they were of royal race (as seems probable), they were prophetic of the future subjection of all Kings to Christ, as King of Kings and Lord of Lords.

And (as subsequent events have shown) their offerings had a symbolical and prophetic character.

Gold—signifying all that is most costly to be given to Christ the Universal Lord. Ps. lxxii. 15, "To Him shall be given of the gold of Arabia: Prayer (typified by the Frankincense) shall be made daily unto Him."

Frankincense—the fragrant incense of Prayer (Ps. cxli. 2. Rev. v. 8) offered through Him and by Him as our Great High Priest, within the veil (Levit. xvi. 12, 13) before the mercy-seat of God, in the Golden Censer of His merits.

Myrrh—"they did it for His burial." He had myrrh presented to Him on the Cross (Mark xv. 23), and myrrh for the embalming of His body in the tomb (John xix. 39).

Cp. Iren. iii. 9. Origen, c. Cels. i. 60, whence S. Ambrose (in Luc. ii.), "Aurum regi, tunc Deo, myrrham defuncto." And Leo M. Sermon 30. S. Greg. (hom. x.), "Auro Regem, thure Deum, myrrhâ mortalem prædicant." And the verse, "Myrrham homo, Rex aurum, suscipe thura Deus." Cp. Patrit. p. 344—9. Routh, R. S. iv. 43. Mill, p. 378.

Thus their act was like a Creed. In their prostration and presents, the Heathen World fell down and did homage to Christ, yet an Infant at Bethlehem; and they presignified the Time when all Kings and Nations will fall down before Him sitting on His judgment-seat and Royal Throne at the Great Day.

13. φεύγε εἰς Αἴγυπτον] fly into Egypt.

The Infant Jesus by His Divine Power makes all things, even the mighty and wise of this world, to minister to Himself. Augustus Cæsar, the Heathen Master of the World, had ministered to the evidence of His Messiahship at Bethlehem by the imperial decree that all should be enrolled, in their own cities.

And now Egypt is made to minister to Christ.

Egypt, the nurse of Ancient Learning, and the ancient enemy of God's People, is now made the asylum of Him who was born King of the Jews,—flying from Judæa itself.

τὸ παιδίον τοῦ ἀπολέσαι αὐτό. ¹⁴ Ὁ δὲ ἐγερθεὶς παρέλαβε τὸ παιδίον καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ νυκτὸς, καὶ ἀνεχώρησεν εἰς Αἴγυπτον· ¹⁵ καὶ ἦν ἐκεῖ ἕως τῆς τελευτῆς Ἡρώδου, ἵνα πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ Κυρίου διὰ τοῦ ὁ προφήτου λέγοντος, Ἐξ Αἰγύπτου ἐκάλεσα τὸν υἱόν μου.

the prophecy, Isa. xix. 1. And there was an ancient tradition, "idola in Ægypto ad ingressum Christi corruisse." See Athanasius de Incarn. 33, p. 60, and cp. S. Jerome, Palladius, and others quoted by à Lapide.

On the bearing of this action on the much controverted subject "de fugā in persecutione," see Athanas. Apol. de fugā suā, § 12, p. 259. Cp. Luke iv. 30. John viii. 59; xi. 54. Acts ix. 25.

The following is from Chrys. "Wherefore this double flight? that of the wise men to Persia? that of the child to Egypt? The first—that the wise men might be preachers of the truth to their own country. The second, because if our Lord had remained, and had fallen into Herod's hand, and not been killed, it might have been suggested by some that He had not really taken human flesh. Observe; the Angel does not say take thy child, but the young child; nor does he say, thy wife, but his mother for the birth had now taken place, and Joseph's suspicions were dispelled; and the Angel reveals the cause of the flight,—Herod is about to seek his life,—and tells him to remain in Egypt till he gives him notice to leave it. Observe, also, Joseph is not perplexed by this, but takes the child and flies into Egypt accordingly."

¹⁵ ἵνα πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥηθὲν] in order that it might be fulfilled which was spoken. Not ὑπὸ τοῦ προφήτου, but τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ Κυρίου διὰ τοῦ προφήτου, i. e. The Holy Spirit here declares by St. Matthew what had been in His own mind when He uttered those words by Hosea, xi. 1. And who shall venture to say that he knows the mind of the Spirit better than the Spirit Himself? See 1 Cor. ii. 11.

On this formula of quotation from the Old Testament see i. 22; ii. 17. 23; and below, xii. 17.

—Ἐξ Αἰγύπτου ἐκάλεσα τὸν υἱόν μου] Out of Egypt I called my Son.

This was spoken, in the first instance, of the ancient Church of God, delivered by Him in its Infancy from Egypt, at and by means of the Passover—prefiguring Christ. Egypt was the land "in quā primum occisione agni salutiferum Crucis signum et Pascha Domini fuerat præformatum." (Leo M. Sermon. xxxii.) Cp. Gal. iv. 1—4.

The Holy Spirit applies this saying to Christ; and He thus teaches us to regard Christ as One with His Church in all ages of her history. This was one of the exegetical canons of Tichonius, approved by Augustine, iii. 100—103. And so Bengel, "Totus Christus caput et corpus est."

In the persecution of the literal Israel in Egypt, He teaches us to see a persecution of Christ. Cp. Acts ix. 4, 5, "Why persecutest thou Me?" In all their affliction He was afflicted, and the Angel of His presence saved them. (Isa. lxiii. 9.) He was with them in the Exodus, and led them through the Red Sea; they drank of that Spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ. (1 Cor. x. 4—9.) They were in Him, and He in them.

Hence also we learn to regard what is said by the Holy Spirit concerning Israel as God's Son, as having a prelude reference to what is declared in the Gospel concerning the only-begotten Son of God; and to see, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit speaking in the Gospel, its πλήρωσις, or accomplishment in Christ. Hence S. Jerome (in Hos. xi. 1) says, "The Evangelist cites this text because it refers typically to Christ; and in this and other prophecies the coming of Christ is foreshown, and yet the thread of History is not broken." And Grotius says (i. 22), "Historia Christi nos admonet ita directam à Deo prophetæ mentem fuisse, ut quod de Israël dicebatur rectius (and we may add, plenius, imò plenissime) in Christum conveniret." See also Mill, p. 411.

Thus, in His dealings with His own Prophecies, the Holy Spirit opens to us new lights as to their meaning, lights which we could never have hoped to receive. As we shall see in the quotations in St. Matthew's Gospel from the Prophetic Books, the Prophecies of Holy Scripture are like centres of successive concentric circles, and they have successive fulfilments in them. But the external circumference of them all, and to which they all tend, and in which they are all enfolded and fully accomplished, is CHRIST.

¹⁶ τοὺς παῖδας—ἀπὸ διετοῦς] The males, from the child who was two years old. Cp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 23. 2 Chron. xxxi. 16. The allegations of Strauss and others (cp. Meyer, p. 74) against this narrative of the massacre at Bethlehem, on account of the silence of Josephus, are refuted by Mill, pp. 321—359, and had been solidly confuted by anticipation by Dr. Jackson on the Creed, vol. vii. pp. 259—299; and see Welstein here, p. 251; and Afford, p. 14.

It may be added that Josephus was already committed, by personal interest, to a private interpretation of the prophecies concerning the Messiah, in favour of Vespasian and of Rome; and the reasons of worldly policy which unhappily led him to speak in flattering and equivocal language concerning Christianity (see on Acts xxvi. 28), would induce him to suppress any evidence in favour of the true King of the Jews (cp. Arnoldi).

Herod might have supposed that the Star was significant of the child already born, and not to be born, and therefore might have extended the range of his cruelty in time (cp. Patrit. p. 381), as he did in place, by killing those in all the regions near (ὅρια) Bethlehem (v. 16), as well as at Bethlehem itself. For a valuable ancient exposition see Basil Seleucen. 37, p. 188. The following, slightly modified, is from Chrys. "Why was Herod allowed to perpetrate this murder? Why did Christ fly, and suffer these children to be slain? Why did the Angel deliver Peter from prison, and thus expose the keepers to death? Christ was not the cause of slaughter, but the cruelty of the king was. Remonstrate with Herod, not with God. But why did God allow this? What shall we say, but what may be always replied to such questions? There are many who act unjustly, and no man can be injured but by himself. How can we say that these children were injured in being cut off by death? they who were so soon brought to a placid harbour of everlasting peace! This is part of the answer, not the whole, which is well known to Him who ordereth these things. And remember, that Herod, who perpetrated this wicked deed, was soon called to his account, and died a wretched death, as you may have read in the history of Josephus." On the murder of the Innocents, it is beautifully observed by Leo M. (Sermon. xxxi.), "Christus, ne ullum Ei tempus esset absque miraculo, ante usum lingue potestatem Verbi tacitus exerebat, et quasi jam diceret, Sinite parvulos venire ad Me (xix. 14), talium enim est regnum celorum, novā gloriā coronabat Infantes, ut disceretur neminem divini incapacem esse sacramenti, quando etiam illa ætas gloriæ apta esset martyrii." On Christ's love for Infants see ibid. Sermon. xxxvi. p. 98. See also Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, sect. vi.

¹⁷ Τότε ἐπληρώθη] Then, and not till then, the prophecy (Jer. xxxi. 15) received its full and final accomplishment.

It had been partially and provisionally verified in the first instance in the murder, by the Babylonians, of the children of Judæa, particularly of the region where Rachel, the mother of Joseph and Benjamin, was buried (Gen. xxxv. 17—20; xlviii. 7). Cp. Ps. cxxxvii. 8, 9, and the Chaldee Paraphrase on Jer. xxxi. 15; xl. 1, and Mill, pp. 402—407.

But it was now fully accomplished, and no other fulfilment was to be expected.

The Holy Spirit, speaking by St. Matthew, teaches us here and elsewhere in these first two chapters (see i. 22; ii. 23. Cf. viii. 17; xii. 17; xiii. 35; xxi. 4; xxvii. 9. 35), that the Prophecies spoken by Himself in the Old Testament are not exhausted at once, but have a perennial flow through successive ages, till they arrive at their height and spring-tide in Christ. As Lord Bacon says (Adv. of Learning, ii. p. 101), "Divine Prophecies, being of the nature of their Author, with whom a thousand years are as one day, are not punctually fulfilled at once, but have springing and germinant accomplishment throughout many ages,"—and (it may be added) have, at length, their summer blossom and autumnal ripeness in Christ. See also Bp. Horne's Preface to the Psalms, p. xiv.

Christ's coming is the consummation for which all History prepares the way, and toward which all Prophecy tends, and yearns. All the afflictions and all the consolations of the literal Israel find their fulfilment there. And from the divine and inestimable specimens of Prophetic Interpretation which are given by the Holy Spirit in these two Chapters of St. Matthew, we learn to read History and Prophecy aright.

²⁰ τεθνήκασι they are dead, a phrase alluding to the Egyptian history of Moses, Exod. iv. 19. See LXX; and a gentle way of saying—Herod is dead. The Plural for Sing. showing lenity and forbearance, particularly in speaking of the dead. Cp. Glass. Phil. Sac. p. 421. Winer, 158. Meyer here. See below, ix. 18.

Herod died just before the Passover, A.U. 750. Joseph. Antt. xvii. 6, 1; 8, 4. Ideler, Chronol. ii. p. 391. Winer, R.-W. i. p. 560. Clinton, F. H. iii. p. 254, and F. R. ii. App. p. 236.

Our Lord was, probably, then more than a year old; and, therefore, his birth was not later than A.U. 749. Cp. Welstein here.

A similar result is obtained from Luke iii. 1. 23, where our Lord is said to have been about thirty years of age in the fifteenth year of Tiberius. For Tiberius was admitted by Augustus "in partem imperii" two or three years before the death of Augustus Caesar, which took place in Aug. A.U. 767 (Tacit. Ann. i. 3. Sueton. Tiber. 20, 21. Vell. Pat. ii. 121); and so the fifteenth year of Tiberius corresponds with A.U. 779, or 780, and since our Lord was then thirty years old, he was born A.U. 749, or 750.

Our Lord's Death took place in the consulate of the two Gemini, A.U. 782. Tertullian, adv. Jud. 8. Aug. Civ. D. xviii. 54. His Ministry (it is probable) commenced when He was thirty years old, and lasted three years and a half. (See Kuin, and others on John v. 1.) Therefore He was born A.U. 748, or 749.

The common era Anno Domini (due to Dionysius Exiguus A.D. 525, and thence called the Dionysian era), which makes the first year from the Incarnation to coincide with A.U. 754, begins about four years too late. On this subject see Wieseler, Chronol. Synops. p. 67, who places the Nativity in A.U. 750. Greswell's Dissertations, x. vol. i., who places our Lord's birth on April 5, A.U. 750. Gieseler, Ch. Hist. § 20. Mill, p. 341, who observes that the year of Rome 750 is the year at which the older tradition fixes the Nativity. Clinton, F. H. ii. App. p. 238, places it in the spring of B.C. 5 = A.U. 749.

As to the time of year in which our Lord was born, see Luke ii. 8. John i. 14.

— βασις ἐπὶ Not King of —, but set βασιλεύειν ἐπὶ —. (See Joseph. xvii. 13.)

— ἐφοβήθη ἐκεῖ ἀπελθεῖν—ἀνεχώρησεν δέ he was afraid to go to Judæa, and retired to the borders of Galilee. It has hence been alleged by some (e. g. Meyer) that St. Matthew was not aware of what is mentioned by St. Luke, viz. Joseph's and Mary's previous abode at Nazareth (Luke i. 26; ii. 4).

But this is groundless;

It was very natural that Joseph and Mary (though formerly resident at Nazareth in Galilee) should now desire to settle at Bethlehem Judah, the city of David, on account of the prophecies connected with it—and the marvel of which it had just been the scene—in the history of the new-born child, who was to sit on the throne of his Father David, and whom therefore they might well wish to bring up in the City of David. See above on ii. 11.

The word ἀπελθεῖν also, used here, intimates a departure from, and ἀνεχώρησεν may imply here a return to a former abode, Nazareth, see Luke i. 26, 27. For this sense of ἀνεχώρησεν see ii. 12; iv. 12.

— Γαλιλαίας of Galilee. Where a "King of the Jews" would not be so much an object of jealousy to the ruling powers as in Judæa.

²³ ὅπως πληρωθῇ that it might be fulfilled. This formula here does not mark the intention of Joseph's mind, but the design of God, who guided him. Cp. 2 Cor. iv. 7, and Alford here.

— Ναζωραῖος κληθήσεται he shall be called a Nazarene.

A prophecy no where found literatim in the Old Testament.

But (as has been already seen, i. 22; ii. 15. 17) the Holy Spirit in the New Testament gives the sense of the Prophecies spoken by Himself in the Old, and not always the exact words. See Jerome ad Pammach. Ep. 33, pp. 252—254, who sums up his disquisition on these Prophecies by saying, "ex his perspicuum est Apostolos et Evangelistas in interpretatione veterum Scripturarum sensum quæsisse non verba." Cp. Surenhus. pp. 2. 151, 152. 218, for some excellent remarks on this subject.

And therefore St. Matthew does not refer here to any one Prophet, but says generally that it was spoken διὰ, through the Prophets, that He should be called a Ναζωραῖος. S. Jerome says here, "Pluraliter Prophetas vocando Matthæus ostendit non verba de Scripturis à se sumpta sed sensum."

The word κληθήσεται signifies "he shall be" (see Vorst de Hebr. p. 155, and above, i. 23, and below, v. 19. Luke i. 32. 76), "and be known to be,"—remarkably fulfilled by the title on the Cross.

But how was Christ described in ancient Prophecy as Ναζωραῖος or a Nazarene?

As the Branch or Netser from the root of Jesse, Isa. xi. 1; where see Jerome and Vitringa. S. Jerome says, also, ad Pammach. p. 252, "Exiet virga de radice Jesse et Nazaræus de virgâ Ejus crescit;" and cp. Isa. xiv. 19. And though the word for Branch in other prophecies (Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15. Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12) is not נֶטֶר (netser), but נֶטֶם (tsemah), yet Netser expresses the sense of them all.

The other derivation of Ναζωραῖος from Nazir, a Nazarene, seems to be at variance with history and grammar: for Christ was not a Nazarite, but is contrasted with the Baptist, who was one. Matt. xi. 19. Luke vii. 34.

The City Nazareth is spelt, properly, with tsadi, and not with zain. Cp. Mill, p. 422.

And it was indeed a marvellous thing that the Root of Jesse of Bethlehem Judah should flourish at NAZARETH in Galilee.

And from this word Netser, or branch, the City Nazareth derived its name, "quia urbs florida et virgultis consita." See Jerome in Isa. xi. 1.

And the Holy Spirit teaches us, that by growing up at Nazareth, the city of branches, He whose "Name is the Branch" thus fulfilled an ancient prophecy that he should be Ναζωραῖος. See below on Luke ii. 51.

This word, derived by the enemies of Christianity from an obscure village of despised Galilee, Nazareth, was inscribed as His title on the Cross, and was applied in contempt to the followers of Christ (Acts xxiv. 5), who gloried in it (see Acts ii. 22; iii. 6; iv. 10; vi. 14; xxvi. 9); and Christ applied it to Himself in heaven (Acts xxii. 8); for it proclaimed that He is the Branch, and the Giver of eternal life to all who are grafted in Him, the true Vine.

Cp. note below on Mark xvi. 6 and Hammond here, pp. 11, 12, and Dr. Jackson on the Creed, vi. 219—221, "He turned aside into the parts of Galilee (Matt. ii. 22), to the place of Christ's conception: and thus by his doubtful resolution, the will of the Lord which he had spoken by the Prophet, is fulfilled; to wit, that Christ, from the place of his conception and education, should be called Nazaraeus; a name, in their intendment that sought to fasten it first upon him, of disgrace and scorn, but by the disposition of the Almighty a known title of greatest honour, convicting such as used it otherwise, even whilst they spake it, of blasphemy. For this city's name, it is by interpretation, the city of plants. Whence if the Jew captiously demand, Was it ever heard that any prophet should arise out of Nazareth? We may answer (as our Saviour did to Pilate), 'Infidel! thou hast said it, though unwittingly, as Caiaphas thy predecessor did foretell His dying for the people: for didst thou never hear of a man whose name was the Branch, never of a plant Netzer, that should grow out of the root of Ishai? What if thou canst not revile this Jesus whom we preach, but thou must acknowledge him Hanotzeri surculus ille, or surcularius ille, or germen illud, the Plant, the Branch?' For though the objector meant to disgrace him, yet God had ordained his glory, as well out of his enemies' mouths, that meant him mischief, as out of the mouths of babes that meant him neither good nor ill. And it is very suitable to the ways of God's providence to suggest by ambiguous words or speeches unto the attentive hearer, conceits quite contrary to their meaning that uttered them."

CH. III. 1. Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτιστής] John the Baptist. So called by Josephus, A. xviii. 5. 2.

Heathens were baptized on reception into Judaism, and John by baptizing the Jews taught them that they now needed as great a change, as from Heathenism to their own religion. Thus a preparation was made by John's baptism to a still higher ascent, viz. to the Baptism instituted by Christ. (Remig.) On the doctrine of Repentance as preached by him, see Bp. Andrewes' Sermons, i. p. 417, and 435.

— ἐρήμῳ τῆς Ἰουδ.] in the wilderness, west of Jordan. It seems that John first began to preach in the wilderness of Judæa (cf. Luke i. 80; iii. 3), then baptized near Bethany (John i. 28), and in the region about Jordan (Luke iii. 3), and at Ænon, near Salim (John iii. 23).

2. βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν] the kingdom of heaven. A phrase used only by St. Matthew. St. Mark and St. Luke, writing more especially for Gentiles who were to be disabused of their notion of local Deities, and to be taught the Unity of God, use βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ. See below, iv. 17. And on the true character of the Kingdom of Heaven, or Christian Church, as distinguished from the Kingdoms of Earth, and from the temporal Kingdom expected by the Jews, see Daniel ii. 44; vii. 14. 27; our Lord's Parables, xiii. 11—52. Cp. Mede's Works, p. 103.

3. Οὗτος] This is he. St. John's words concerning himself (John i. 23); cp. on Matt. xvi. 18.

— Κυρίου] the Lord, Jehovah, Christ. See Luke i. 76; ii. 11.

4. Αὐτὸς δέ] Although John was so great, yet such was his fare and garb,—in which he resembled Elijah, 2 Kings i. 8.

— ἐνδυμα] raiment. Here (says Chrys.) was an invitation to the Jews, beholding in St. John's garb and appearance an image of the great Elias (2 Kings i. 8), and being reminded of his character and history, in contrast with the effeminacy of his own age.

— ἀκρίδες] locusts. A common food in the East, Levit. xi. 22. Plin. ii. 29; vi. 30. S. Jerome (in Jovinian. ii.): "Locustas prisci edebant, vel elixas vel tostas et in pollinem redactas; imò vel sole vel sale et fumo duratas in totum annum servabant."

5. ἐξεπορεύετο] they went forth; excited by the wonder, that after so long an interval of silence a Prophet had risen up among them; for the grace of Prophecy had ceased, and was now revived after a long time: and the burden of his prophecy was strange, not concerning battles, and pestilences, and famines, and Babylonians, and Persians, and the taking of their city, and other such things as they had heard from the old Prophets—but the kingdom of heaven, and the punishment of hell. (Chrys.)

— πᾶσα] all, "major vel magna pars." Glass. Philol. S. p. 882. Or some from all parts of —. (Bengel.) Exod. ix. 6; xxxii. 3. Matt. viii. 34. Phil. iv. 13.

7. Φαρισαίων καὶ Σαδδουκαίων] Pharisees and Sadducees. On these sects see Wetstein here, Lightfoot i. 654. Jahn, Archæol. § 317—320. The Pharisees did not submit to John's Baptism, Luke vii. 30.

— Γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν] Generations of Vipers. Cp. Ps. lviii. 4. Isa. xiv. 29. Matt. xii. 34; xxiii. 33,—with an allusion perhaps to the ὄφις ἀρχαῖος, the old Serpent whose progeny some among them are called, John viii. 44, 45.

A remarkable proof of St. John's honesty and courage. He rebukes the sins of the rulers, who were ready to flatter him. Cp. St. Paul's language, Tit. i. 12, and note.

9. μὴ δόξετε λ.] Let not this be your δόξα. "Sic non debetis placere vobis." (Bengel.) Cf. below, vi. 7. Winer, G. G. 540.

— ἐκ τῶν λίθων τούτων] from these stones. In the desert by the river's side,—"ut ex glebâ Adamum." (Beng.)

And so God did. For, as Joshua, the type of Jesus, took up twelve stones from the bed of the same river Jordan (Josh. iv. 1—9), and set them up on the western bank there, for a memorial, so Jesus, the true Joshua, after His baptism in the same river, began to choose His twelve Apostles (see on x. 2) from obscure and unlearned men, like rude and unbewn stones of the wilderness, and to make them to be the θεμέλιοι λίθοι of His Church (Rev. xxi. 14), which is the true family of Abraham, the Israel of God, the heavenly Jerusalem, the city that hath foundations, whose builder is God. (Heb. xi. 10.)

And so, daily, God raises up children to Abraham from stones of the desert (Iren. iv. 7. 2), when by his grace He softens the stony heart of the heathen, who worship stocks and stones,—and of the infidel, and turns them to Christ. And thus considered, they afford salutary instruction, that in reading the Scriptures we are to inquire after the mind of the speaker." See above, Introduction to the Gospels, and below on Luke vi. 17.

To purify, illumine, transform, inflame with holy fervour and zeal, and carry upward, as Elijah was carried up to heaven in a chariot of fire. A prophecy specially fulfilled at Pentecost when the Holy Spirit descended in tongues of fire. Acts ii. 3. (Cyril Hierosol. Catech. 3, p. 44.)

There is a threefold baptism with fire, says Jerome. With the fire of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost. With the fiery trials of this life. Luke xii. 49. 1 Pet. i. 7; iv. 12. See on Mark ix. 49. With that fire of which St. Paul speaks, which shall try every man's work, what it is, at the Great Day. (1 Cor. iii. 13.)

12. οὗ τὸ πτύον—αὐτοῦ] whose fan is in His hand. The pronouns thus repeated bring out the great truth, that no one has the judicial fan but Christ; that it is His fan, and in His hand, and that the whole world is His floor.

The Baptist—greater than a Prophet—passes from a view of the First Advent to a vision of the Second. Christ has come as Saviour; and He is seen by him coming as Judge. His fan is in His hand; the Visible Church Universal, the World itself, is His threshing-floor, in which wheat and chaff now lie mingled together; He stands over it, to winnow the one from the other by the fan of His all-searching Judgment. Cp. Ps. i. 4, 5.

The Baptist, the Herald of Christ, proclaims to the people the Future Judge, lest they should imagine that Christ, submitting to John's baptism, was inferior to John. "Observe," says Chrys., "after baptism, he immediately speaks of the fan of judgment, in order that you might not imagine that Baptism is enough, without good fruit. For every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire. Let none of us, therefore, be chaff, tossed about with the wind, or puffed away by temptations, or separate ourselves by schism, but let us remain on the threshing-floor of the Church. Let us also remember, that on the Christian floor, the grain may become chaff and the chaff grain. God now tries the grain, and is long-suffering toward the chaff, that we may escape the fire, and inherit heaven."

S. Aug. (Serm. 4. 32, p. 37), "Ecclesia est una catholica et tolerat peccata hominum quos non potest purgare de aréa dominicá antequam veniat Ille ultimus Ventilator, qui falli non potest, ut purget aream suam." See also Serm. 88. 19, p. 686, and Serm. 223, p. 1408, "Quantum est hoc quod premit palea? Nos grana sinus. Audite me, paleæ; granorum conjunctio grana vos faciat."—"In aréa sunt viatores, in horreo victores." (Bengel.)

On the Parables describing the mixed state of the Church Visible on earth see below, xiii. 3 and 30.

— ἄχυρον] Not merely chaff (χυρὸς) γῆς (mots), but 'stubble,' 'stalk,' and indeed all that is not grain. See Wetstein.

Chaff alone would have been of little use for heating the κλίβανος, or oven; but stubble, &c. was commonly used in the East for fuel. See vi. 30.

Hence the comparison here with the unquenchable fire of Gehenna, or Hell. And hence a warning is implied by the Baptist, that whatsoever is not good grain will be cast into it at the Great Day.

He also compares the Visible Church, which is the world, to an ἅλως, area, a circular threshing-floor, where chaff and grain,—bad and good,—now lie mingled together, till He who will winnow them shall come. And thus He teaches faith, patience, constancy, charity, zeal, and fear.

13. ὁ Ἰησοῦς—βαπτισθῆναι] Jesus comes to be baptized. Why did Jesus come to be baptized?

"To sanctify Water to the mystical washing away of sin." See Ignat. Eph. 18, ἵνα τὸ ὕδωρ καθαρίσῃ. Hence S. Cyril Hierosol. (Cat. 44, p. 45), ἡγήσατο τὸ βάπτισμα βαπτισθεὶς αὐτὸς, and Jerome (adv. Lucif. p. 293), "Dominus lavacro suo non tam mundatus est, quam universas aquas mundavit," and Greg. Naz. (p. 538), "He who was baptized as man, cleanses our sins as God." Cp. p. 687, and cp. Ambrose in Luc. ii. 83. Aug. in Joh. iv. 11. He came to baptize water by being baptized in it.

The Author of the Sermon in S. Aug. Appendix 135, 1, says, "The Holy Spirit who had been present with Christ in His mother's womb, now shone around him in the water; He now sanctifies the water, who then purified Mary,"—a strong testimony against the modern dogma that she was exempt from original sin.

It has been supposed by some of the Fathers (see Chrys. here) that our Lord instituted the Sacrament of Baptism at His own Baptism, when Water was sanctified by His Baptism in it; when the Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity, in whose Name Baptism is administered, declared themselves by sensible signs. As was the case of the other Sacrament, He transmuted the Levitical shadow of the Passover into the Evangelical substance of the Holy Eucharist, so (it has been thought by some) He blended the spiritual reality of His own Baptism with that which was an adumbration of it.

In fact, it appears that soon after this, Christ did administer His Baptism (John iii. and iv.), though it was not made imperative on all till the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost, when the New Law was fully promulgated, and the Old ceased to oblige.

He came to the Baptism of His servant, in order that we, who are Christ's servants, should rejoice to come to the Baptism of our Master. (Aug. in Joh. Tract. v. 3.)

He came to fulfil all righteousness by obedience and humility. For "I am come to take away, by My obedience, the curse of the Law consequent on Disobedience to it." (Chrys.) See on v. 16, and notes below on Luke iii. 21. 23.

14. διεκώλυεν] was earnestly hindering.

— Ἐγὼ χρεῖαν ἔχω] I have need to be baptized of Thee. And therefore they who were baptized with John's baptism were afterwards baptized into Christ, Acts xix. 3—5.

And the Baptist himself was baptized into Christ, if not "baptismo fluminis" (as some of the fathers have thought), yet "baptismo fluminis," in his mother's womb (Luke i. 15), and "baptismo sanguinis," as a Martyr for Christ.

Hence Greg. Naz. p. 687, says, "I have need," &c. So spake the λόγος to Him who is the Light; the Voice, to the Word; the Friend, to the Bridegroom; He who was greater than all who had been born of women, to Him Who is the Firstborn of every creature; John, to CHRIST.

And Christ replied, Suffer it to be so now, for He knew that He would afterwards baptize the Baptist.

16. ἀνεψύχθησαν οἱ οὐρανοί] The heavens, which had been shut by the sin of Adam are now opened at the baptism of Christ. (Greg. Naz. p. 688.)

The opening of the Heavens, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the Voice from heaven, designating Christ, now thirty years of age, as the well beloved Son of God, were not only ministerial to His Baptism, as such, but to His public Ordination, and Inauguration in His Ministry, by the visible Uncction of the Holy Ghost lighting upon Him (Isa. lxi. 1, and Luke iv. 14), and by an audible commission from God for the public performance of His prophetic office of preaching the Gospel. Cp. Ep. Pearson, Art. ii. p. 178. 185.

— ὡσεὶ περιστέραν] as a dove. σωματικῶς εἶδει, Luke iii. 22. Not by any hypostatic union of the Holy Spirit with a Dove, but for a visible sign of the invisible influences of the Holy Spirit, Who for a like reason descended in the likeness of fiery tongues on the Apostles at the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 3). As Aug. says (de Trin. ii. 5), "In order that the hearts of men, moved by the visible and transitory appearance, might contemplate the invisible and eternal essence."

Aug. compares this manifestation to the flame which appeared to Moses in the bush. Cp. S. Cyril Hierosol. p. 46. The Fathers make no doubt that a Dove was visible.

Also, by the appearance of a Dove at Christ's Baptism, the Holy Spirit may have designed to remind the world of what took place at the Creation. The word used in Genesis i. 2, to express the moving of the Holy Spirit on the face of the Waters at the Creation is merachepeth, was fluttering with a tremulous motion, as a dove does (cp. Deut. xxxii. 11); and so prepared the way for this manifestation of the Holy Ghost at the inauguration of the New Creation in the Baptism of Christ. In the tract Chagigah, it is said on that passage (Gen. i. 2), "Spiritus Dei ferebatur super aquas, ut Columba."

We may suppose also (with Chrys. here. Ambrose on Luke iii. 21. Greg. Naz. p. 688) that, as at the Deluge, which was the Baptism of the Old World, the return of the Dove to the Ark, with the Olive Branch in its mouth, was the signal of the cessation of God's wrath, and the return of peace to the world, so the Dove was now visible as an emblem of reconciliation and peace in Christ. (Eph. ii. 11—17. Col. i. 20.)

The Dove, also, is an emblem of those graces, the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22), which are given in Baptism,—love, joy, holiness, and peace (Matt. x. 16), and which are to be cherished by all who are baptized into the mystical body of Christ.

Hence S. Clement Rom. fr. viii. Μακάριος ὁ γινώσκων ὅτι τὸ πνεῦμα Ἅγιον δόσις ἐστὶ τοῦ Πατρὸς. Καὶ τοῦτο ἐν τύπῳ Περιστερᾷ παρέσχε· τὸ γὰρ ζῶον ἀκακίαν ἔχει καὶ ἄχολόν ἐστι· Ἀκακὸς δὲ ὁ Πατὴρ Πνεῦμα ἔδωκεν ἄκακον, ἀνόργητον, ἀπικραν-τον, τέλειον, ἁμάντων ἀπὸ σπλάγχχνων ἰδίῳ προϊέμενος, ἵνα ῥυθμίσι τοὺς αἰῶνας, καὶ τοῦ ἀοράτου δῶ τὴν ἐπὶ γῆρα.

In reference to the event recorded here by St. Matthew, the Arabian impostor had a dove which he taught to fly to his ear, and from which he pretended to derive inspiration; and so he bare witness to the truth of this history.

The distinct appearance of the Holy Ghost at Christ's Baptism, together with the Voice from heaven, "This is My beloved Son," brings out clearly the distinctness of each of the Three Persons of the EVER BLESSED TRINITY; and was an appropriate prelude to the fuller Revelation of the Doctrine of the Ever Blessed Trinity, in Whose Name the whole world is now to be baptized, according to the institution of Christ.

The Mystery of the Trinity is shown in the baptism of Christ. The Lord is baptized; the Spirit descends in the likeness of a Dove; the Voice of the Father is heard, bearing witness to His Son. And the Dove settles on the Head of Jesus, lest any one should imagine that the Voice was for John, and not for Christ (Jerome), and in order that we might know that at our own Baptism the Holy Spirit descends on us, and that we are bedewed with the unction of celestial glory, and are made the Sons of God by adoption in Christ. (Hilary.)

"Gloriosissima apparitio S. Trinitatis, et documentum quid fiat, quando nos baptizamus; nam non Sibi baptizatus est Christus." (Bengel.)

Indeed, in a certain sense, Mankind was baptized in Christ; for, as Athanasius says (Or. i. c. Arian. 46, p. 355), "Christ declares that He sanctifies Himself for our sakes (John xvii. 19). When He had taken our flesh, and the Holy Spirit descended on Him at Jordan, He descended on us because He bare our flesh; and the Spirit descended then, not that the Word might be improved, but that we might be sanctified, and be made partakers of His unction. When the Lord as Man was baptized in Jordan, we were baptized in Him. The Word was not anointed by the Spirit, but our Flesh which He had assumed, was; in order that the unction then received by Him might flow from Him upon all." (Ps. xlv. 7; cxxxiii. 2.)

— ἐπ' αὐτόν] on Him (Jesus), and seen by others. See John i. 32. ἐφ' αὐτῶν would have limited the sight to Jesus. Cp. Winer, p. 137.

17. ὁ Τίός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός] He is supposed by men to be Joseph's son; but He is the Son of ΜΕ (not ἐμός, but μου), and He is My ἀγαπητός, My Only Son. (S. Hippol. p. 263. S. Athanas. adv. Arian. iv. 29. Patrist. ii. p. 488.)

— εὐδόκησα] 'acquievi.' I rested with delight. See Luke ii. 14. Matt. xii. 18; xvii. 5. 2 Pet. i. 17, and Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 249.

For a valuable primitive comment on these incidents in vv. 13—16, 17, see Justin M. Tryph. 88.

CH. IV. 1. Τότε] Then. Our Lord is tempted immediately after His Baptism; showing that the Devil attacks those who are sanctified, and that he desires particularly to gain a victory over them. (Hilary.) Thou hast received arms from God's armoury, not that thou shouldest fly, but fight. He does not restrain the troop of temptations hastening to assail thee; in order that thou mayest learn by resisting them through Grace, that He has made thee stronger than they; and in order that from a sense of danger thou mayest live humbly, and not be elated by thy gifts; and that the Tempter may learn, by finding thee proof against temptation, that thou hast renounced him and his works, and that by resisting temptations thou shouldest acquire more strength to resist, and that from the eagerness of the Tempter to rob thee of thy spiritual blessings, thou shouldest learn their value, and the value of those other benefits which are still reserved for thee. (S. Chrys.)

— ὑπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος] by the Spirit; the Holy Spirit. On the distinct personality and Divinity of the Holy Ghost see Athanas Epist. ad Serapion. p. 518—540, and p. 557; and for a refutation of the most prevalent errors on His Nature and Person, Greg. Naz. Orat. xxxi. p. 556. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. viii. p. 575.

— ἐρημον] the wilderness. Later curiosity has specified the desert of Quarantania (between the Mount of Olives and Jericho) as the scene of the Temptation; just as it has fixed on a certain Mountain as the Mountain of Beatitudes, for the scene of the Sermon on the Mount, and on Mount Tabor for the Transfiguration, &c. But the Holy Spirit has left all these matters, in Christ's History, uncertain; probably with the same design that He had in not mentioning the burial-place of Moses,—viz. to guard against Superstition. See below on v. 1, and on Luke i. 39. Cf. Bengel on xvii. 1.

See also below, on Mark i. 13, and Michaelis and Webster here, on the opinion that the Temptation was in the desert of Arabia.

— πειρασθῆναι] to be tempted. Why was He tempted? "Ideo," says Aug. in Ps. lx., "tentatus est Christus ne vincatur à Tentatore Christianus." And because the trial of earth is necessary for the triumphs of heaven. "Quando tentaris cognosce quia paratur Corona. Tolle Martyrum cruciatus, tulisti beatitudines." (Ambrose, in Luke iv.)

— ἐπὶ τοῦ Διαβόλου] by the Devil. If Christ, the Second Adam, was to be tempted, in order to be like us (Heb. ii. 18; iv. 15), it must be, as the first Adam was, by the Devil; for He could not be tempted from within. "Tentari Christus potuit," says Greg. M. Hom. I. xvi., "sed Ejus mentem peccati delectatio non momordit. Ideo omnis diabolica illa Tentatio foris non intus fuit."

2. νηστεύσας ἡμ. τεσσ.—ὑ. ἐπέινασε] having fasted forty days He was afterwards an hungered. So Luke iv. 2. Moses and Elias were enabled to fast Forty Days, "potestate extrinsecus datā," Christ "potestate propria," which He did not choose to exert beyond that time, and so presented Himself in the infirmity of manhood to the Tempter. He was an hungered. Cp. an excellent Exposition in Iren. v. 21. "Christ," says Greg. Naz. p. 538, "hungered as man, and fed the hungry as God. He was hungry as man, and yet He is the Bread of Life. He was athirst as man, and yet He says, Let him that is athirst come to Me and drink. (Rev. xxii. 17.) He was weary, and is our Rest; He was weighed down with sleep, and yet is buoyed upon the sea. He pays tribute, and is a King; He is called a Devil, and casts out devils; prays, and hears prayer; weeps, and dries our tears; is sold for thirty pieces of silver, and redeems the world; is led as a sheep to the slaughter, and is the Good Shepherd; is mute like a sheep, and is the Everlasting Word; is the Man of sorrows, and heals our pains; is nailed to a tree, and dies upon it, and by the tree restores us to life; has vinegar to drink, and changes water to wine; lays down His life, and takes it again; dies and gives life, and by dying destroys death."

On the term of forty days in the history of the Flood, the Spies of Canaan, the defence of Goliath, the penitence of Ezekiel, &c., see Maltonat, here, who observes: "Non potest fortuitō fieri quod tam sæpe fit."

Observe the recurrence of Forty Days in the History of Christ. He was forty days before the Presentation in the Temple, forty days in the wilderness before His entrance on His Ministry, forty days after His Resurrection before He presented Himself in the Heavenly Temple to God. The term seems often to intimate in Holy Scripture a season of probation and preparation for some public manifestation of glory. See below on Acts i. 3.

On the Quadragesimal or Lent Fast, see S. Jerome here. Aug. Ep. ad Januar. 55. Greg. M. Hom. i. 16. Bp. Gunning's History of the Lent Fast, pp. 46—60. 200—232, Oxf. 1845. Bingham, xxi. 1.

3. ὁ πειράζων] Participle for noun. See viii. 33. Mark vi. 14, ὁ βαπτίζων. Cp. Winer, p. 316. Arnoldi.

— Εἰ Τῖς εἰ τοῦ Θεοῦ] If thou art indeed what thou wast lately proclaimed to be by the Voice from heaven at Thy baptism, the Son of God (iii. 17). How can that be, since Thou sufferest hunger? In what sense then art Thou Τῖς Θεοῦ? This is what Satan would now explore.

Satan begins with flattery, and, as he had done, and done successfully, with the first Adam, by a temptation from the appetite. (Chrys.)

He proceeds, as with our first Parents, by a temptation of spiritual pride, Vain-Glory, and Ambition—"Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." (Gen. iii. 1—15.)

— εἰπὲ ἵνα—γένωνται] ἵνα, in order that; and as a mean and cause, whereby. See xvi. 20. Mark v. 10. Winer, 299.

4. Γέγραπται] It is written. "Viciti adversarius testimonii Legis, non potestate Virtutis. Pugnavit, ut et nos pugnaremus. Viciti, ut et nos vinceremus. Ob hoc se tentari permisit, ut Cujus munimur auxilio Ejus erudiremur exemplo." (S. Leo, Sermon.

xxxvii. de Quadrages.) Christ quenches the false Scripture darts of the Devil with the true shield of Scripture. (Jerome.) And note, that his quotations are all from the Law of God, to show the invincibility of Obedience to His Commandments. "Our Lord defeats the Tempter, not by Miracles, but by Scripture. He routs him by what all may wield,—the sword of the Spirit,—which is the word of God (Eph. vi. 17). Hence learn the value of Scripture, and the impotence of Satan against it." (Origen on Luke iv. Cp. Greg. Hom. in Ev. xvi. 5.)

Observe also that all His quotations are from one only of the five books of Moses.

The Philistine had been defying the armies of Israel for forty days. David took five smooth pebbles out of the brook and put them in his pastoral bag; but one of them was enough to lay the Philistine low (1 Sam. xvii. 40—49).

The Son of David,—the Shepherd of Israel,—after forty days, overthrows the ghostly Goliath by one pebble of the five; and by one book of the Pentateuch, which He took from the flowing stream of Judaism, which was soon to pass away like a winter torrent, while no jot or tittle was to fail of that moral Law which He the Good Shepherd put into the pastoral scrip of the Gospel. See Augustine in Ps. vol. iv. p. 2278, v. p. 230.

— ἐπὶ παντὶ ῥήματι] by every thing that He appoints for that purpose,—as manna and quails in the desert.

Life does not depend ἐπ' ἔρῳ upon bread, but man lives by God's Word which created and sustains all things. If therefore man obeys that word he will not want food, though he may not have bread. And this Christ proves by the Word of God, which cannot deceive.

5. τὴν ἁγίαν πόλιν] the Holy City. Jerusalem, still preserving a memorial of its holiness in its modern name, El-kuds, 'the Holy.' Cp. Winer, R.—W. p. 546.

— τὸ πτερύγιον] The article τὸ indicates something single of its kind; and therefore πτερύγιον cannot mean a porticus or corridor; nor would there be any special eminence in πτερύγιον so understood. It rather signifies the apex of the fastigium, ἀέτωμα, or tympanum of the Temple. Cp. the use of the word (τὸ πτερύγιον τοῦ ἱεροῦ), also τοῦ ναοῦ by Hegesippus (in Euseb. ii. 23, and Routh, R. S. i. 210. 239), in his account of the martyrdom of St. James: there, also, it is evidently a pointed eminence; and it would seem that a person there standing would be visible and audible to a large concourse of people, such as we may suppose collected in the court of the Israelites,—στῆθι ἐπὶ τὸ πτερύγιον τοῦ ἱεροῦ, ἵνα ἄνωθεν ᾗς ἐπιφανῆς, καὶ ᾗ εὐακουστά σου τὰ ῥήματα παντὶ τῷ λαῷ—πτερύγιον = ἀκρωτήριον in Hesych. The Schol. on Aristoph. Av. 1110 says, τὰς τῶν ἱερῶν στέγας περὰ καὶ ἀετοῦς καλοῦσι. See Welstein.

If so, the appeal would be,—If Thou art the Son of God, cast Thyself down into the court below, that if Thou art the Son of God, Thou mayest be adored by the assembled Priests and People in Thy Father's House.

Satan lies in wait in "high and holy places;" especially does he tempt there to Spiritual Pride. (Gloss. Remig.)

6. βάλε σ. κ. γέγραπται γάρ] cast thyself down; for it is written:

This is the language of the Devil, who desires that we should fall. Observe, he may tempt us to fall, but he cannot make us fall. He may persuade us to cast ourselves down, but he cannot cast us down.

Observe also, the Devil expounds Scripture falsely; for if the text from the Psalm (xci. 11) which he quotes, refers to Christ, he ought to have added what there follows against himself,—"Thou shalt tread upon the Lion and the Adder: the young Lion and the Dragon shalt Thou tread under Thy feet." Ps. xci. 13. (S. Jerome.) Although the Devil quotes Scripture falsely, Christ does not desist from quoting it. He uses it aright against him who abused it.

9. ἐὰν πεσὼν προσκυνήσῃς μοι] if Thou wilt fall down and worship me. Satan is ever seeking to be worshipped. Idolatry is due to his Pride (by which he fell from heaven), craving adoration on earth. Cp. Hooker, I. iv. 3. It has been supposed by some (see à Lapide here), that when it was known in heaven that the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity designed to unite Himself with some other Nature, the Evil Angels were envious that He did not take the nature of Angels (Heb. ii. 16), and that some of them fell through Envy and Pride, while, on the contrary, the Good Angels rejoice in God's act of Love, though the nature of Man is thereby exalted above their own (Luke ii. 14). But Satan and his Angels, in their nature, are ever at work to pervert the honour due to the Man Jesus Christ, into homage to some other creature—and specially to themselves. See below on Eph. ii. 2.

10. Σατανᾶ] Ἰαφ (Satan), Adversary. See Zech. iii. 1. Our Lord reserves this name for the Tempter when he claims adoration, and thus declares the Satanic character of Idolatry.

— προσκυνήσεις—λατρεύσεις] Deut. vi. 13, where the original signifies literally, 'thou shalt fear and serve.' But, since the Tempter had claimed worship as an outward sign of awe, our Lord uses a word which signifies adoration. As to λατρεύσεις, the LXX often render the word ἰαφ (to serve) by λατρεύω (Exod. iii. 12; iv. 23). See further on Luke iv. 8.

11. διηκόνουν] were ministering, i. e. food. Hammond.

12. Ἀκούσας] "Decrescente Joanne crevit Christus." (Bengel). On the subsequent history of the Baptist, see on xi. 2.

— παρεδόθη] was delivered into prison. St. Matthew speaks of John's history as already well known to his readers.

— Γαλιλαίαν] Galilee. Then very populous. Joseph. B. J. iii. 2. 10. 7. Lightfoot, ii. 56. St. Matthew here passes over the events narrated in John i. 37; iv. 47.

13. Καφαρναοὺμ] Capernaum, from καφάρ (caphar), a town, and נחם (nucham), comfort. χωρίον παρακλήσεως (Hesych.), villa consolationis (Hieron.). See on John vi. 59. Hence Καφαρναοὺμ, the reading of B, D, Z, is preferable to Καπερναοὺμ. Cp. Winer, R.-W. p. 210, and Robinson (Palest. iii. 282, and Later Researches, p. 345), who places it as Khan Minyeh, at the n.w. angle of the Lake. Capernaum erat florentissima Galilææ civitas, in finibus Sabulonitarum et Naphthalitarum, ad mare Galilææ sita. v. Lightfoot. Hor. Hebr. et Talm. in Joh. ii. 12, p. 139. Quod accuratius autem hujus urbis, quæ Christo domicilium præbuerat, situm describeret Evangelista, addidit τὴν παραθαλασσίαν, maritimam, sitam ad lacum Gennesaret.

Lacus Gennesaret, ἡ λίμνη Γεννησαρέτ, Luc. v. 1. Joseph. B. J. iii. 35. longus fuit, altitudo Josepho I. i. centum stadia, latus stadia quadraginta, Joh. vi. 1; xxi. i. dicitur θάλασσα τῆς Τιβεριάδος à civitatibus Gennesaret et Tiberiade, adjacentibus; et θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας infra v. 18. et simpliciter θάλασσα vii. 24. Lacus autem, λίμνη, vocatur θάλασσα, mare, more Hebræorum, qui non modo mare, sed etiam lacum nominare solent, I Regg. xviii. 32. (Kuin.) Cp. Winer, R.-W. i. 407.

14. ἵνα πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥηθὲν] in order that the prophecy which, as far as the mournful part of it is concerned, was in some degree verified in the abduction by Tiglath Pileser (2 Kings xv. 29), and by the religious debasement of those cities, might now have its full and final accomplishment in the light of the Gospel of Redemption, diffused by the preaching of Christ and His Apostles, who were Galileans, in that land first, which was first overshadowed by the darkness of captivity. Cp. Jerome in Isa. ix. 1, and Mede, p. 100, and see above on i. 22.

15. ὁδὸν θαλάσσης] the way of the sea. Isa. ix. 1. ὁδὸν may, perhaps, be explained by reference to the verb expressed in the Original, and here understood, or it may have the force of an adverb, as πέραν (prop. an accusative) and ἔρη. Other explanations are given in Winer; G. G. 206. Meyer interprets it seawards.

— πέραν] ἔρη, understood here by some to mean near. But it seems to retain here its usual meaning, beyond, (see iv. 25; xix. 1. Mark iii. 8. John i. 28; iii. 26,) and either to refer to our Lord's miracles and teaching in Peræa (where, in fact, our Lord began His ministry, being baptized there, at Bethany, in Peræa. John i. 28; cp. Winer, R.-W.-B. in voce); or else it here describes Galilee, which was beyond Jordan to the Assyrians, of whom the Prophet is speaking.

17. βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν] the Kingdom of Heaven. The fifth, universal, and heavenly and everlasting kingdom, foretold by Daniel (ii. 44; vii. 14. 27), which is to supersede all kingdoms of the earth, and to destroy all that resist it. See on iii. 2. Rev. v. 10.

18—22. Περιπατῶν] See the Homily of Greg. M. in Evang. i. 5, p. 1451.

18. δύο ἀδελφούς] two brothers. He chose three pairs of brothers; building the Gospel on the foundations of natural affection; and He sent out His Apostles and Disciples two and two. See x. 2—4. Mark vi. 7. Luke x. 1. So He had laid the foundations of the Law on two Brothers—Moses and Aaron.

We may observe here that the Dual number is never found in the New Testament. Cp. Winer, p. 160.

19. ἁλιεῖς ἀνθρώπων] fishers of men. Luke v. 10, ἀνθρώπους ἔση (ῥαγῶν) in the σαγήνη of the Gospel, to be drawn through the sea of the world, and enclosing both bad and good fish, and at length to be drawn to the shore—when the separation will be made. Matt. xiii. 47, 48. See on Luke v. 5, 6, and John xxi. 6—11.

Our Lord chose fishermen at their nets: "Volens superbiorum cervicibus frangere, non quæsit per oratorem piscatorem, sed de piscatore lucratus est oratorem." (Aug. in Joan. tr. 7. 1 Cor. i. 26—30. 2 Cor. iv. 7.)

Hence, and for other reasons, Christians are compared to ἰχθύες, fish, in the sea of the world, and enclosed in the net of the Church, and drawn to the shore of everlasting life. One other reason is suggested by Tertullian (de Baptism. 1), "Nos pisciculi secundum ἰχθύν Nostrum (Ἰησοῦν χ. Θεοῦ υἱόν) in aquâ nascimur."

Ζεβεδαίου καὶ Ἰωάννην τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ, ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ μετὰ Ζεβεδαίου τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτῶν, καταρτίζοντας τὰ δίκτυα αὐτῶν, καὶ ἐκάλεσεν αὐτούς· ²² οἱ δὲ εὐθέως ἀφέντες τὸ πλοῖον καὶ τὸν πατέρα αὐτῶν ἠκολούθησαν αὐτῷ.

23. περιῆγεν—ὅλην τ. Γαλιλαίαν] On the reading, cp. ix. 35. Mark vi. 6, and see Mede, p. 67, and Prideaux, Connex. i. 406—430.

— συναγωγαῖς] the Synagogues. As to their uses see below on Luke iv. 16, and Weststein here.

— θεραπεύων κ. τ. λ.] healing. Whenever God introduces a new Revelation He works miracles; thus giving pledges of His power, to those whom He requires to receive His Laws. Chrys., whose remarks here may serve as a reply by anticipation to Hume's objection to the evidence from Miracles.

— πᾶσαν] 'every kind of.'

24. ἡ ἀκοὴ α.] See on Rom. x. 16.

— βασάνοις] βάσανος, 'touchstone,' perhaps from Hebr. ḥāḥan (bachan), probat, thence any trial, torture, or pain, and Βασανιστής, xviii. 34, tortor.

— δαιμονιζομένους] possessed with devils. The opinion (of De Wette, Meyer, &c.) that the δαιμονιζόμενοι of the Gospel were merely afflicted with ordinary diseases, is refuted by the facts—

That they are distinguished from such persons by Christ Himself, see Matt. x. 1. Luke iv. 40, 41. Mark iii. 15; xvi. 17.

That they act and speak as possessed with evil spirits, whom Christ addresses as distinct from the persons possessed by them, and who give to those persons supernatural power; see Mark v. 3—15; ix. 25.

That when the devils go out of a possessed person, they enter into other creatures; Mark v. 12.

That the Devils had a clearer knowledge of Christ than was shown by others, even His disciples, at the beginning of His Ministry (viii. 29. Mark iii. 11. Cp. Arnoldi, p. 138).

As to the allegation, that if men were possessed with devils in Palestine then, such cases would be frequent in other countries and times, it may be observed,

That we do not know the nature and extent of diabolical agency. But the Holy Ghost who wrote the Gospels does.

That Satan exerted his power with extraordinary energy in our Lord's age and country, because he knew that "the stronger than he" was come. And he was permitted by Christ to put forth his power then, with extraordinary force, that by collision with him, in his fiercest fury, the power and mercy of Christ, in casting him out, might be more manifest, gracious, and glorious.

It has sometimes been urged against the truth of these possessions, that they are never mentioned by St. John (Meyer, p. 115). But St. John's silence is a proof of their truth. The other Gospels were read in the Church, and were current in the world, when St. John wrote; and if any thing further had been requisite, concerning these possessions, he would have added it in his Gospel. His silence therefore in this matter, as in many others, is the silence of approval. See John vii. 20; viii. 48, 49. 52; x. 20, 21.

CH. V. 1. εἰς τὸ ὄρος] the mountain. The article τὸ does not point to any particular hill frequented by our Lord; but it signifies the hill country, distinguished from τὸ πεδῖον, or the level ground, where He had just been, and which He had left, to ascend the ὄρος. So ἡ ἔρημος is not the wilderness, but open pasture land, distinguished from ἡ πόλις, or inhabited places (see on Luke xv. 4. John vi. 10); and ἡ πέτρα is not any particular rock, but stony soil, opposed to good ground, vii. 24. See Luke viii. 6; ix. 28.

Christ had four places of spiritual retirement from the bustle of the world—all, in a certain sense, exemplary,—

1. τὴν ἔρημον, the wilderness, for Fasting and Temptation, conflict with Satan.
2. τὸ ὄρος, the mountainous region, for Prayer, Teaching, Miraculous Feeding, Transfiguration, finally, Ascension.
3. τὸ πλοῖον, the ship, a type of the Church, for Preaching and Miracles.
4. The Garden of Gethsemane, for the Agony.

The Mosaic Law had been given from a Mountain; so now the Gospel, but without the thunders and lightnings of Sinai. The Law had also blessings and cursings on two opposite Mountains (Deut. xxvii. 12, 13); but the Gospel at its delivery has one Mountain—of Beatitudes.

From Luke vi. 12—49, it would appear that our Lord had gone up to an elevated and sequestered place, in order to retire from the crowd and to pray, before He chose His Apostles, and in order that He might then instruct them in His doctrine, before He sent them forth to preach. In these respects his conduct was specially exemplary to those who hold office in the Church.

Τὸ τόπος πεδινὸς (not the plain, but a level place) in Luke vi. 17, is quite consistent with τὸ ὄρος of St. Matthew, and is a circumstance added by St. Luke. Our Lord went up εἰς τὸ ὄρος, and He chose a τόπος πεδινὸς in it, in order that He might instruct His disciples who were seated near him.

On the relation of the two Evangelical narratives of the SERMON on the MOUNT, see further on Luke vi. 20.

2. ἀνοίξας τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ] having opened His mouth. He who before had opened the mouth of Moses and all the Prophets, now opens His own mouth. He who had taught the world by them concerning Himself, now teaches in His own person, God with us (John x. 8. Heb. i. 1, 2. Gregor. Moral. iv. 1), and He delivers in the Sermon on the Mount a perfect Code of Christian Duty. Aug. on Sermon. in Mon. 1. See also Leo M. Sermon. xcv. p. 181. For an Exposition of this Sermon, and its fruits in human Society, see Justin M. Apol. i. 15, 16. Cp. Aug. iii. 1492 sqq. Bp. Andrewes, v. 419—440. Chemnitz, Harmon. li. Bp. Taylor's Life of Christ, sect. xii. Williams on the Nativity, pp. 420—460. Burton, p. 85, and Trench.

3. Μακάριοι] "Blessed"—repeated eight times. Seven is the number of rest after labour, Eight is the number of blessedness and glory after rest. See on Luke xxiv. 1.

These Eight Beatitudes afford a glimpse of the eternal blessedness which will succeed the Rest of Paradise; and be consummated in the Beatific Vision of God.

The Law was given on a Mountain, that of Sinai, with the sound of thunder and lightning; the Gospel is given on a Mountain, with words of blessing repeated eight times. Cp. John i. 17.

Now Christ calls all to Him with announcement of blessing; hereafter He will say to those who have disobeyed the Gospel, "Depart from Me, ye cursed," Matt. xxv. 41.

Observe also that the promise of the 'Kingdom of Heaven' is annexed to the first and eighth Beatitudes (v. 3 and v. 10).

This is the consummation of blessedness; the recurring note of the beatific octave. Also, in the eighth Beatitude, the word "blessed" is repeated twice, for the sake of greater certainty and emphasis. See above, Introduction to the Gospels.

doxa." "Inde incipit Beatitudo divino iudicio unde ærumna æstimatur humano." S. Ambrose (de Offic. i. 6). On the Beatitudes see Gregory Nyssen's Eight Discourses, i. 762—837.

— ἡ βασιλεία τ. ο.] In all the Beatitudes, the Kingdom of Heaven is promised in a form corresponding to the grace which is beatified. Aug. (de Serm. in M.), who asks (on Ps. xciii.), "Regnum cœlorum quo emitur? Paupertate, regnum; dolore, gaudium; labore, requies; vilitate, gloria; morte, vita;" "adde (says à Lap.) luctu, consolatio; esurie, satietas; miseratione, misericordia; munditie, visio; pace, filiatio Dei."

S. Ambrose adds (in Luc. vi.), that there seems to be a graduated scale here of grace and glory.

And this seems to be done with a silent reference to the promises of the Law;

To prevent misconceptions as to the nature and ends of His own promises in the Gospel, Christ promises the kingdom of heaven,—not an earthly Canaan.

He then speaks of παράκλησις, or comfort.

Next, He promises inheritance of the earth—with reference to the promised land of milk and honey.

Then He speaks of satiety, opposed to Kibroth-hattaavah (Numb. xi. 34).

Then, of mercy, as opposed to lex talionis.

Then He promises the vision of God,—Jerusalem (visio pacis).

Then He describes the children of God,—true Israel, spiritual Jezeel.

5. κλ. τὴν γῆν] the land; i. e. of promise, of the living (Ps. xxxvii. 11; cxlii. 5); for, Earth is the land of the dying; heaven is the land of the living. Cyril, in Isa. lviii. Jerome here. Aug. Serm. liii. 2—6. "The new heaven and the new earth wherein dwelleth Righteousness." 2 Pet. iii. 13. Rev. xxi. 1—27.

8. αὐτοὶ τ. Θεὸν ὄψονται] They shall have a vision of God. The wicked will see Christ their Judge, as Son of Man (Rev. i. 7), but only the pure in heart will be able to see God.

9. κληθήσονται] shall be, and be owned to be — (ii. 23) even by the children of the world.

13, 14. ἅλας—φῶς] Ye are the Salt to purify the earth, to season all things as sacrifices to God (see on Mark ix. 49); and ye are the Light to enlighten it; but so that men may glorify not you, but Him who enables you to be both the one and the other. (Cp. Aug. Serm. liv. and cxlix. 12.)

"Ye are the salt of the earth," says Chrys. "He does not send His disciples—as the Prophets of old—to one Nation, but to all. He calls them the salt of the earth,—of the earth then corrupted by sin. Not that the Apostles could deliver it from this corruption, but when it was delivered by Christ, they were to keep it in a healthy state. Hence He teaches those virtues which are most diffusive in their nature, and which conduce to the general good and common salvation of all; not by flattering, but by making the wound smart, if necessary, as salt does. He reminds them also of their own perils, consequent on the greatness of their commission. Others may fall and be forgiven; but if the Teacher falls, his punishment is extreme. If the salt hath lost its savour, &c." (Mark ix. 50.) If the teacher errs, by what other teacher will he be corrected? Let Bishops and Doctors look to it; for mighty men will be mightily tormented. Wisdom vi. 6. (Jerome.) "Quo sale sal conditur? non datur sal salis." Maldon. Jansen. Christ calls His disciples the "Light of the World," and He is the "Light of the World" (John viii. 12): they are lighted from Him; He as Light of Light; they as candles, He as the Sun.

15. τὸν μῶδ.] the bushel of the house.

17. πληρῶσαι] to fulfil. Christ fulfilled the Law and the Prophets, by obedience, by accomplishment of Types, Ceremonies, Rites, and Prophecies, and by explaining, spiritualizing, elevating, enlarging, and perfecting the Moral Law, by writing it on the heart, and by giving grace to obey it, as well as an example of obedience; by taking away its curse; and by the doctrine of free Justification by Faith in Himself, which the Law prefigured and anticipated, but could not give. On this subject, see the excellent remarks of S. Irenæus, iv. 12, 13, and 16, where it is shown that Christ is the Author of the Law as well as the Gospel. And so He is said to abrogate the Law. He fulfilled the Law, as a painter fills up a cartoon. (Theophyl.) "Abolito non dissolvendo sed absolvendo, non delendo sed perficiendo." (Maldon.)

As Aug. says, "Ante Christi Adventum Lex jubebat non juvabat; post, et jubet et juvat."

18. Ἀμὴν] Hebr. אָמֵן (Amen). Truth, Isa. lxx. 16. It had been used in the LXX for Hebr. אָמֵן in 1 Chron. xvi. 36. Neh. v. 13, and elsewhere. St. Luke uses ἀληθῶς for it, ix. 27, or ναὶ, xi. 51.

No one in the N. T. ventures to say Ἀμὴν, λέγω ὑμῖν, but HE only who is the AMEN (Rev. iii. 14), the Truth Itself (John xiv. 6). In the last Gospel—that of St. John—the word Ἀμὴν is invariably repeated,—never in any other.

— ἰῶτα] a yod, the least letter of the alphabet; κεραία, something still less, apex literæ. Cf. Procop. Gaz. 1 Sam. xxi. 2, τὰ στοιχεῖα βῆθ (α) καὶ κάθ (ς) βραχυτάτης κεραίας μόνον διαλαττούσης. (Kuin.) In the Hebrew Bible there are above 66,000 yods.—"Colligi hinc potest integritas Scripturæ, nam Scriptura nisi integra esset non posset perspicui impleta." (Bengel.)

19. ἐλάχιστος—μέγας] least—great. An intimation that there will be different degrees of glory in a future state. See the use of βασι. τ. ο. in v. 20, and cp. on x. 15, and on 1 Cor. iii. 12—15.

Accordingly as we treat the Word of God, so will God treat us. Cp. John xvii. 6. 11. Rev. iii. 10. (Beng.)

21. τοῖς ἀρχαίοις] to those of old (Chrys., Theoph., Maldon., Beng.), at the beginning of God's written Revelation, as contradistinguished from ὑμῖν, 'to whom I now speak face to face.' See Aug. Retr. i. 22, and Chrys., Hilar., and Theophyl.

Our Lord not only opposes the Pharisaic corruptions of the Decalogue, but He unfolds it. He gives the kernel of it, its spirit, in opposition to those who dwell only on the letter; for the letter (i. e. taken alone) killeth, but the Spirit (added to it) giveth life. (Rom. vii. 14. 2 Cor. iii. 6.)

22. τῇ κρίσει] the judgment. The Din Mishpat, or inferior court (of twenty-three judges), distinguished from the Superior Tribunal of the Sanhedrim (of seventy-two judges). On these courts, see Joseph. B. J. i. 20. 5. Ant. iv. 8. 14, and Maldonat. here. Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. p. 514.

Our Lord says, that the ratio of anger and its penalties is to contumelious words and their penalties, what the ratio of the former Court is to the latter. And above all, is the Tribunal of γέεννα τοῦ πυρός, for mere contemptuous expressions, and how much more for malignant actions! Against them He sets a double fence, by condemning passionate words and angry thoughts.

— ῥακά] Hebr. קר = kenós, vacuus.

— μωρὲ] The mention of an Oriental word ῥακά in the first clause, and of the Sanhedrim, where crimes of blasphemy were punished, makes it probable that there is a reference to the Hebrew מורא (morah), apostate. Cf. Mintert in v.

— ἔνοχος εἰς] liable to come to. Winer, G. G. 191.

— γέενναν] Gehenna. גֵּי הַחַיִּים (vallis), הִינְנוֹם Hinnom, the valley at the foot of Moriah, and in which Siloa flows (Jerome on x. 28), on the South-East of Jerusalem (Robinson, Palestine, i. 404), desecrated by the idolatrous fires of Moloch (Jer. vii. 31. Isa. xxx. 33), and called Tophet, from Tuph, the tympanum used to drown the cries of children there immolated. Cp. Joshua xviii. 16, where the LXX have γαλιέννα.

This valley was "the type of hell," and Milton accurately describes it as such, Par. Lost i. :—

"First Moloch, horrid King, besmeared with blood
Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears,
Though for the noise of drums and timbrels loud
Their children's cries unheard that passed through fire
To his grim idol Him the Ammonite

Worshipped in Rabba and her watery plain,
In Argob and in Basan to the stream
Of utmost Arnon. Nor content with such Audacious neighbourhood, the wisest heart
Of Solomon he led by fraud to build
His temple right against the Temple of God,
On that opprobrious hill, and made his grove
The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence
And black Gehenna called, the type of Hell."

23. δῶρον] gift. Thy corban. Mark vii. 11.

— θυσιαστήριον] the brazen altar, before the porch of the Temple. He does not say, If thou hast aught against thy brother, but if he has aught against thee; that the duty of reconciliation may be laid on thee. (Jerome.)

25. τῷ ἀντιδίκῳ] thine adversary. An allusion to Roman Law. The Plaintiff might 'in ius rapere;' the Defendant might 'concordare,' till he came before the Magistrate, when law must take its course. Our adversary, as long as we are in sin, is God Himself in His Word, and it is necessary for us to agree with Him by repentance and obedience—for when we have come to the end of our mortal journey, there is no further opportunity for reconciliation. Woe then to us if we do not come to terms with Him while we are in the way with Him. Augustine (Serm. 40 and 109). See below on Luke xii. 58.

26. ἕως ἂν] until thou hast paid the last farthing (lit. the 1/4th part of an as) that is due, i. e. never; for the debt which thou owest by sin is infinite, and can only be paid by the blood of Christ, which is available only to the penitent. Cf. v. 22. See Jerome here, and Ambrosius in Luke xii. 59, and below on xii. 32; xviii. 34. Such as God finds us at our Death, such will He judge us at the last Day. Cyprian (de Mortal. 2). "In what things I find thee, in those things will I judge thee," were words of Christ Himself. See Grabe, Spicileg. i. p. 14. 327, and S. Hippolytus. Fragment, printed by the present Editor, p. 307. See also Chrys. here ad iv. 24. All these testimonies contain a protest against the notion that pardon for the dead can be obtained by works and prayers of the living. See below on Luke xvi. 2, 3.

28. ἐπιθυμῆσαι] to lust after. This condemnation of evil desires was a new doctrine to the Pharisees, who condemned only overt acts.

29. Εἰ δὲ ὁ ὀφθαλμός] If thine eye offend thee. If the love of wife or children intercepts our view of the true light, we ought to renounce it. Hence the High Priest might not defile himself for his Father or for his Mother (Levit. xxi. 11); he must know no other affection but that of Him to whose worship he is dedicated. (Jerome.)

³¹. Ἐρρήθη] It was said. The connexion is, He had said, Cut off a hand, pluck out a right eye; and they might imagine, therefore, that they might be allowed to put away their wives. He corrects this. For the hardness of their hearts Moses permitted the Jews to put away their wives, but if they did so, they were to give a bill of Divorce. (Deut. xxiv. 1. Jer. iii. 1. Matt. xix. 7. Mark x. 4.)

Our Lord allows a man to put away his wife for one cause, and one only. Our Lord reminds His hearers of the former law, which He does not destroy, but correct. (Chrys.) Moses did what he did, not to concede divorce, but to prevent murder. (Jerome.) The Gospel of Christ not only commands husbands to live at peace with their wives, but lays the guilt of adultery at their door, if the wife, being divorced, marries another; and tolerates no other cause of divorce but fornication on the part of the wife. (Hilary.) — ἀποστάσιον] a bill of divorce. The words used by the LXX in Deut. xxiv. 1 are σῆμα ῥήθη (sepher kerithuth) a bill of cutting off, from ῥῥη (karath), ‘abscedit’ (cf. Isa. l. 1); and this word shows that our Lord is speaking here concerning divortium à vinculo; not concerning separation only à mensâ et toro. See v. 32.

³². παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας] except for the matter of fornication. λόγος = ῥῥη, verbum, negotium, causa. Vorst, Hebr. 373.

It is generally supposed by Divines of Rome that ἀπολύω does not here signify to divorce, in its strict sense of severing the vinculum matrimonii (which they suppose to be in all cases indissoluble), but means only to separate à mensâ et toro (see Conc. Trid. Sess. xxiv. can. 7. Bellarmine de Matrimonio), and that Matrimony is in all cases pronounced indissoluble by our Lord in Mark x. 11. Luke xvi. 18. This is the common opinion of Roman Divines; but some of them, e.g. Caietan and Catharinus, do not concur in it. See à Lapide and Maldonat. on Matt. xix. 9. The latter, p. 255—260, gives a clear statement of the different opinions on this point.

But our Lord’s conversation here with the Pharisees is concerning divorce à vinculo; and ἀπολύω is used in the natural sense of dissolvere vinculum, as expressed in the bill of Divorce (Deut. xxiv. 1), see above, v. 31; and the exception contained in παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, is repeated by our Lord in Matt. xix. 9. And it cannot be supposed that any thing taught by our Lord in the “Sermon on the Mount” has been repealed. See Hammond on Divorces, vol. i. p. 595, who observes, that Mark and Luke are here to be interpreted by Matthew; and so Bp. Cosin, “On Dissolution of Marriage,” iv. p. 490; and Bp. Taylor, Ductor Dub. I. v. r. 8. Bp. Hall, “Cases of Conscience,” Decade iv. c. 2 and 3.

On comparing the passages of the three Evangelists above quoted on this subject, and also the words of St. Paul (1 Cor. vii. 10, 11), it appears that in no case does our Lord advise Divorce; and that in only one case (πορνεία) does He tolerate it. Cf. Greg. Naz. p. 650, Χριστὸς οὐ κατὰ πάσαν αἰτίαν, ἀλλὰ συγχωρεῖ μὲν μόνον χωρῆσθαι τῆς πόρνης, τὰ δὲ ἄλλα πάντα φιλοσοφεῖν κελεύει.

Cp. Aug. ep. 89, and other authorities quoted in the Editor’s Occasional Sermons, No. 40, on the subject of Divorce, and below, xix. 9, and notes on 1 Cor. vii. 10—12, and Bp. Cosin, iv. 489.

But in no case does our Lord permit a person to marry a woman who has been divorced. See the following notes.

S. Jerome (ad Amandum, vol. iv. 162), “Qui dimissam acceperit adulter est, sive ipsa dimiserit virum, sive à viro dimissa sit. Adulter est qui eam acceperit. Vivente viro adultera est mulier, si alteri nupserit;” and Ep. ad Ocean. p. 658, “Præcepit Dominus uxorem non debere dimitti, exceptâ causâ fornicationis; et si dimissa fuerit, manere inuptam; et Evangelii vigore nubendi caussatio, viventibus viris, feminis amputatur.”

— ποιεῖ α. μοιχᾶσθαι] makes her to commit adultery, by tempting her to contract a second marriage.

— ὅς ἔαν ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσῃ] He does not say τὴν ἀπολ., but He says generally he who marries a divorced woman is guilty of adultery.

He who marries any woman that has been put away “quâcunque de causâ” (Lucas Brugensis) committeth adultery. As Bp. Middleton well observes, the sense is “any one that is divorced; the principle of this distinction is important.” And it is observable, that in the two other parallel passages, viz. Matt. xix. 9, and Luke xvi. 18, the word ἀπολελυμένη stands in the same absolute form, with no article prefixed, as Winer rightly renders it, p. 111, “der eine von einem Manne entlassene heirathet.”

But if a woman is divorced, does she not cease to be the wife of him from whom she is divorced? and how then can he who marries her be guilty of adultery?

The reason is, that a hope of union with another man who is not her husband, is the main thing which makes a woman unfaithful to him who is her husband. Take away that hope, and the principal cause of adulteries is removed. There is the root of the evil; and our Lord, in His Sermon on the Mount, goes to the root of the evil, by condemning all such unions as adulterous.

Besides, by marrying her he precludes the possibility of her return to her husband. See further on xix. 9.

³⁴. μὴ ὁμόσαι ὅλως] swear not at all; i. e. sponte tuâ. Do not voluntarily proffer, much less vainly protrude, an oath. “Non ames, non affectes, non appetas jusjurandum.” Cp. Aug. Serm. 307, 308, and de Mend. 15.

Our Lord here again goes to the root of the evil, as seen in the teaching and practice of the Pharisees, see Matt. xxiii. 16—Do not swear at all.

But this does not prohibit a person from being sworn, on a grave and solemn occasion. The verb ὀμῶ is used only in Niphal (i. e. to be made to swear), and Hiphil (to cause to swear); as much as to intimate that no one ought to swear, except when compelled to do so (see Bythner on Ps. xv. 4).

The word is derived from ὀμῶ (sheba) seven; a perfect and sacred number. Cp. ὀμῶ (saba) to be filled, and ἡβῶ shabbath (Sabbath) rest; so that an Oath is, as it were, intended to be a sacred rest—a Sabbath from strife. (Heb. vi. 16.) For, as the Holy Spirit says by St. Paul, An oath for confirmation is to men an end of strife. (Heb. vi. 16.) Strife is an evil, and so an Oath arises from what is evil, v. 37, ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ.

But the evil may be, and ought to be overcome with good: for an Oath, on such an occasion, is an appeal to God, as Omnipresent, Omniscient, and Omnipotent, and as the Searcher of all hearts, and the Future Judge of all men; i. e. it is an act of Divine Worship, as the Prophet Jeremiah teaches (Jer. iv. 2), and therefore the Psalmist says, “all they that swear by Thee shall be commended.” (Ps. lxxiii. 12.)

Hence the sin of the Jews not only in swearing rashly and lightly, but also in swearing by creatures; “He who swears venerates or loves that by which he swears; and in the law it was ordered that they should not swear, except by God: but the Jews, who swore by Angels, and the city and temple, honoured the creatures with the honour due to God.” (Jerome.)

The case of swearing is similar to that of taking away life. It is malum per se: but Swearing in a Court of Justice is an occasion of asserting God’s Supremacy, and so an act of Worship, as the punishment of Death inflicted in obedience to God’s law, and in His Name (Gen. ix. 6. Rom. xiii. 4), is an occasion of proclaiming His Justice and dominion over the lives of all His creatures.

³⁹. μὴ ἀντιστῆναι τῷ πονηρῷ] not to resist evil. See Rom. xii. 19. 21. Do not retaliate, do not render evil for evil. On the use of the negative, for the sake of comparison, see on Matt. ix. 13.

The Levitical law of retaliation (Exod. xxi. 24. Lev. xxiv. 20. Deut. xix. 21), though strictly just in itself, was often abused for the gratification of vindictive passions, and for the infliction of evil as such, and not for the repression of crime for the sake of society. This is what our Lord forbids; He commands to check all private feelings of personal hatred and revenge, and to make private sacrifices on all occasions in a spirit of forbearance, patience, meekness, and love, though (as our Lord teaches, Matt. xviii. 15—17. Luke xvii. 3) a regard for public justice, and the welfare of society and of the offender himself, may render it necessary (as it does) to restrain and punish crime.

Thus, for the Law of Retaliation as then practised by the Jews, Our Lord substitutes the Law of Love.

This and the following precepts (see S. Aug. de Serm. D. i. 59) are to be understood as having regard “ad præparationem cordis, non ostentationem operis.” Some conform to the letter of these commands, without being animated by the spirit of them. “Multi,” says Aug. i. 58, “alteram maxillam præbere noverunt, diligere verò eum à quo feriuntur ignorant.” But we must pray and strive to be animated by the spirit, and then we shall not contravene the letter.

—ὅστις σε ῥαπίσει] whosoever shall smite thee. Do not retaliate, but be prepared rather to bear more injuries. “Si quis te percuiderit, noli tu percutere, sed para te adhuc percutienti.” S. Aug. de Serm. Dom. i. 56, i. e. be ready to suffer in a good cause. Our Lord did not thereby forbid to take legal means of self-protection or remonstrance (John xviii. 23. Acts xxii. 25). But He taught by precept as by example, “non solum in alteram maxillam cædi pro salute omnium, sed etiam crucifigi.” S. Aug. ibid.

This precept does not require nor permit any one to surrender public rights, which are not his own χιτῶν or ἱμάτιον, much less Christian principles and Christian truth; for which we are to contend earnestly (Jude 3), and of which we are not to divest ourselves, or to allow any one to strip us—for then we should be naked indeed (Rev. iii. 17, 18), nor allow any one, as far as in us lies, to strip others, and to rob Christ.

⁴¹. ὅστις σε ἀγγαρεύσει] Ἀγγαρος, a Persian word for a royal courier (connected with this is the Hebrew יִגְרֶתֶת (iggereth), a letter), who had authority to press horses, &c. into his service in execution of his mission. See Blomfield and others in Æschyl. Agam. 292. The word ἀγγαρία (angaria) (whence avania and avanie, in Ital. and Fr.) is used in the Talmud for any forced work. If any one shall press thee to do him service,—especially if he has a public claim on thee for duty,—do not contend, but do it heartily.

The word ἀγαρεύω is applied by the Evangelists to Simon the Cyrenian, pressed into the service of bearing the cross of Christ. Matt. xxvii. 32. Mark xv. 21. This is our ἀγγάρευμα, to bear cheerfully the cross of Christ, and follow Him to Calvary.

—δανείσασθαι] to borrow. “Ne voluntatem alienas ab eo qui petit, quasi et pecunia tua vacabit et Deus tibi non redditurus est: sed cum id ex præcepto Dei facis, apud illum qui hæc jubet infructuosum esse non potest.” (S. Aug. ibid. i. 68.) On the question concerning the legality of Usury, see on Matt. xxv. 27.

⁴⁴. ἀγαπάτε τοὺς ἐχθρούς] love your enemies. This is the Christian “Lex Talionis.” Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good. (Rom. xii. 21.)

⁴⁵. ὅπως γένησθε] that ye may become.

—βρέχει] for βῆι, the popular word, still in use in Greece. So βροχή for ὑετός, βουνός for ἔπος, ψαπλ (from ὑψάριον) for ἰχθός, and numerous other words used in the New Test., instead of the more refined forms, and still surviving in the vernacular Romaic. See the Introduction to St. Luke.

⁴⁸. Ἔσεσθε—τέλειοι] Ye shall be perfect. We who are created in God’s image, and restored in Christ, and made partakers of the divine nature in Him, are bound by the conditions of our creation, redemption, and sanctification, to endeavour to be like Him here, that we may have the fruition of His glorious Godhead hereafter. Ephes. v. 1. 1 Pet. i. 15. 1 John ii. 1. Cp. Matt. xix. 21.

This Scripture was abused by the Pelagians, who argued that either it is possible for men to be perfect, i. e. sinless; or else Christ must be supposed to command an impossibility. See Jerome, adv. Pelag. (vol. iv. p. 491), who says,

“Many imagine what is here commanded to be impossible. But Christ never commands impossibilities; but He prescribes such kind of perfection as was attained by David in the case of Saul and Absalom, and by Stephen the martyr in praying for his murderers, and by St. Paul in wishing to be accused for his persecutors. Acts vii. 60. Rom. ix. 3.”

CH. VI. 1. δικαιοσύνην] justitiam, Vulg., righteousness; applied to visible acts of righteousness; specially to almsgiving. See Dan. ix. 24, where בְּטִידְקָה (b'tsidkah), i. e. ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ, is rendered by LXX and Theodotion ἐν ἐλεημοσύναις. Cp. 2 Cor. ix. 10, where δικαιοσύνη has a similar sense. It is used in LXX for חֶסֶד (chesed), i. e. mercy, e. g. Prov. xx. 28. Isa. lxiii. 7.

Here the general word δικαιοσύνη is used by our Lord as introductory to precepts on its three special branches, Almsgiving, Prayer, and Fasting, vv. 2—18.

— πρὸς τὸ] i. e. with that intention. We are to be seen to do good, but not to do good to be seen. Cp. v. 16. Gal. i. 10.

². "Ὅταν ποιῇς ἐλεημοσύνην] When thou doest alms; so He says v. 5, when thou prayest; and so in v. 16 He says, when ye fast. He could hardly have taught more forcibly the duty of Almsgiving, and of Prayer, and of Fasting, than by thus taking for granted that all His disciples will give alms, and pray, and fast; and by teaching them how to do what He assumes that they will do.

— μὴ σαλπίσῃς] do not sound a trumpet. The allusion is to the use of Trumpets to summon public assemblies to see some fair spectacle, or hear some great thing. Num. x. 3, &c. 2 Kings ix. 13. Ps. lxxxi. 3.

— ὑποκριταί] ὑποκριτής, properly a histrion or actor who ὑποκρίνεται τῷ χορῷ, i. e. is an interlocutor with the chorus; and wears a mask (προσωπεῖον, personam), and plays a part. Hence the word is applied in Christian Ethics to those who "tegnut sub personā quod sunt, et ostentant in personā quod non sunt." (Aug.) On the use of the word ὑποκριτής see below, xxii. 13.

Our Lord follows up the metaphor. The hypocrite acts a part on this world's stage, to be seen of men; but your Theatre is to be the Omniscience of God your heavenly Father, and the presence of the World and of Angels at the judgment to come. If you wish to be glorious, conceal your good deeds here, and they will have a brighter crown hereafter. (S. Chrys.) He calls them hypocrites, i. e. actors, wearing a mask; pretending to pray to God, they look around for the praise of men.

— ἀπέχουσι] They bear off with them their full reward; 'id quod iis debetur.' On the use of ἀπό see xxii. 21.

³. μὴ γνώω] let not thy left hand know; much less let it hold the trumpet to thy mouth, — σεαυτὸν λάνθανε. (Theoph.)

⁴. τῷ κρυπτῷ] Observe the article here and v. 6; not a secret place merely, but in secret, — shutting out worldly considerations.

The Fathers give also a figurative sense to this precept, e. g. S. Ambrose (Cain and Abel, c. 9) thus: Enter into the secret chamber (τὸ κρυπτόν) of thine own mind wherever thou art, shut the door thereof against the world, and commune with God. So S. Jerome, "Claude ostium, et mente ora, uti faciebat Anna mater Samuelis." "Hoc orationis cubiculum," says S. Ambrose, "ubique tecum est." We may enter the κρυπτόν or chamber of our own hearts, even in a crowd, — "et ubique secretum est, cuius arbiter nullus est nisi solus Deus," "Qui," as S. Cyprian de Orat. says, "non vocis sed cordis auditor est."

⁷. Προσευχόμενοι μὴ βαττολογήσητε] "Bátτος dicitur fuisse Poëta quidam qui multa inaniter garriebat eademque molestissime inculcabat." (Mintert in v. Cp. Suidas in v.) Hence βαττολογεῖν, to use vain repetitions; to repeat for repetition's sake.

Our Lord repeated the same words in prayer in His Agony, Matt. xxvi. 44. He teaches us here that the essence of prayer is not in the utterance of the lips, but in the colloquy of the heart with God; and by His own practice in His Agony He instructs us that the affection of the heart is stimulated and sustained by the ministry of the lips saying the same words.

⁸. οἶδε γάρ] But since God knows what we need before we ask, why should we pray? Not to inform Him, but to exercise ourselves in communion with Him. (Chrys.) We are not narrators, but suppliants. It is one thing to inform the ignorant, and another thing to beseech the Omniscient. (Jerome.)

He also delivers a particular form of prayer to be used, and to serve as a pattern for the subject and order of our desires and prayers; and therefore as a guide for our practice.

On this Prayer see Tertullian de Oratione, p. 129, Paris 1695, who calls the Lord's Prayer "Breviarium Evangelii," and S. Cyprian de Oratione Dominica. p. 395, ed. Ven. 1728. Aug. de Serm. M. ii. 4—8, and Serm. 56—58, "ad Competentes post symbolum traditum." Gregor. Nyssen. in de Orat. Domin. i. p. 712—761. Origen, περὶ εὐχῆς, i. 226, and S. Cyril Hierosolym. Catech. 23, p. 329. Bp. Andrewes, v. 350—476, who calls it "a compendium of faith," and Mede, 1—18.

As the Decalogue is in two tables, so the Lord's Prayer is in two parts; making together seven petitions, — the first three relating to God, the latter four to man. (Aug.) Bp. Andrewes, v. p. 381.

— Πάτερ ἡμῶν] Father of us. Not ἡμέτερε. He lays the Foundation of Prayer in Love. If God is our Father, we should honour Him as His children; and if He is the father of us (ἡμῶν), we should love one another as brethren. Let us remember also, for our comfort and joy, Who it is that authorizes and encourages us to use these words, the Son of God, co-equal and of One Substance with the Father.

The whole Trinity is addressed in the Lord's Prayer, cp. Tertullian de Orat. 2, "In Patre Filius adoratur, Ego enim, inquit, et Pater unum sumus." (John x. 30.)

— ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὄνομα] Hallowed be Thy Name. God's Name, ὄνομα, Hebr. שֵׁם (Shem), has a comprehensive meaning.

σου.¹⁰ ἐλθέτω ἡ βασιλεία σου. °γενηθήτω τὸ θέλημά σου, ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς.¹¹ τὸν ἄρτον ἡμῶν τὸν ἐπιούσιον δὸς ἡμῖν σήμερον.¹² καὶ ἄφες ἡμῖν τὰ ὀφειλήματα ἡμῶν, ὡς καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀφίεμεν τοῖς ὀφειλέταις ἡμῶν.¹³ καὶ μὴ εἰσενέγκῃς ἡμᾶς εἰς πειρασμόν, ἀλλὰ ῥύσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ.

See Mede, p. 5. It signifies whatever belongs to God,—His Essence, Attributes, House, Day, Word, Ministers, &c. See Exod. xxiii. 21. Levit. xxiv. 11. 16. 1 Sam. xvii. 45. Ps. viii. 1; xx. 1. 7; xlviii. 10; cxlii. 1; cxlviii. 5. 13; Mal. i. 11. 14.

This is to be our first aim and desire in all things—the glory of God, 1 Cor. x. 31. (Chrys.)

10. γενηθήτω] let it be done, as by angels in heaven, so by us on earth. (Jerome.)

11. τὸν ἄρτον—τὸν ἐπιούσιον] Bread—the Hebrew עֶשְׂרִי, a synecdoche for “quicquid ad vitam sustentandam utile est.” Gen. xliii. 25. 31. 32.

The word ἐπιούσιον, a new word, as Origen observes (de Orat.), peculiar to the New Testament, and marking the newness of the precept involved in this petition, seems to be formed in the same way as περιούσιος (superfluous), and is contrasted with it, and signifies what is necessary, not περι-ούσιον, but sufficient for our οὐσία or existence; hence ἔρτος ἐπιούσιος is the same as ἔρτς עֶשְׂרִי (lehem hukki) in Agur's prayer, Prov. xxx. 8; and this petition appears to be derived from it. (Mede.)

It has been said by many learned modern interpreters, that ἐπιούσιος is derived from ἡ ἐπιούσα ἡμέρα (to-morrow), and cannot come from ἐπὶ and οὐσία, for it would be ἐπούσιος.

But this opinion does not seem satisfactory. It is hardly consistent with Matt. vi. 34, to pray to-day for to-morrow's bread.

Ἐπιούσιος, from ἐπὶ and οὐσία, may be compared with ἐπιόρδος, ἐπίσιος, ἐπίσπος, ἐπίορκος, ἐπίοπος, where the vowel i is not elided.

And so the Ancient Church understood the phrase; e.g. Chrys. ἄρτον ἐπὶ τὴν οὐσίαν διαβαίνοντα, and Basil. reg. brev. 253, τὸν ἄρτον τὸν πρὸς τὴν ἐφήμερον ζῶν τῇ οὐσίᾳ ἡμῶν χρησιμεύοντα. Theoph. ἐπὶ τῇ οὐσίᾳ καὶ συστάσει αὐτάρκη, and Euthym. and Suidas, and Etymol. M. ὁ ἐπὶ τῇ οὐσίᾳ ἡμῶν ἄρμός. So also the Peschito and Philoxenian Versions, and S. Cyril Alex. on Luke xi. 3, p. 341, ed. Payne Smith, and S. Cyril Hierosol. p. 329, speaking of daily bread in a spiritual sense, ὁ ἐπὶ τὴν οὐσίαν τῆς ψυχῆς κατασπασόμενος, and so the Greeks now understand it. See the Athenian ed. of Euthym. 1842, p. 110.

The Version of the Western Church has supersubstantialis.

See also Joseph Mede's excellent Essay, p. 125, who observes that the petition may be thus paraphrased, τὸν ἄρτον ἡμῶν, μὴ περιούσιον, ἀλλὰ τὸν ἐπιούσιον δὸς ἡμῖν σήμερον. Schoettgen here (pp. 63. 71. 72) cites passages from the Rabbis, which show that even among the most pious of the Jews it was not usual to pray for the things of the morrow.

The Fathers comprehend also under this bread, the spiritual food of the Word and Sacraments. Tertullian de Oratione 6, “Panem spiritualiter intelligamus, Christus enim panis noster.” “Hunc panem quotidie nobis postulamus,” says S. Cyprian, de Orat. Dom., as the Manna in the wilderness. (Cp. John vi. 33) So the English Catechism,—“all things that be needful for our souls and bodies.”

Hence S. Augustine argues against the Pelagians, that no one is without sin. S. Aug. de Peccat. ii. 10, and c. Epist. Parmen. ii. 10. S. Cyprian (de Orat. Dom.) says “hinc docetur homo peccare se quotidie.”

—ἀφίεμεν] we forgive. The Vatican MS. and Z, and Origen have ἀφίκαμεν, we have forgiven them; before we come to ask forgiveness of Thee.

3. μὴ εἰσενέγκῃς] Quoted by S. Polycarp, Phil. 7. God tempts no one (James i. 13; cp. Aug. de Serm. in M. ii. 9); but He sometimes permits the Tempter to try the faith and patience of His servants, as Job (i. 12; ii. 6), and our Lord Himself (iv. 1). We are taught to pray here that God would not lead us into Temptation, i. e. allow us to run into it—“Ne nos induci patiaris.” (Tertullian)—(though the Tempter may be allowed to attack us), much less go in quest of it; and thus we are reminded of our frailty, and acknowledge it, and our need of grace, and of watchfulness against Satan, and of prayer for the Holy Spirit. Cp. Christ's own prayer in His Agony. See Matt. xxvi. 39, and Bp. Andrewes, v. 458. 467, on this text.

—τοῦ πονηροῦ] the wicked one. Πονηρὸς is to be distinguished from κακὸς, because it always signifies moral evil; whereas κακὸς sometimes means physical evil only.

The Doxology ἐτι σοῦ ἔστιν ἡ βασιλεῖα καὶ ἡ δύναμις καὶ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας ἀμὴν is found in E, G, K, L, M, S, U, V, Δ, but is not in B, D, Z, Lr, or in the oldest Versions and Fathers; and was probably added in the beginning of the fourth century, from the primitive usage of Christian Churches in reciting the Lord's Prayer in their public Liturgies.

Mr. Humphry (on Acts xxi. 14) and Prof. Blunt (on the Christian Church, p. 38) well compare 2 Tim. iv. 18, where St. Paul adopts the substance and order of the last two petitions in the Lord's Prayer with the Doxology.

16. Ὡς δὲ νηστεύετε] When ye fast. Our Lord is speaking here of private fasts, not of fasts imposed by public authority. Fasting was prescribed by the Old Law; but with the exception of the annual fast on the day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 1—34; xxiii. 27—29. Cp. Numbers xxix. 7), the times were left, for the most part, to private discretion. Some (e.g. the Pharisees) fasted twice a week (Monday and Thursday), Luke xviii. 12. (Lightfoot.) Our Lord anticipates that His disciples will fast. On the duty, design, and proper meaning of fasting, see Basil, de Jejunio ii. p. 1—15. 621.

22. ὀφθαλμός ἀπλοῦς] “simplex oculus et purus simplicia intuetur et pura.” “Lippientes oculi,” says S. Jerome, “solent lucernas videre numerosas.” The ἄπλοῦς ὀφθαλμός, or single eye, is that which has only one object, clearly and distinctly reflected on the spiritual retina; viz. the glory of God. “It does not see double,” it does not look to serve God and Mammon. Thy body will be full of light, if thou hast one object in view, i. e. the glory of God seen in the way of obedience to His Law.

See Bp. Sanderson (Prælect. de Obligat. Consc. ii. § 11, vol. iv. p. 31), who observes, that singleness of purpose,—or good intention, properly so called,—here includes good means not less than a good end, and quotes S. Bernard, “Ut oculus sit simplex, duo sunt necessaria, charitas in intentione et in electione veritas.”

“Him, only him, the hand of God defends
Whose means are pure and spotless as his ends.”

24. μαμωνᾷ] Mammon, from Syriac ܡܡܘܢܐ (mammina), riches; which appears to be derived from ܡܡܢ (hamon), abundance. “Non dixit, qui habet divitias sed qui servit divitiis; qui divitiarum servus est custodit ut servus; qui servitutis excussit jugum, distribuit eas ut Dominus.” (Jerome.) Cp. Luke xvi. 9. 11. 13.

This verse is cited μνημονικῶς καὶ παραφραστικῶς by Clement Rom. ii. 6, λέγει ὁ Κύριος, οὐδεὶς οἰκείτης δύναται δυσὶ κυρίοις δουλεύειν· ἐὰν ἡμεῖς θέλωμεν καὶ Θεῷ δουλεύειν καὶ Μαμωνᾷ, ἀνίμφορον ἡμῖν ἐστί. Τί γὰρ ὄφελος, ἐάν τις τὸν ὅλον κόσμον κερδήσῃ τὴν δὲ ψυχὴν ζημιωθῇ; ἐστὶ δὲ οὗτος αἶων καὶ ὁ μέλλων δύο ἔχθροί· . . . οὐ δυνάμεθα τῶν δύο φίλοι εἶναι.

25. μὴ μεριμνᾶτε] be not careful; divided about, be not distracted by. Our Lord does not forbid provident forethought (cp. 1 Tim. v. 8), as was imagined by the Euchites, “qui volebant semper εἰχεσθαι et nunquam laborare,” against whom S. Augustine wrote his book “de Opere Monachorum” (vi. 797; xi. 446). “Dominus,” says S. Aug., “propter exemplum loculos habuit.” But he forbids anxious, restless, and distrustful solicitude about earthly things,—and this He does by seven considerations. 1. The care which God shows for our life and our bodies (see Chrys. and Jerome). 2. For the inferior creatures which exist for our sake. 3. Because all our care is vain without God. 4. From a consideration of the flowers and grass which God clothes and adorns. 5. Because such solicitude is unchristian and heathenish.

6. Because God adds every thing necessary to them who seek first His Kingdom. 7. Because sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. Cp. Phil. iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 7.

— τῆς τροφῆς] its food. τοῦ ἐνδύματος, its clothing.

27. ἡλικίαν] age. Perhaps it may here mean term or space of human life, compared to a race-course; and not stature as in Luke ii. 52; xix. 3, and so Theophylact. It would be a great thing to add a cubit (a foot and a half) to the stature, whereas our Lord is here speaking of something that is least, see Luke xii. 26. No one can add even a cubit's length to the term of life which God gives him. On this use of ἡλικία for age see John ix. 21. 23. Heb. xi. 11, and Weststein's note here.

28. κρίνα] κρίνον is properly the white lily,—the emblem of the Church,—Cant. ii. 1, 2; and also, in a secondary sense, a common name for all flowers. κρίνα = ἄνθη καλλιπνοῦσα. (Hesych.)

29. Σολομών] “Christus verus scivit Solomonis amictum.” (Beng.) On this text see also below, Luke xii. 27, 28.

30. εἰς κλίβανον] the kiln, or oven. From lack of timber in Palestine, χόρτος, grass, &c. was used as fuel. See above, iii. 10.

34. μεριμνήσει ἑαυτῆς] So B, C, G, L, S, V, and other MSS. —not τὰ ἑαυτῆς, i. e. to-morrow will be careful about itself; to-morrow will bring its own weight of cares; do not forestall them to-day. So φροντίζω with genit. Matth. G. G. § 326.

— ἡ κακία] vexatio or ærumna, not ἡ πονηρία, or malitia. See Tertullian c. Marcion. ii. 24. Jerome, Epist. 147, and above, v. 13. Cp. Gen. xlvii. 9.

This adage is found in the Talmud Berachot, fol. 9. 2. Vorst, de Adag. N. T. p. 806.

Our Lord adopts and spiritualizes several proverbial sayings in succession, which were known to the Jews. (See on verses 2, 3, 6 of the next Chapter.) In the same manner as in the Lord's Prayer He adopted and spiritualized petitions from the Jewish Liturgy (see above, vi. 9). He thus exemplified His own precept concerning new wine and new bottles (Matt. ix. 16, 17), and on bringing out of the storehouse things new and old (xiii. 52). In all these cases He animates the old letter with the new Spirit.

CH. VII. 1. Μὴ κρίνετε] Judge not ye. Quoted by S. Polycarp, Philipp. 2, p. 507, who also cites v. 3. 10. On this precept, see Dr. Barrow's Sermon xx. vol. i. p. 431. 456.

2. ἐν ᾧ μέτρω] ἐν preserves its usual sense here, in what mea-

πεις τὸ κάρφος τὸ ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ σου, τὴν δὲ ἐν τῷ σῷ ὀφθαλμῷ δοκὸν οὐ κατανοεῖς; ⁴ ἢ πῶς ἐρεῖς τῷ ἀδελφῷ σου, Ἀφες ἐκβάλω τὸ κάρφος ἀπὸ τοῦ ὀφθαλμοῦ σου· καὶ ἰδοὺ ἡ δοκὸς ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ σου; ⁵ ὑποκριτὰ, ἔκβαλε πρῶτον τὴν δοκὸν ἐκ τοῦ ὀφθαλμοῦ σου, καὶ τότε διαβλέψεις ἐκβαλεῖν τὸ κάρφος ἐκ τοῦ ὀφθαλμοῦ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ σου.

3. κάρφος] note. "Festuca, stipula, palea quæ in oculis involat" (à Lapide) "opponitur δοκῷ trabi." This proverb was already familiar to the Jews. See Talmud Erachin, c. 2, and Baba Bathra, c. 2, and next note.

6. κυσὶ] to dogs. By κύνας S. Aug. understands 'impugnatores veritatis,' by χοῖροι, 'contemptores.' Both were among the unclean animals of the Levitical Law (Lev. xi. 1—7); on whose moral significance see W. Jones of Nayland, Zoologia Ethica, vol. ii. p. 115, ed. 1826. See also his Serm. xxix. on this text.

This, like most of our Lord's proverbial sayings, appears to have been already current among the Jews. See Wetst. and Vorst, de Adag. N. T., p. 780, ed. Lips. 1778, cap. i. of Mifchar Happeninim,—"Ne projiciatis margaritas coram porcis, et ne tradatis sapientiam ei qui ignorat præstantiam ejus."

As to our Lord's use of heathen proverbs, see below, on Luke v. 39. Acts xxvi. 14.

— ῥήξῳσιν] rend you. Pearls are like pulse; and the swine would be irritated by the casting any thing before them as if it were food, when they found that it was not food. Many proofs have been given of the savage violence of swine and dogs in the East. See Wetstein here, and Winer, R.-W.-B. i. p. 516, and ii. p. 438.

11. ὑμεῖς πονηροὶ] ye, being evil—. Scripture does not commend itself to the world by speaking well of it; more wonder is it that Scripture has been received by men as God's word. (Cp. Beng.)

12. ἵνα] On this use of ἵνα see Mark vi. 25; ix. 30. Winer, p. 301. It is the và of modern Greek.

— οὗτος ἐστιν ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται] this is the Law and the Prophets, i. e. the sum of the revealed will of God,—which among the Jews was known by the name "The Law and the Prophets." See Luke xvi. 16. Matt. xi. 13; xxii. 40.

13. Εἰσελθετε] Tisch., Lach. read εἰσελθατε, the Alexandrine form. On these and other similar forms the following remarks from Valckenaer (Scholæ, ii. p. 466) deserve attention. "Observetur, formulam hanc esse Alexandrinam. Pro ἔφυγον, ἔλαβον, εἶδον, εἶπον, ἦλθον, εἶπον Alexandrinum pronunciabant in primâ personâ ἔφυγα, ἔλαβα, εἶδα—in tertiâ autem personis ἔφυγαν, ἔλαβαν, εἶδαν, ἦλθαν, εἶπαν. 14. ὅτι στενή] It is very remarkable that the preponderance of Manuscript authority is in favour of τί στενή, which reading is found in B*, C, E, G, K, L, M, S, U, V, Δ, and many Cursives and Versions, and has been adopted by Meyer, Fritz., Arnoldi, Tregelles, not by Tisch. ed. 1858, and Alf., who read ὅτι with B*, X, and Origen; and ὅτι is also supported by S. Cyril, in his newly-recovered commentary on St. Luke, p. 351, and p. 461, ed. Payne Smith, Oxf. 1859. It is to be observed, that B* has ὅτι δέ.

The reading τί seems to be inadmissible. It appears to be due to the idiom of a declining and barbarous Grecism, using that word as an interjection, as it is explained by Theophyl. and Etymol. M. in Wetstein, p. 343, τί καλῇ, and as is now common in the language of modern Greece, according to which, τί στενή would mean how narrow! But such an interjectional use is without example in the Greek Testament; and the passages cited in its behalf from the LXX (2 Sam. vi. 20. Cant. vii. 6) are not parallel, because τί is there not used with an adjective, but a verb.

Besides, the reader can hardly fail to feel, that such an exclamation as "How narrow is the gate!" is not in harmony with the didactic gravity of the subject, and the majestic dignity of the Speaker, in the passage before us.

It is observable also, that those Editors who have admitted τί into the text are not agreed as to its sense. See Fritz., p. 293. Meyer, p. 165. Arnoldi, p. 197.

The narrowness of the gate appears from various historical types of salvation; i. e. Lot and his daughters in Sodom; Noah and seven persons in the Flood; Caleb and Joshua in the Wilderness; and from our Lord's saying, "Many are called, but few chosen." (Matt. xx. 16.)

The gate is strait; let the knowledge of its straitness stimulate our energies, and make us strive to enter it. See xi. 12. Luke xiii. 24. And though the gate is strait, yet wide is the city—the heavenly city—to which it leads, στενή ἡ πόλις, οὐχ ἡ πόλις. (Chrys.) to be called life. "Vita enim *præ*sens non est vita, sed potius mors." (Beng.)

15. ψευδοπροφητῶν] false teachers. See v. 22, and on Rom. xii. 6. 1 Cor. xi. 4; xiv. 6. Titus i. 12.

16. Ἀπὸ τῶν καρπῶν] From the fruits of their teaching: not from their acts alone, because acts seemingly virtuous are often nothing more than the Sheep's clothing in which the Wolf wraps himself in order that he may deceive and devour the Sheep. See Bp. Sanderson, Sermon ix. § 31, on 1 Tim. iii. 16, vol. i. p. 244. "Non ex foliis neque ex floribus," says S. Bernard, ep. 107, "sed ex fructu arbor bona malave dignoscitur;" and see Waterland on the Trinity, chap. v. vol. v. p. 106.

18. οὐ δύναται] cannot. Christ does not say that a good tree cannot become bad (as Jovinian and others inferred), or that man has no free agency (see S. Jerome), as the Manichæans said; but that while it is good it produces good fruits, as a consequence and proof of its goodness; and it cannot be called good, if it does not bring forth good fruit.

22. ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ] in that Day—the Great Day. Mal. iii. 17. Luke x. 12; xxi. 34. "They will then say to Me." Observe, having concluded His sermon, He presents Himself as our Judge, and describes the Judgment to come.

—προεφητεύσαμεν] preached. See v. 15. Balaam and Caiaphas prophesied. Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar had revelations of the future. Judas worked miracles. Such things are permitted, for a manifestation of God's power, for the conviction of sinners, and for the edification of others. (S. Jerome.)

So He said to His disciples, "Rejoice not that the spirits are subject unto you, but that your names are written in heaven." (Luke x. 20.) He teaches us, that faith will not profit us without works; no, nor will miracles. Hence St. Paul, "If I have faith so as to move mountains, and know all mysteries, but have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." (1 Cor. xiii. 2.) Let us then take good heed not to work iniquity, and let us not consider ourselves disparaged, because we do not work miracles now. We shall be none the worse at the day of Judgment on that account, when God will not require of us miracles, but holiness. (Chrys.)

23. οὐδ. ἔγνων] I never knew you as Mine.

24. ὁμοιώσω αὐτόν] I will liken, or compare him, see v. 26; not I will make him like,—a sense, however, which the word also bears sometimes in N. T., e. g. Acts xiv. 11.

25. ἡ βροχὴ] the rain. "Articulus significat pluviam non de futuram." (Beng.)

"The rain descended. A prophecy verified in the primitive Church, bearing all the brunt of the waves and storms of the world, of People, of Tyrants, of friends, of strangers, of the Devil himself persecuting her, and venting all the hurricane of his rage upon her. She stood firm, because she was built upon the Rock. So far from being injured, she was made more glorious by the assault." (Chrys.)

—ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν] on the Rock, as distinguished from τὴν ἄμμον (26). See above on v. 1. "Mysticæ petra est Christus; 'Ille ædificat in Christo, qui quod audit ab illo facit.'" (à La-pide.)

Christ built His Church upon a Rock, Petra (Matt. xvi. 18), and Peter (Petrus) derived his name from this Petra. See Rom. ix. 33. 1 Cor. x. 4. 1 Pet. ii. 8. The foundation, which the Apostle laid as a Master-builder (1 Cor. iii. 10—16), is the one Lord Jesus CHRIST. On this solid and firm foundation, the Church of Christ is built. But all doctrines of Heresy are built on the sand, which is unstable, and cannot be consolidated; and they are built only to fall. (S. Jerome.) Cp. on Matt. xvi. 18.

28. Καὶ ἐγένετο] This Hebraism, so often repeated by the Evangelist St. Matthew (see ix. 10; xi. 1; xiii. 53; xix. 1; xxvi. 1; cp. Vorst, p. 601), served continually to remind the Jewish and Hellenistic reader of the connexion of the Gospel History with the narrative of the Old Testament. It would be difficult to find any other Books in the World where it occurs in the same manner as in the two Testaments.

29. ἦν διδάσκων—ὡς ἐξουσίαν ἔχων—οὐχ ὡς οἱ Γραμματεῖς] He was teaching them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes.

There were various points of difference between Christ and the Scribes; viz.

In the subject of teaching: Christ taught concerning grave spiritual matters; the Scribes, on frivolous trifles and superficial formalities. (See the Talmud, passim.)

Christ did what He taught. Not so the Scribes.

Christ taught with fervour and energy.

Christ confirmed His teaching by miracles.

Christ taught as the Divine Law-Giver; the Scribes as only doctors of the Law.

Christ in His teaching sought only the glory of God; the Scribes, that of men, and their own.

Christ gave divine grace to His hearers (if they were humble), to receive and do His Word. Not so they.

Christ's doctrine was perfect; that of the Scribes erroneous and defective.

CH. VIII. 1. αὐτῷ] repeated for greater emphasis and clearness. See iv. 16; v. 40; xxvi. 71. Mark v. 2. Winer, G. G., p. 133.

2. λεπρός] a leper. Our Lord enforces His Sermon by a Miracle, and begins with healing that disease, Leprosy, which was regarded by the Jews as almost incurable. Cp. Jahn, § 189.

Observe also, that there is a moral meaning and dogmatic teaching in the Miracles, which the Holy Spirit here records as wrought by our Lord after His Sermon on the Mount;

Leprosy was to the body what Sin is to the soul. Christ heals the Leper by His touch. Human Nature was typified by that Leper. He healed us all by His touch. He touched us by taking our Nature (see Heb. ii. 16), and thus cleansed us. "The blood of Jesus Christ," shed on the Cross, and poured, as it were, into our veins, "cleanseth us from all sin." (1 John i. 7.)

3. ἤψατο αὐτοῦ] He touched the leper. To show that He was above the Law, which forbade contact with leprosy (Lev. xiii. 46. Num. v. 2. Terullian adv. Marcion. iv. 9); and to prove that He is the Source of purification even to what is most unclean, whether in body or soul. He stretched out His hand and touched the leper, to show that He is not subject to the Mosaic law, but superior to it. Elisha did not touch Naaman the leper, but conformed to the strictness of the law, and sent him to Jordan to wash. But the Lord touches the leper; and thus shows that He heals not as a servant, but a Lord; His hand was not rendered unclean by touching the leper, but the whole body of the leper was cleansed by the touch of that holy hand. (Chrys.) See also on ix. 20.

—Θέλω, καθάρισθι] I will; be thou cleansed! "Volo; magna potestas" (Beng.) "Dicit 'Volo,' propter Photinum" (who said that Christ was a mere man); "imperat, propter Arium" (who denied His equality with the Father); "tangit, propter Manichæum" (who said that Christ had not human flesh, but was only a phantom). Ambrose in Luc. v. 12. Thus His Miracles refute Heresies; and teach the true Faith.

"Prima miracula," says Beng., "confestim fecit, ne videretur cum labore facere; posteaquàm auctoritatem sibi constituerat, moram interdum adhibuit salutarem." Cp. Mark viii. 24.

S. Jerome adduces here a remarkable example of error, arising from the exclusive use of the Latin Version, "Volo munda-re," which many of the Latins, he informs us, then interpreted as if "mundare" were the active infinitive, instead of the passive imperative.—"I will, be thou clean." Christ says this to prove the truth of the leper's declaration.

Contrast here the mode of our Lord's working miracles with that of the Apostles. He says, "I will;" they say, "Why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?" And they ascribe the effect to Christ alone, His name, through faith in his name, hath made this man whole. Acts iii. 12—16. Cp. Acts ix. 34.

4. μηδενὶ εἰπῃς] tell no man. Why was this?

To give a lesson against vain-glory. To teach humility.

To avoid giving offence to His enemies by exciting their envy and jealousy. To allow them time to examine into the evidence of His works and claims. To show them that He had no desire to raise a party for Himself, and to set up Himself as a rival to them. Not to expose the person healed to persecution as a disciple of Christ.

To wean them from their carnal and earthly notions of the Messiah; and to teach them what the true character of the Messiah was, viz. one of meekness and suffering as well as of power and of glory.

But yet the miracle was to be made known in an orderly manner by an appeal to the Priests who were legally appointed to examine the criteria of the case (Lev. xiii. 2; xiv. 2; xv. 29, 30), and who might thus be satisfied that He was not at variance with the Law, but revered and obeyed it.

And since the Priests were, for the most part, hostile to Jesus, their testimony would be of greater value; and if they were candidly disposed, they would thus be led to acknowledge Him to be what He professed to be, and what His works proved Him to be. And in His gracious tenderness to them, He would give them the opportunity of making a spontaneous acknowledgment of His Power, instead of having it forced upon them by others.

The Miracle is now made known to all by the Gospel.

—εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς] for a testimony to them that thou art really cleansed; and in order that they may testify to that effect; and recognize me to be the Christ; and (adds Chrys.) for a witness against them, if they will not believe,—which Christ foresaw would be the case; and as a witness for Me, that I have done my part that they should believe.

5. προσῆλθεν αὐτῷ ἐκ] The Centurion came by others whom he sent. See Luke vii. 3. "Non absurdè Matthæus, per alios facto accessu Centurionis ad Dominum, compendio dicere voluit, accessit ad Eum Centurio." (Aug. de Cons. Ev. i. 20, and see Chrys. here.) And it is common with Hebrew writers especially, to speak of a thing as done by him who orders others to do it. See Kuin. and xxvii. 26, and below on Acts i. 18.

This Centurion at Capernaum was a figure and precursor of the Gentile World coming to Christ (see v. 11), and received by Him (Aug. Sermon. 62),—a forerunner of the Centurion at Cæsarea, Cornelius (Acts x. 1).

—ἐκατόνταρχος] On the grammatical form of this word, and others like it (πατριάρχης, τετράρχης, στρατοπεδάρχης, χιλιάρχος), see Winer, p. 58. The MSS. vary between -άρχης and -αρχος, but -άρχης seems to have the preponderance of authority. The Romans in like manner have sometimes -archus, sometimes -arches, sometimes -archa. See the examples in Winer, p. 58.

6. ὁ παῖς] He does not say δοῦλος, but, as in Latin, puer, servant. See Luke vii. 3.

8. μοῦ] Emphatic.—Mei,—humillimi servi Tui, et miseri peccatores.

—εἰπέ λόγῳ] say by word. Do not come thither where my servant is; but only speak here, where Thou art. The centurion had a just notion of Christ's power. And our Lord greatly commended him, whereas Martha, who said, "I know whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, He will give it Thee" (John xi. 22), was re-proved, as having spoken amiss; and Christ thus teaches that He Himself is the Source of Blessings (Chrys.), which He could not be unless He were God.

9. ὑπὸ ἐξουσίαν] If I, who am under authority (i.e. of the 'tribunus legionis' and of the 'imperator'). command and receive ready obedience from my soldiers, how much more Thou, Who hast no superior! Thou canst command Thy ministers (Diseases, the Elements, &c.), and they will obey Thee!

10. ἐθαύμασε] He wondered. "Who had inspired that faith but He Who now admires it? In wondering at it He intimated that we ought to admire; He admires for our good, that we may imitate the Centurion's Faith. Such movements in Christ are not signs of perturbation of mind, but are exemplary and hortatory to us." (S. Aug., lib. de Genes. c. Manich.) See a similar expression Mark vi. 6, ἐθαύμαζε διὰ τὴν ἀπίστιαν αὐτῶν. He wondered because of their unbelief. Not, however, that we are to imagine that this wonder was not real. Christ is perfect man, and the reality of His human affections, and His regulation of those affections, render Him a perfect example to us.

— οὐδὲ ἐν τῷ Ἰσραὴλ] Christ did not enter the Centurion's house, but his servant was healed by Him, present in majesty, but absent in body. So to Israel indeed, and to them alone, He showed Himself in the Flesh; but to the Gentiles He was preached by others. And then was fulfilled the saying, "A people that I have not known shall serve Me" (Ps. xviii. 43). The Jews saw and crucified Him; the Gentiles heard and believed. Cp. Aug. Sermon 62.

12. οἱ υἱοὶ τ. β.] the children of the kingdom. A Hebraism. Cf. on ix. 15.

— τὸ σκότος] the darkness—that which is indeed such. The righteous will be received into the glorious light of the heavenly palace, and there be refreshed at the spiritual banquet; but the children of the kingdom, those who rely on their carnal descent from Abraham, and do not acknowledge Me to be the Son of Abraham, in whom all Nations are blessed, they will be excluded from the glory of the royal palace, and cast into the outer darkness.

— ὁ κλαυθμὸς καὶ ὁ βρυγμὸς] the weeping, &c.; that which alone deserves the name; being more doleful than any other anguish,—both in duration and intensity. "In hac vitā dolor nondum est dolor." (Beng.) See the opposition in ἡ ζωὴ, vii. 14.

15. ἤψατο] touched. This was on the Sabbath-day. See Mark i. 29. Luke iv. 38; and thus He taught His disciples at first privately that it was lawful to do good on the Sabbath. The people did not bring the sick till sunset (v. 16), when the Sabbath was over. See Mark i. 32.

— διηκόνει] she was ministering to Him. By His touch He restored her immediately to health and strength. This no human physician could have done. After a fever a long convalescence ensues before health returns. But in the case of Christ's miracles, it was with Diseases as with the Sea. After a storm there is a swell, before the Sea sinks into a calm. But Christ reduced the fury of the Sea by a word to perfect calm, as He did the rage of the fever to perfect health. She arose and was ministering to Him, thus proving the cure and her own love to its Author; αὐτῷ is the reading of the best MSS. Elz. has αὐτοῖς.

16. Ὁψίας] "scil. ῥας, [quod addit Marc. xi. 11.] γενομένης, vesperi, Marc. i. 32. addit: ὅτε ἔδω ὁ ἥλιος, sed ἔσπερα est Hebr. ערב, et de omni tempore pomeridiano adhibetur. Duas fuisse — πολλοὺς] many. See how, as it were, with a single word the Evangelists sail over a sea of miracles! And that it might not seem incredible that so large a number should be healed in so short a time, the Evangelist introduces the Prophet Isaiah witnessing that so it should be in the time of the Messiah. Chrys.

17. ὅπως πληρωθῇ] in order that it might be fulfilled. From this citation of Isa. liii. 4 compared with 1 Pet. ii. 24, it appears that some of the prophecies of the Old Testament have a double sense,—physical and spiritual; and that the Holy Spirit in the New Testament has enabled us to see new lights, which otherwise would be only partially discerned, in those Prophecies. Cp. Surenhus. p. 222, and notes above on ii. 15. 23.

— ἔλαβε—ἐβάστασεν] He Himself (and no one else) took, &c. and carried. "λαμβάνειν" respondet Hebr. נָשָׂא, quod, ut נָשָׂא, cui h. l. respondet βαστάζειν, non tantum notat, ferre, perferre, sed etiam depellere, auferre, tollere, ut h. l. v. 40. xv. 26. v. Exod. xxxiv. 7. Levit. x. 12—17. Numb. xiv. 8, ubi Alexandrini habent ἀφαιρῆν· verbum βαστάζειν hoc modo occurrit etiam Joh. xx. 15." (Kuin.) Thus Christ is our Vicarious Proxy, and our all-sufficient Propitiation, and Satisfaction. See xx. 28. On αἶψαν in a similar sense see on John i. 29.

19. εἷς] one, 'unus e multis.' Cp. Winer, p. 106, and see xxi. 19, σὺν ἡμῖν.

— ἀκολουθήσω] I will follow. This Scribe saw the crowds following Christ on account of His miracles, and appears to have hoped for some worldly advantage from Him. This man's temper is to be inferred not so much from his own words as from our Lord's answer to them. Christ read his heart, and replied to it. You think perhaps that you will derive some worldly advantage from following Me; but do you not see that I have no resting-place, no, not even so much as the birds of the air?

Observe here generally, that the disposition of those whose conversations with Christ are recorded in the Gospel, may often be ascertained from His replies to them, rather than from their words to Him. He did not answer their words, but their thoughts. (S. Chrys., who refers to Matt. xii. 47. Luke vii. 22. John i. 47; vii. 7.)

20. Αἱ ἀλώπεκες] The foxes. Our Lord would not draw any to Himself by promises of worldly ease. "Servus Christi nihil præter Christum habet," says S. Jerome, ad Heliodor. i.; and we may add "nihil avel." But, says Aug., "pauci amant Christum propter Christum."

— ὁ δὲ Τίδς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου] the Son of Man. The article ὁ denotes that He is the Son of Man κατ' ἐξοχὴν, He who being above all has taken on Him man's nature—the second Adam. A proper name (applied by Daniel vii. 13 to the Messiah. See on Matt. xvi. 13), which Christ applies to Himself (cp. Lightfoot, i. 537) when He speaks of His own Incarnation and its consequences. "Commendat nobis," says S. Aug., de Cons. Evang. ii. 1, "quid misericorditer dignatus sit esse pro nobis; et velut mysterium commendans admirabilis incarnationis suæ nomen hoc sæpius auribus nostris insinuat."

²² λέγει] So B, C; not εἶπεν. There seems to be a contrast between the εἶπεν of these persons and the λέγει of our Lord; see vv. 19. 21.

— Ἀκολουθεῖ μοι] Follow thou Me. "Hoc dixit ei," says S. Ambrose (on Luke ix. 60), "cujus patrem jam sciebat mortuum." The person here described was a disciple (v. 21), one to whom Christ had already said, "Follow Me." (Luke ix. 59.) Our Lord, when He had called him, knew what would happen to his father; and our Lord, by precept and example, taught filial love and obedience (Luke ii. 51. Matt. xv. 6), and yet He here says, "Follow Me." Hence we may be sure that no duty to the parent was infringed by obeying Christ. But, as S. Ambrose says (lib. vii. in Luc. ix. 59), "Paterni funeris sepultura prohibetur, ut intelligas humana posthabenda divinis." Our Lord shows the vast importance and paramount duty of following Him immediately, alone, and with the whole heart, by contrasting with this duty, and subordinating to it, the natural desire and obligation of burying the dead (see Tobit xii. 12), and especially a dead parent. Hence Chrys. here, "You may say, was it not unnatural in a son not to bury his father? Yes; if he was absent from indifference. But Jesus forbade him to go, in order to show, that nothing, not even the most important work of natural duty and affection, is so momentous as care for the kingdom of heaven; and nothing, however urgent, should cause us to be guilty of a moment's delay in providing first for that. What earthly concern could be more necessary than to bury a father? a work too which might be dispatched speedily.—And yet the answer is, 'Let the dead bury their dead.' Follow thou Me." If, then, it is not safe to spend even so little time as is requisite for the burial of a parent, to the neglect of spiritual things, how guilty shall we be, if we allow slight and trivial matters to withdraw us, who are Christ's disciples, from His service! (Luke ix. 62.) But rather let us endeavour, with Christ's aid, to raise those who are spiritually dead and buried, from the death of sin to a life of righteousness, as He raised Lazarus from the tomb; and then we shall be His disciples indeed."

The strength of Abraham's faith was tried and proved by the command to slay his son. The strength of this man's faith was tried by the answer given to his request, "Suffer me first to bury my father."

See also below, xii. 46—50, where our Lord illustrates in His own conduct to His mother what He teaches here. And see the comment of S. Augustine on Luke ix. 59; and cp. Luke xiv. 26.

— ἄφες τοὺς νεκροὺς] Suffer those who have not been called by Me, who are as yet dead (John v. 25) in trespasses and sins; who have not risen to life in Me,—suffer them to bury their dead.

The words suffer the dead to bury their own dead have a double meaning.

They signify, Suffer those who are as yet spiritually dead, to bury their own relations who are naturally dead. Do not be uneasy about thy father's burial; there are enough besides thee to attend to that; and thus the word νεκροὺς has a double sense. Cp. John v. 25—28; xi. 25, 26.

And, secondly, they have a general moral sense, Suffer men who are dead in trespasses and sins, to attend to the concerns of this lower world, which is a mere body of death. (Rom. vii. 24.) Suffer men, who are spiritually dead, to be thus engrossed in their dead works—in their perpetual funerals. But I am The Resurrection and the Life; therefore follow thou Me: and "go thou and preach the Gospel" (Luke ix. 60); preach it to them who are dead, and so raise them from that which is indeed death,—raise them from the grave of the soul, instead of following others to that of the body. Our Lord does not mean that the burial of the dead is not a good and necessary work (see on Acts viii. 2); but what He intends to say is, that the most pious act of ministration to the body, even of a deceased parent, is to be forborne by a son, when Christ calls him to His service, and if it would interfere with obedience to His command; and thus He shows the paramount importance of that service, and the primary duty of obedience to Him.

²³ τὸ πλοῖον] the ship. Observe τὸ. Cp. v. 18. "Jesus habebat scholam ambulantem." (Bengel.) This ship, which carried Christ, and in which He taught,—sometimes near shore, where the people stood; sometimes in calm, sometimes in storm,—was a beautiful emblem of the Church sailing over the waters of this world on her voyage to the harbour of Eternity.

— ἐκάθευδε] was sleeping. He fell asleep to exercise the faith of His disciples, εἰ ἄρα ἐν πειρασμοῖς ἀκλόνητοί εἰσι (Theophyl. in Luc. viii. 23). He fell asleep, as Man; when He was about to command the wind and the waves, as God.

He thus combined, as usual, a proof of His Manhood with the evidence that He was now about to give of His Godhead, so that they might never think of the one without being reminded of the other. See on John xi. 35.

He was sleeping. We have a type of this action in Jonas, who slept when the others were in peril, and was awakened and rescued those who were labouring in the storm, by the mysterious action of his own self-sacrifice. (Jerome.) The Church is a ship, and bears passengers of different sorts, and is tossed by the winds and waves of this world. Christ invites all to this ship. A storm arises; the sea is agitated; those who are on board fear; Christ is awakened; He rebukes the disciples, because they have little faith, and calms the storm. Those Churches are in danger of being wrecked, where the Word of God is not awake; where Christ is slumbering in us by reason of our sleep. But where faith watches, there is no fear of wreck from the powers of this world. S. Hilary.

²⁵ σώσον] save us. A mark of truth,—the Evangelists describe their own weaknesses. They were ambitious, and timorous, and ignorant, before the day of Pentecost. The Holy Ghost changed their hearts.

²⁶ Τί δειλοί ἐστε, ὀλιγόπιστοι,] Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? They had some faith, for they came to Christ; but it was a weak faith, for they awoke Him. They did not wait patiently, relying on the power and love of Him whose disciples they were, and who had led them into the storm.

They did not yet understand that while He slept as man, yet, as God, He neither slumbers nor sleeps.

Why are ye so fearful, O ye of little faith? By these words He censures all irregular ways of endeavouring to extricate ourselves from difficulties. Such irregular methods argue lack of faith. They are acts of irreverence,—like that of the disciples disturbing Christ in His slumber. If the times are such, that we can neither row nor sail in the vessel of the Church, we must wait patiently in the ship, till He arises and calms the storm. Then the words apply, "In quietness and confidence shall be your strength" (Isa. xxx. 15); and "Their strength is to sit still" (xxx. 7); and "Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord" (Exod. xiv. 13).

²⁷ οἱ ἄνθρωποι] The sailors, not disciples. Some allege (Meyer, 184) that this is at variance with Mark iv. 41. Luke viii. 25, as if the remark might not have been made by many.

²⁸ Γεργεσηνῶν] This seems to be the true reading here, called Γαδαρηνῶν by St. Mark v. 1, and St. Luke viii. 26; who mention only one daemoniac, "quia ille nobilior et famosior," says S. Aug., de Cons. Ev. ii. 24. So Chrys. These circumstantial differences (not contradictions) show independence of knowledge, and are evidences of truth. See further on Mark v. 2. Luke viii. 31.

The reading in the text (Γεργεσηνῶν) is authorized by very strong MS. testimony. Gadara is mentioned by Josephus as the principal town of Peraea, and as a Greek city (hence the swine, Bell. Jud. iv. 8, 3. Ant. xiii. 13, 3; xvii. 13), and as sixty stadia from Tiberias. (Joseph. vit. 65.) Cp. Stanley on Palestine, 373.

Gerasa is mentioned by the same writer as on the eastern frontier of Peraea, and is called a city of Arabia by Origen. Cp. Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 3, 3; iv. 9, 1.

Gergesa is mentioned by Origen (in Johan. tom. iv. vol. i. 239, Lomm.) as near the Lake of Tiberias, and as the scene of the Miracle.

He speaks of the reading Γερασσηνῶν as a common one in the MSS. which he had seen, and appears to prefer Γεργεσηνῶν on the ground of local tradition: and he mentions Γαδαρηνῶν as found in some few MSS.

See Bloomfield, Excursus, p. 890, for some interesting topographical details. Probably the miracle took place on the confines, between the districts of Gadara and Gergesa; and some of the masters of the swine may have belonged to Gadara and some to Gergesa. The mention of both, as well as other circumstantial variations, bespeak independent knowledge in the Evangelists. Tregelles (p. 192) prefers Γαδαρηνῶν in St. Matt., and Γερασσηνῶν in St. Luke and St. Mark.

²⁹ Τί ἡμῖν καὶ σοί] See on John ii. 4.
— πρὸ καιροῦ] before the season, i. e. before the day of Judgment.

The present text affords much light on the question concerning the present condition of Evil Spirits.

It is a popular opinion—one adopted even by Milton in the Paradise Lost (ii. v. 115—20; iii. 200—210)—that the Devils are already in Hell.

But this notion is erroneous.

As yet the Evil Spirit has great liberty and power in the world. He is called in Scripture, the Prince of this world; the God of this world; the Prince of the power of the air. (John xiv. 30. 2 Cor. iv. 4. Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12. 1 Pet. v. 8.)

But when the καιρὸς, or season of Judgment, is come, he will be cast into the Lake of Fire (Matt. xxv. 41. Rev. xx. 10), and there he will be tormented, βασανισθήσεται (Rev. xx. 10).

Cp. Aug. de Civ. Dei, viii. 23. Joseph Mede, Discourse iv. p. 23—25, and Luke viii. 31, and the note below on Eph. ii. 2.

³⁰ χοίρων] swine; which, being unclean, it was not lawful for Jews to keep. (Lightfoot.)

³² ὥρμησε πᾶσα ἡ ἀνέλη] the whole herd rushed. How many daemons were cast out from this one man by Christ, since they were able to fill this herd of swine, and drive them down into the deep! See here a visible proof of the power and fierceness of Satan and his associate fiends, who will hurry all those that admit them into their hearts, with furious impetuosity into the gulf of the Lake—the Lake of Fire. If the contemplation of this awful spectacle can save a single soul from everlasting death, let no one question the merciful design of this stupendous miracle, by which the devils themselves are made ministerial to the display of Christ's power, and to the publication of a warning against their own deadly designs.

³⁴ παρεκάλεσαν ὅπως μεταβῇ] they besought him to depart. An example of servile fear. Contrast the case of the Samaritans and the consequences (John iv. 40). Fear is the beginning of wisdom (Prov. ix. 10), but perfect love casteth out fear (1 John iv. 18).

CH. IX. 1. τὸ πλοῖον] the ship. See viii. 23.

— ἰδίαν πόλιν] his own city. Capernaum. iv. 13. Mark ii. 1.

² τὴν πίστιν αὐτῶν] their faith, as shown by the circumstances mentioned by St. Mark, ii. 3, 4. Luke v. 17—20.

— Θάρσει, τέκνον, ἀφέωνται] ἀφέωνται = ἀφείνται. Luke vii. 47, 48. 1 John ii. 12, Thy sins have been already forgiven thee. The Work precedes the Word; an evidence of Love and Power in the Agent and Speaker; τέκνον, son, a word of condescension and love, suggesting that Our Lord saw the operation of faith in the paralytic himself, who, with his shattered frame, would not have consented to be borne to the roof, unless he had believed that Christ was able to heal him.

Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance (xiii. 12). The paralytic came with faith for bodily health, and he receives a greater gift,—health of the soul, and bodily health also.

³ βλασφημεῖ] he blasphemeth, usurps the prerogative of God. See below, xxvi. 65.

⁴ ἰδὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις] when Jesus saw their thoughts. The Pharisees accused Him of blasphemy because He forgave sin, for God only can do that. But He proved Himself God; for He showed that He knew their thoughts. God alone reads the heart (Jer. xvii. 10; xx. 12); and by healing the body, He who sees the soul proves that He is able to heal the soul. By the same power as that with which I read your thoughts, I have healed his soul. (Cp. Jerome here.) And so by what was visible He manifested what was invisible. The Pharisees perhaps thought Him a deceiver, because He professed to act upon what was invisible, the soul, and did not act upon what was visible, the body. Therefore He heals the body which they could see, in order that all may know that He can heal the soul which they cannot see.

At the same time He thus teaches, that the cause of disease is sin, and that when that is destroyed, the body will enjoy angelic health and beauty.

εἶπεν, Ἰνατί ὑμεῖς ἐνθυμεῖσθε πονηρά ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν; ⁵ τί γάρ ἐστιν εὐκοπώτερον, εἰπεῖν, Ἀφέωνταί σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι, ἢ εἰπεῖν, Ἐγείρε, καὶ περιπάτει; ⁶ ἵνα δὲ εἰδῆτε, ὅτι ἐξουσίαν ἔχει ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἀφίεναι ἁμαρτίας, τότε λέγει τῷ παραλυτικῷ, Ἐγερθεὶς ἄρον σου τὴν κλίνην, καὶ ὑπάγε εἰς τὸν οἶκόν σου. ⁷ καὶ ἐγερθεὶς ἀπῆλθεν εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ. ⁸ ἰδόντες δὲ οἱ ὄχλοι ἐθαύμασαν, καὶ ἐδόξασαν τὸν Θεὸν τὸν δόντα ἐξουσίαν τοιαύτην τοῖς ἀνθρώποις.

— Ἰνατί ὑμεῖς ἐνθυμεῖσθε πονηρά] Why do you blaspheme in your hearts, by accusing Me of Blasphemy? From the very fact of My claiming power to forgive sins, you ought to have inferred that I possess it. For I have already proved My Divine Power and My Divine Truth by many Miracles. See the preceding Chapter, which is full of them.

Why, therefore, do you harbour evil thoughts in your hearts? Wicked thoughts they are, for they are directed against Him Who claims power, and has proved that He has power, to do what is even a greater work than the restoration of health, viz. to forgive sins;—they are directed against Him Who is God.

⁵ τί γάρ ἐστιν εὐκοπώτερον] for which is easier? It is easier to heal the body than the soul; and therefore I have proceeded to do what is the more difficult work of the two, i. e. to heal the soul. I have forgiven his sins. But you do not believe that I can do that. You even accuse Me of blasphemy for professing to do it: but you are guilty of blasphemy while you accuse Me of it. And therefore, ἵνα εἰδῆτε, in order that you may know that I can do it, I will do what is more easy, but is visible to you. I will give health to the body, that you may know by this outward sign that the inward act has been done. By that which you see,—namely, that the paralytic is enabled by My power to carry the burden on which his body lay, you shall be convinced that the weight of his sins has been taken off by Me from his soul.

Hence S. Athanasius demonstrates the Divinity of Christ, Adv. Arian. iii. 4, p. 438.

⁶ ἐξουσίαν ἔχει ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς] the Son of Man hath authority on earth to forgive sins. Christ forgives sins not only as God, by His Omnipotence, but as Son of Man; because He has united man's nature to His own, and in that nature has fulfilled the law, and perfected obedience, and so merited to receive all power on earth (Matt. xxviii. 18) in that nature; which power He now exercises as Mediator, and will continue to exercise, till all enemies (Satan, Sin, and all their powers and adherents) are put under His Feet. As Son of Man He ever exercises this power of forgiving sin on earth, by means of the Word and Sacraments, and by the Ministry of Reconciliation (2 Cor. v. 18, 19), and by whatever appertains to what is called "the Power of the Keys." "Per eos dimittit (Dominus) peccata," says S. Ambrose on Luke v. 20, "quibus dimittendi tribuit potestatem." See Bp. Andrewes, Sermon ix. vol. iii. p. 263. 277—279.

Besides, by saying that sins are forgiven "upon earth," our Lord reminds us that after death there is no more place for repentance and forgiveness, for then the door will be shut. (Theophyl. on Luke v. 24.)

— Ἐγερθεὶς ἄρον σου τὴν κλίνην] Arise and take up thy bed and go to thine house. Here was a visible sign of invisible grace. He who restored health to the body, and gave a public proof of the restoration by enabling him to carry that whereon he lay bed-ridden, thus proved manifestly to all, that He had by His word raised him from that sick-bed of sin on which he lay, a paralytic in soul. He thus gave visible evidence of His power to work invisible cures; i. e. to give birth and health to the soul by His divine power, working in and by the means of grace. "Surge, excussâ paralyti, et, ut id probes toti populo, porta lectum tuum, ut jam curatus à Me portes eum, qui te paralyticum paulò antè portavit." (à Lap.) Rise, and carry that, which has hitherto carried thee; σου is emphatic here, and is so placed in the sentence.

Paralysis is a type of that spiritual state of bed-ridden incapacidity and impotence which is called acedia (ἀκηδία), and is a proper subject of mercy and aid from others, and can only be cured by being carried and laid at the feet of Christ, Who alone can enable the soul to rise and carry its bed. Rom. vii. 24.

"Observe, that the couch of the Paralytic, which before was the proof of his sickness, was now made the proof of his cure." (Chrysolog.) The sin which once carried us when sick, is to be carried by us when we are restored to health, and thus it will be proved that Christ has indeed said to us, "Thy sins are forgiven thee." When the drunkard becomes an example of temperance, and the libertine becomes a pattern of holiness, he carries the bed on which he once lay; and he proves the power and love of his Saviour.

⁹ τελώνιον] the receipt of custom. Probably at or near Capernaum, where he collected port-duties and customs from those who traversed the lake.

— Ματθαῖον] Matthew; i. q. ἡμαρ (Mattiyah), i. e. donum Dei, i. q. Gr. Θεόδωρος. See Mark ii. 14. See the wisdom of the Apostle. He does not disguise his former life, as a publican, but calls himself by the name which he afterwards bore (Matthew), whereas the other Evangelists veil it with his other name, Levi (Mark ii. 14. Luke v. 27). (Jerome.)

In a like spirit, in the Apostolic catalogue he calls himself Matthew the publican,—which they do not; thus he identifies himself with the Matthew here called by Christ, and named Levi by the two other Evangelists. See on x. 3.

Hence it is clear, that Levi and Matthew are not (as some suppose) two different persons, but two different names of the same person. The difficulty which some have imagined in the mention of Matthew here without any note of his oneness with Levi, and in the mention of Levi by the other two Evangelists without any note of his oneness with Matthew, will disappear before the moral considerations stated above, combined with the reflection that all the Gospels were dictated by one Spirit, and form one whole, of which the component parts mutually illustrate one another.

That mode of Interpretation which severs one Gospel from another, can never lead to any good result.

Some Sceptics (Porphry and Julian) objected, that it was irrational for a man to rise and quit his calling immediately at the bidding of another. But many miracles had been wrought by Christ, and had been seen by the Apostles before they believed. And the radiance and majesty of the hidden Deity beaming in our Lord's countenance might easily draw many even on the first aspect; for if there is so much power in the magnet and in amber to attract objects to them, how much more could the Lord of All draw to Himself whom He would! (Jerome.)

Observe, our Lord calls him from the receipt of custom, that is, from the midst of his worldly business, as He called Saul in the heat of persecution. A signal proof of divine power. (Chrys.)

¹⁰ τῇ οἰκίᾳ] the house. St. Matthew's house. Observe his modesty. He does not mention that this was his own house, and that he made a δοχὴ μεγάλη, great feast for Christ (as St. Luke relates, v. 29, cp. Mark ii. 15); whence it appears that he left much to follow Christ. But of this he says nothing.

Physician of Souls (see Isa. liii. 4—7); and therefore the sense of these words seems to be, “they who imagine themselves to be well, as ye Pharisees do, have no need, feel no want of, have no desire for, My healing care,—non Me egetis: but they who are sick, i. e. are sensible of their sins.” See note on next verse and on Luke xv. 7, οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχονσι μετανοίας. The words οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχονσι, signifying, do not feel the want, are used precisely in this way by the LXX in Prov. xviii. 2, οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχει σοφίας ἐνδεὴς φρενῶν.

¹³ πορευθέντες μάθετε] You who have come here to teach the Law, go and learn it.

—[ἔλεον] Mercy. Hos. vi. 6 ἡσέδ (chesed), which you Pharisees limit to external acts, of almsgiving, to the body; but it is an affection of the heart, showing itself generally in acts of mercy and tenderness and love both to body and soul. Tisch. and Lachmann prefer ἔλεος, the neuter form, and so Winer, p. 62; but many MSS. have the masculine in Matt. xii. 7; xxiii. 23. Titus iii. 5; and in the LXX, whence these words are quoted, the masculine is often found.

—καὶ οὐ θυσίαν] and not sacrifice: i. e. mercy rather than sacrifice; and so, that sacrifice is a vain abomination without it. A Hebrew use of the negative, in order to bring out more forcibly the need and value of the one thing, which is contrasted with, and preferred to, another, good in itself, and even prescribed by God, as sacrifice was. Cp. 1 Sam. viii. 7. Prov. viii. 10. Jer. vii. 22. Joel ii. 13. John vi. 27. Luke xiv. 12. 26. Heb. viii. 11. 1 Cor. i. 17. “Comparativus sæpe ita circumscribitur, ut alterum et quidem inferius ex duobus comparatis negetur, alterum affirmetur, cui excellentia tribuenda est.” See Glass. Phil. Sacra, p. 468 (lib. iii. tract. v.). Winer, p. 439, and cp. on 1 Cor. xv. 10.

On this text, as expressive of the true genius of Christianity, see Bp. Butler's Analogy, pt. ii. chap. i., near the end.

—οὐ γὰρ ἦλθον καλέσαι δικαίους] I came not to call those who think themselves righteous, but those who confess themselves sinners, to repentance. So σοφοὶ and συνετοὶ, those who think themselves wise. (Matt. xi. 25. Luke x. 21. 1 Cor. i. 19. See also on Luke vii. 48.)

It is a rule of frequent use in sacred criticism, that “opinio hominum sæpe pro re ipsa ponitur” (Glass. Phil. S. p. 699, e. g.), as here, they who in their own opinion are δίκαιοι, are called δίκαιοι. Thus St. Paul, 1 Cor. i. 21, speaks of the ‘foolishness of preaching,’ i. e. of what was accounted foolishness by men. Cp. Gal. i. 6. See also a similar use of verbs, Mark vi. 48.

This text is cited by Clem. Rom. ii. 2, thus: ὁ δὲ εἶπεν ὅτι πολλὰ τὰ τέκνα τῆς ἐρήμου (Isa. liv. 1). Ἐτέρα δὲ Γραφὴ λέγει, ‘οὐ γὰρ ἦλθον—ἁμαρτωλοῦς,’ whence it appears that the writer regarded the Gospel of St. Matthew as Scripture no less than Isaiah.

¹⁴ οἱ μαθηταὶ Ἰωάννου] the disciples of John. St. Luke says (v. 33) the Pharisees. Some Critics (De Wette, Meyer) have alleged that therefore one of the two Evangelists is wrong. But Mark (ii. 18) teaches us that both are right. An important lesson. What, if we had a fifth Evangelist? The few seeming discrepancies in the Four would then perhaps disappear. But they are left to try our Faith. The Fifth Gospel will be the Coming of Christ.

¹⁵ οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος] the sons of the bridechamber. ἡνῆψ ἡ (beney hachathunnah). The Hebrew בן (ben), son, is often used for a friend, disciple, follower, inhabitant, &c. So υἱοὶ βασιλείας, Matt. viii. 12; υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, Luke xvi. 8; xx. 34; οἱ υἱοὶ ὁμῶν, Matt. xii. 27. (Cp. Zech. ix. 13, and see Vorst, de Hebr. cap. xxiv., and below, Matt. xxiii. 15, and on Luke x. 6. John xvii. 12.) Our Lord answers St. John's disciples by an allusion to their Master's words (John iii. 29), “He that hath the bride is the bridegroom, but the friend of the bridegroom (i. e. their Master, John) rejoiceth to hear the bridegroom's voice.”

By His Incarnation the Son of God has married our nature, and espoused to Himself a Church, and He therefore calls Himself the Bridegroom, cp. xxv. 1; and as long as He was present in His body on earth the children of the bridechamber could not fast; but now that He is gone away into heaven, they must fast till He returns, and the Marriage of the Lamb and of the Bride is come (Rev. xix. 7), and then they will no more fast, but celebrate an eternal festival.

¹⁷ ἀσκοὺς παλαιούς] ‘utres veteres,’ leather skins that are old; used as bottles. See Josh. ix. 4. 13.

“Utres veteres, Pharisæi; novi, discipuli; vinum, Evangelium.” (Beng.) “My disciples have not yet been made new by the Holy Spirit, and I must deal with them accordingly. (John xvii. 12.) I must not commit too much to them which is not fitted to their as yet imperfect condition. He thus bequeaths a law to His own disciples, that when they make converts they should treat them with gentleness.” (Chrys.) See also Jerome here.

²⁰ Καὶ ἰδοὺ, γυνή] See further on Mark v. 26. “Statuam hujus mulieris et Domini eam sanantis suo ævo mansisse narrat Euseb. vii. 18.” (Beng.)

According to Eusebius (l. c.) the woman on whom the miracle was wrought was a native of Cæsarea Philippi (Panaea), where are springs of the Jordan, and she erected a statue in honour of the Saviour her Benefactor there, and of herself kneeling before Him as a suppliant.

—ἤψατο] she touched. According to the law of Moses (Lev. xv. 19), whoever touched a woman with an issue of blood was unclean. She touches Christ to be made clean. And our Lord said, “Daughter, thy faith hath made (not will make, but hath already made) thee clean.” (Jerome.) Compare the case of the leper, viii. 3.

—τοῦ κρασπέδου] the fringe. See Num. xv. 38. Christ observed that law also. (Beng.) On this miracle see notes Luke viii. 45.

23. αὐλητὰς] players on the flute. Concerning hired mourners among the Jews see Eccles. xii. 5. Jerem. ix. 17. Amos v. 16.

24. οὐ γὰρ ἀπέθανε] she is not dead, but sleepeth. See Theophyl. on Luke viii. 52. "He says this because He was about to awake her, as from a sleep;" for death is only a sleep when Christ calls and says "Arise." Cp. John xi. 11. Surely this is far better Criticism, than that of some later Interpreters, who say that the damsel had only fallen into a trance; a supposition which is contradicted by St. Luke viii. 55, "her spirit came again." It is well said by Bengel, "non mortua est; Deo enim vivunt omnes mortui." (Luc. xx. 36.) Et puella ob resuscitationem mox futuram enumeranda erat dormientibus." See therefore here, not only a miracle, but a prophecy; i. e. a twofold proof of divine power.

25. ἠγέρθη τὸ κοράσιον] the damsel arose. Among the numerous examples of dead persons raised to life by Christ, the following are mentioned in the Gospels:—

The daughter of Jairus here; dead, but not carried out of the house. (Cp. Mark v. 22. Luke viii. 41.)

The widow's son at Nain; dead, and being carried to the grave. (Luke vii. 11.)

Lazarus; dead, and buried. (John xi. 39.)

Lastly, Himself.

These appear to be mentioned in order to show Christ's power over death in every form. They may also remind us, that He has provided means in His Church for reviving the soul in every stage of spiritual mortality by His Divine Virtue acting in and by those means; see on Luke viii. 54. Cp. John v. 25. Eph. ii. 1. 5, 6. It is observable that He connects this power with His own Resurrection. See John xx. 22—24.

On the difference of Christ's demeanour in the cases above specified, see on Luke viii. 54.

30. ἐνεβριμήσατο] He sternly charged them. See Mark i. 43; xiv. 5. John xi. 33. He rebuked them, because they had low notions of the Messiah's Kingdom, and thought that He would aspire to worldly fame and glory. See on viii. 4.

31. οἱ δὲ ἐξελθόντες διεφήμισαν] they went forth and noised abroad His fame. True glory is not to be obtained by courting it, but by declining it. Sequentem fugit, fugientem sequitur.

35. καὶ τὰς κώμας] Not only the towns but the villages, in order that men may learn not to despise what is little and lowly; and not seek to preach the Word in large cities only, but take care also to sow the seed of the Gospel in small hamlets. Theophyl. (in Marc. v. 16.)

36. ἐσπλαγχνίσθη] was moved with compassion. σπλάγχνα is the word by which the LXX render רַחֲמִים (rachamim), misericordia, Prov. xii. 10, which is connected with רֶחֶם (venter), whence probably the word σπλάγχνα was suggested to the LXX. Cp. Gen. xliii. 30. 1 Kings iii. 26; and see the excellent remarks of Vorstius, de Hebr. N. T., p. 35—37.

This use of σπλαγχνίζομαι and σπλάγχνα is limited to the LXX and N. T. It bespeaks the connexion between them, and their separation from other compositions. The singular intimations of Mercy in the Bible may well have a language of their own. — ἐρριμμένοι] cast down like weary persons, exhausted, and lying helpless on the road.

37. θερισμός] By the word harvest He connects the Gospel with the Law, which was the seed-time. An argument against the Marcionites and Manichæans, who would sever the one from the other, and set the one against the other. The seed was sown in hope of the harvest, and there would have been no harvest without the seed. See John iv. 38.

38. δεήθητε] pray ye. "Vide quanti sint preces!" (Beng.) — ἐκβάλῃ] send forth. The Hebrew נָחַץ and נָחַץ not only signifies ejicere but emittere. See Matt. xiii. 52. Mark i. 12. Luke x. 35. John x. 4. Matt. x. 34, βαλεῖν εἰρήνην: and perhaps there may be some reference to the divine impulse of the Holy Ghost which constrains men unwilling and unable of themselves to labour in so great a work, and makes them feel and say, Vae mihi, si non evangelizavero! 1 Cor. ix. 16.

CH. X. 1. ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς] He gave to them. Mark the difference between Christ and all others who exercised miraculous power. Christ is the Author of it, others are recipients; He the Source, they only streams and channels of grace.

— ἐξουσίαν πνευμάτων] authority over spirits. 'Genitivus objecti.' See on Luke vi. 12.

2. δώδεκα ἀποστόλων] of the Twelve Apostles. See Mark iii. 16. Luke vi. 14; and cp. on Acts i. 13. The number Twelve (3 × 4) in Scripture seems to be significant of perfection and universality. "Hi sunt operarii," says Aug. in Ps. lix., "qui mittendi erant et quadrati orbis partes ad fidem Trinitatis vocaturi." The symbolical meaning of Numbers in Holy Scripture deserves more study and attention than it has received in recent times. "God doeth all things in number and measure and weight." (Wisdom xi. 20.) From an induction of particulars it would appear that 3 is an arithmetical Symbol of what is Divine, and 4 of what is Created. 3 + 4 = 7 is the union of the Two; hence signifying Rest, a Sabbath; 3 × 4 = 12 is the blending and indwelling of what is Divine with what is created: e. g. as in Israel, the people of God: and in the heavenly Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 14 (cp. Bähr, Symbolik i. 201, and Arnoldi here).

The Twelve Apostles were regarded by the ancient Church as typified by the Twelve Sons of Israel (cp. Matt. xix. 28, and Maldonat. here), the Twelve wells at Elim (Exod. xv. 27. See S. Jerome, xlii.), and perhaps by the Twelve Stones of the Urim and Thummim on the breastplate of the High Priest, the type of Christ (Exod. xxviii. 15-21); the Twelve Loaves of shewbread; the Twelve Spies of the promised land, the type of heaven; the Twelve Stones taken from the bed of Jordan. See Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 145. Joshua, or Jesus, the Son of Nun, begins his office at the banks of Jordan, where Christ is baptized, and enters upon the public exercise of His prophetic office. He chooseth there twelve men out of the people to carry Twelve stones over with them, as our Jesus thence began to choose His Twelve Apostles, those foundation stones in the Church of God, whose names are in the twelve foundations of the wall of the holy city, the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 14).

They seem also to be represented by the Twelve Stars in the crown of the Woman in the Wilderness, who typifies the Church on Earth (Rev. xii. 1). It is supposed by some (e. g. à Lapide) that the twelve precious stones in the High Priest's breastplate (Exod. xxviii. 15-21), are similar to those mentioned as the twelve θεμέλιοι λίθοι of the Church glorified, in Rev. xxi. 19, 20. See above on iii. 9, and below on xvi. 18.

These duodenary types of the Apostolic body are irreconcilable with the notion of a Supremacy in any one of the Twelve. See below on xvi. 18.

— ἀποστόλων] Apostles. The word ἀπόστολος is used by the LXX for שְׁלִיחַ (sheliach), (Lightfoot), which does not signify a messenger simply, but one who executes the office of him by whom he is sent.

— πρῶτος Σίμων] first Simon. St. Peter is always first in all the catalogues of the Apostles; as Judas is always last; and (says Aug.) "As Stephen was first among the Deacons." (See on Acts vi. 5.) Cp. Gen. xli. 8, πρῶτος τοκοῦ Πουβήν.—The twelve Apostles are the twelve Patriarchs of the Spiritual Israel, and the relation of St. Peter to the other Apostles appears to be similar to that of Reuben to his brethren: a relation of primacy, not of supremacy. He was "primus inter pares, non summus supra inferiores."

Suppose, for argument's sake, that this privilege of primacy was to descend to the successors of St. Peter; and suppose also that the Bishops of Rome are St. Peter's successors,—yet, as Reuben the firstborn was deprived of his birthright because he went up to his father's bed (Gen. xlix. 4. 1 Chron. v. 1), so, if the Bishop of Rome puts himself in the place of Christ, as if he were husband of Christ's Spouse the Church, he forfeits whatever privilege may belong to him on the ground of his supposed succession to St. Peter. See Barrow on the Pope's Supremacy, vol. iv. p. 204, "Christ is the One Spouse of the Church, which title, one would think, the Bishop of Rome might leave peculiar to our Lord, there being no Vice-husbands; yet hath he been bold ever to claim that, as may be seen in the Constitutions of Pope Gregory X., in one of their general Synods." Sext. Decret. i. tit. vi. c. 3.

Christ calls Judas 'the son of perdition' (John xvii. 12). And there is a Power which sits in the Christian Church, and is called in Scripture 'the son of Perdition' (2 Thess. ii. 2-4). And if he, who calls himself the successor of St. Peter, the first of the Apostles, imitates that Power, then it may be, that in him may be verified the saying, "he that exalteth himself shall be abased;" "and many that are first shall be last;" and he that claims to be a Peter may prove to be a Judas.

— Ἀνδρέας ὁ ἀδελφός] Andrew his brother. On the choice of brothers to be apostles see on iv. 18.

3. Βαρθολομαῖος] Bartholomew, from ἄρ (bar), filii, and ῥήρ (tolmay), supposed by some to be the same as Ptolemy (see Winer, R.-W.-B. p. 140, note), and Bartholomew is thought by some to be the same as Nathanael of Cana in Galilee, which is Winer's opinion. See also R. Nelson on St. Barthol.'s Festival. Cp. Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. p. 325, and further on John i. 46, and Mintert, Lexicon in v. In this case the relation of the name Nathanael to Bartholomew would be the same as Simon to Barjona.

— Θωμᾶς] Thomas, דָּק (teom), i. q. Gr. δίδυμος, geminus, 'a twin.' John xi. 16; xx. 24, and Lightfoot in loc.

— ὁ τελώνης] the publican. Observe St. Matthew's humility in preserving this title, which is not added to his name by the other Evangelists; and also in putting himself after St. Thomas. (Jerome.) Cp. Mark iii. 18. Luke vi. 15, and see above, ix. 9.

This addition (ὁ τελώνης) is also a confirmation of the genuineness of St. Matthew's Gospel; and it is an argument that this Gospel in its Greek form is from St. Matthew himself. It well became the charity of others (e. g. of St. Mark and St. Luke) not to add this appellation (a publican) to a brother's name; and it also well became the humility and thankfulness of the Apostle and Evangelist St. Matthew himself, to add it, in evidence of his Master's love and condescension to himself, and as an encouragement to others.

— Ἀλφαίου] Alpheus. Probably the same as Κλεόπας, Luke xxiv. 18. See Papias, Galland. i. p. 319; Mintert, in v.: the ἡ in ῥήρ (halephay) being hardened into a K, as περρ (pesah, pesek), whence πάσχα, the passover. Cp. below on xii. 46, and Routh, R. S. i. 16. 207. 215. 219. 255. 260, 261. 279, 280; he is called the father of Symeon, and the brother of Joseph (Euseb. iii. 11). Mill, Diss. ii. 236, 237. Patrit. ii. p. 44. Arnoldi on xii. 47.

— Θαδδαῖος] Thaddæus. Probably the same name as Judas; from ἡδᾶ (hodah), laudavit, and by this name, as well as by his name Lebbæus (from לב, leb, heart), Jude, the brother of James, was distinguished from Judas the traitor. Cp. Routh, R. S. ii. 26. Dr. Mill, Diss. ii. p. 251.

Another derivation is from ῥᾶ (tad, qu. Angl. teat), manma. See Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. p. 2565.

4. Κανανίτης] or Καναναῖος, as it is in B, C, D, L, and Vulg. Not 'Canaanite,' nor 'Cananite,' but, as St. Luke renders it, Ζηλωτής (Luke vi. 15), from καννᾶ (kanna), 'a zealot,' cf. Ps. lxi. 9, i. e. a person zealous for the glory of God. Cf. Jerome in Caten. Aur. in Marc. iii. 18.

On the character of the ζηλωταί in this age, see Joseph. B. J. iv. 6, 3, and Welstein and Hammond here. If Simon was one of that class, he had much to unlearn, like Saul, in the School of Christ.

— Ἰσκαριώτης] Iscaiot, from ישׁ (ish, vir) and קֶרֶת (Keryoth) a city of Juda. Jos. xv. 25. See Gloss and Remig. on xxvi. 14.

— ὁ παραδοὺς] A mild word for prodoûs. "Eligitur et Judas," says S. Ambrose, on Luke vi. 16, "non per imprudentiam, sed per providentiam. Quanta est veritas quam nec adversarius Minister infirmat! Christus voluit deseri, ut tuo socio desertus moderate feras." And by this choice of Judas He showed an example of toleration; and that His Word and Sacraments "be effectual because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men" (Art. XXVI.). Cf. Greg. Nazianz. p. 712, and note on Acts viii. 36, and cp. on Acts vi. 5, the case of Nicolas the Deacon.

5. Τούτους τοὺς δώδεκα] Of these twelve, half the number consisted of three pairs of brothers. See above, iv. 13.

— ὁδὸν ἐθνῶν] way to the Gentiles. (Meyer.) See iv. 15. It was not till after His Crucifixion by the Jews, and His Resurrection, that our Lord said, 'Go and teach all nations.' He sends His Apostles first to the Jews, that they might not plead, that they rejected Him because He sent His disciples to the Gentiles and Samaritans. (Jerome.)

8. δωρεὰν δότε] freely give. A warning against simony. Greg. (Mor. in Ev. i. 4.) "Gratia vocatur quia gratis datur." (Aug.)

9. Μὴ κτήσησθε] Do not procure. By this charge he frees them from suspicion of avarice; and He would relieve them from all worldly anxiety, and teach them to devote themselves wholly to the preaching of the Word; next He would prove to them His own power: and therefore He afterwards asked them, When I sent you without purse and scrip and shoes lacked ye any thing? (Luke xxii. 35.) For He intended to send them forth as teachers of the world, to live the life of Angels without secular distractions. He also gave this charge, in order to teach others the duty of maintaining the Ministers of the Gospel (for the labourer is worthy of his hire); and therefore maintenance is a debt due to the teachers from the taught. (Chrys.)

Hence the Apostle says, 'Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things' (Gal. vi. 6); and that they who sow spiritual things to others should reap their carnal things (1 Cor. ix. 11). (Jerome.)

— χρυσόν—χαλκόν] A climax. Not gold or silver,—no, nor even copper.

10. μηδὲ δύο χιτῶνας] nor two tunics, which were sometimes worn, especially by travellers,—one an upper χιτῶν, the other an under one, for warmth. Winer, R.-W. i. p. 652.

— μηδὲ ὑποδήματα] nor shoes; but He allows σανδάλια (Mark vi. 9), soleas, i. e. coverings merely for the sole of the foot, and fastened with ἱμάντες, or thongs across the instep. Cp. Acts xii. 8, ὑποδησαι τὰ σανδάλια σου.

— μηδὲ ῥάβδους] nor yet staves. This is the reading of 13 uncial and 150 cursive MSS., and is received by Tisch. for Elz. μ. ῥάβδον. St. Mark (vi. 8) has ἵνα μηδὲν ἀρῶσιν εἰς ὁδὸν εἰ μὴ ῥάβδον μόνον. St. Luke (ix. 3) has μήτε ῥάβδους. The sense is the same in all. The Apostles are to go as they are; they are not to procure any thing: 'ne minimam quidem rem' (Aug. de Cons. Ev. ii. 30); not even so light and common a thing as a staff, which was, as it were, nothing (see Gen. xxxii. 10, "with my staff I passed over this Jordan"). They among them who have no staff are not to purchase one (μὴ κτήσησθε). They among them who have one may take it (αἰρεῖν), but nothing more. They are to depend on the power and love of Christ, and on that alone.

If all of them were to go without a ῥάβδος at all, our Lord would probably have specified the ῥάβδος particularly in the question which He afterwards put to His Apostles, "When I sent you forth," &c. See Luke xxii. 35.

A spiritual significance has also been elicited from these words by ancient expositors. Take no purse; for, we are to have no venal affections in the discharge of our Ministerial office. Our Apostleship is not to be made a trade. Take no scrip; for, we must leave behind us all anxiety about worldly things. Take not two tunics—it is enough to have put on Christ once, and let us not seek any other robe (such as heresy or Judaism) but Him. Take no shoes; as it was said to Moses, "Put thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground" (Exod. iii. 5. Acts vii. 33). Nor a staff; for Christ is "the Rod of Jesse" (Isa. xi. 1), and His Rod and Staff comfort us (Ps. xxiii. 4). Hilary.

13. ἡ εἰρήνη ὑμῶν] your peace. Therefore Prayers and Benedictions are not in vain, though they may not take effect in behalf of those for whom they are designed; they redound to the good of him who offers them, and return with a blessing into his bosom. (Ps. xxxv. 13.)

On the use of Benedictions in the Church of God, see Num. vi. 22. Deut. xxi. 5. Luke x. 5. Hooker, V. xxv. 2; V. lxx. 1, and lxvi. 1.

15. ἀνεκτότερον] more tolerable. Hence it appears, that in the world to come, there will be different degrees of punishment, as well as different degrees of bliss and glory. In the words of Hooker (App. bk. v. p. 571), "Degrees in wickedness will have answerable degrees in the weight of their endless punishment." See above, v. 19; below, xi. 22. 24; xxiii. 15, and Luke xii. 47, 48, and the notes below on 1 Cor. iii. 15; 2 Cor. ix. 6. S. Jerome c. Jovinian., and Bp. Bull's Sermon on that subject, Sermon. vii. vol. i. p. 168.

16. πρόβατα ἐν μ. λύκων] sheep in the midst of wolves. He thus prophesies what they will have to encounter; and He will prove his own power, when the sheep overcome the wolves, and not only are not destroyed though in the midst of wolves, but change the wolves into sheep. This they were to do, though they were but twelve in number, and though the world was filled with wolves. Let us thence learn, that as long as we are Christ's sheep we shall conquer, although many thousand wolves rage about us; but when we begin to be wolves we shall be destroyed; for we lose the aid of the Shepherd Who came not to feed the wolves, but the sheep. Chrys.

This is quoted from memory by Clemens R. ii. 5, who adds some words, probably from oral tradition. Λέγει ὁ Κύριος, ἔσεσθε ὡς ἄρνια ἐν μέσῳ λύκων· ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Πέτρος αὐτῷ λέγει, ἐὰν οὖν διασπαράξωσιν οἱ λύκοι τὰ ἄρνια; εἶπεν δ' Ἰησοῦς τῷ Πέτρῳ, Μὴ φοβέσθωσαν τὰ ἄρνια τοὺς λύκους μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν αὐτὰ; καὶ ὑμεῖς μὴ φοβεῖσθε τοὺς ἀποκτείνοντας ὑμᾶς καὶ μηδὲν ὕμιν δυναμένους ποιεῖν· ἀλλὰ φοβεῖσθε τὸν μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν ὑμᾶς ἔχοντα ἐξουσίαν ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος τοῦ βαλεῖν εἰς γέενναν πυρός.

— ὄφεις—περιστρεφαί] serpents—doves. See Gen. iii. 1; viii.

8 and 11. The Devil appeared as a serpent; the Holy Spirit appeared as a dove. And we may learn something from the Tempter (cp. Luke xvi. 8). as well as from the Holy Spirit.

It is said that the serpent shows his wisdom in guarding his head, whatever other part of his body is struck. So let us be ready to sacrifice any thing but our faith; and let us guard our head, Christ. (Hilary, S. Jerome.) "Et Serpens deponit tunicam veterem ut novus exultet." (Aug. Serm. 64.) The innocence of the Dove is shown in likeness to the Holy Ghost. (S. Jerome.)

19. τί λαλήσετε] On this use of τί for δ, and δ, τι, see Mark vi. 36. Luke xvii. 8. Winer, p. 152.

20. οἱ λαλοῦντες] "Similis usus articuli in Joh. vi. 63." (Beng.)

— ἅλλα τὸ Πνεῦμα] but the Holy Ghost. An argument for the Inspiration of the Writers of the New Testament. If He was in them, when speaking to a few, surely He did not desert them when writing for the world. See John xiv. 26.

21. γονεῖς] accus. for γονεάς, cp. Winer, p. 60. So γραμματεῖς xxiii. 34.

23. φεύγετε] flee. It was a question discussed in early times, whether flight was allowable in time of persecution. See above, ii. 13. Tertullian (de fugâ in persecutione) argues that our Lord's permission was only temporary; but this is contravened by S. Jerome (Catal. Script. in Tertullian.). See also Nazian. (Orat. i. in Julian.), and the excellent directions on the subject in S. Athanasius (Apolog. de fugâ suâ, p. 258—266; cp. à Lapide).

The answer seems to be given in our Lord's words: "The hireling fleeth because he is a hireling, and careth not for the sheep." (John x. 13.) "The good shepherd giveth his life for his sheep." (John x. 11.) If a person has a flock committed to his care, and that flock will be scattered or torn by wolves, if he flies,—then he must not fly. See S. Aug. Ep. 218 ad Honorat. ii. 1260—2. Cp. Acts viii. 1; ix. 25; xiv. 6; xv. 38. 2 Tim. iv. 10. The question may be illustrated from the history of Polycarp, Martyr. pp. 593—600, and of Archbishop Laud, whom Grotius advised to escape (see Pocock's Life, p. 83, ed. 1816).

— τὴν ἄλλην] the other, the next,—showing that there will always be some other to fly to.

— πόλεις τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, ἕως ἂν ἔλθῃ] the cities of Israel, until the Son of man come. In a primary sense, you will not have completed your missionary work in Judæa before I come to judge Jerusalem. Cp. Acts viii. 1. (Jerome.)

In a secondary and larger sense,—the Missionary Work of the Church for the spiritual Israel will not cease till the Second Coming of Christ. Cp. Matt. xxiv. 14.

There is a successive series of 'Comings of Christ,' all preparatory to, and consummated in, the Great Coming. Cp. on xvi. 28.

25. Βεελζεβούλ] Beelzebub. The Deity of the Ekronites was called by them בַּלְזַבּוּז (Baal-zebub), 'Lord of flies,' i. q. Θεὸς ἀπόμυιος or μυίαγρος (2 Kings i. 2); and this name was in ridicule and contempt changed by the Israelites to בַּלְזַבּ (Baal-zebel), 'Dominus stercoris,' and thence applied to the Prince of the Devils. Lightfoot ad loc. Goodwin, Moses and Aaron iv. 3. Jahn, Archæol. § 408, p. 566, ed. Vienn. 1814, interprets it 'Deus habitaculi;' but see Winer in v.

Hitherto our Lord has given precepts to His Apostles for the discharge of their duty.

He now supplies motives, viz.:

His own example.

God will display the truth of the Gospel and His own glory even by means of those who persecute them.

God is more to be feared than man.

God cares for the least of his own;

And He will give them reward and honour in the presence of the Holy Angels.

27. ἐπὶ τῶν δωματίων] On the roofs,—flat (cp. Acts x. 9), used for public proclamations (Isa. xv. 3. Jer. xix. 13; xlviii. 38), and other similar purposes. See on Luke v. 19, and the passages quoted in Jahn, Archæol. § 34. Winer, R.-W.-B. v. 'Dach.'

29. ἐν—οὐ πεσεῖται] You may buy two sparrows for a small coin, and yet not one of the two will fall without God's notice and will. No bodily change or chance is to be feared by those who are Christ's, since even our hairs are all numbered by Him Who preserves us. (Hilary.)

32. ἐν ἐμοὶ] in Me. Something more than 'confess Me.' ἐν shows the ground on which the confession rests. Cp. Luke xii. 8.

34. Μὴ νομίσητε ὅτι ἦλθον] Think not that I came to send Peace. This may appear paradoxical and at variance with the Angels' song (Luke ii. 14). But our Lord's design was to educate His disciples by hard sayings, says Chrys., who adds, "No one should be able to say that He had flattered them by soft speeches. He would display all the evils they might expect to see. Here was a proof of His power, in that they who heard these things from Him received Him as their Lord, and were able to convert others."

Christ was no cause of the miseries He predicted as consequent on His coming; but the wickedness of men was. And yet as the manner of Scripture is, He speaks of Himself as doing these things. So it is said, "He gave them eyes that they should not see" (Ezek. xii. 2. John xii. 40). Lest they should expect perfection in this world, He describes the result of His coming, viz. strifes, schisms, seditions, controversies, wars—the consequence of man's sin and the devil's malice. Chrys. See below on xviii. 7. Though the Song of the Angels was 'Peace on earth' (Luke ii. 14), yet in the same chapter we read that He was set for the fall as well as the rising of many (Luke ii. 34). His Gospel is a savour of death to some and of life to others (2 Cor. ii. 16). He is a stone of stumbling to the disobedient as well as precious to them that believe (1 Pet. ii. 7, 8). This is the condemnation, that Light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil (John iii. 19).

37. μου] emphatic; thrice repeated in this place.

38. λαμβάνει τὸν σταυρὸν αὐτοῦ] αὐτοῦ, his cross, as I shall carry My cross. Every one has his own cross to carry; as criminals did, when led to crucifixion.

Our Lord thus prophesies the manner of His own death—crucifixion. See below, xx. 19.

He knew what He would do, and what He would suffer; and this is ever to be borne in mind in interpreting His words. They must be explained from a consideration of His Divine Prescience. He has all things before Him in a moment of time. Often, if viewed merely with regard to what was known only to His disciples on the occasion when they were uttered, they will seem dim and obscure. Time explained them; and the Holy Ghost enabled them to understand them (see John xii. 16). If we forget this, we shall often miss their true meaning. See on John iii. 22, and at the end of that chapter; and John vi. 53, 54.

39. Ὁ εὐρὼν] Not 'he that findeth,' but he that 'hath found,' or gained—i. e. he that hath made every provision for his worldly comfort, and so appears to have gained the treasure of which he was in quest—his life—he shall lose it; and he who has sacrificed his life for Christ shall gain it for ever. εὕρισκω is used thus Rom. iv. 1. Cp. Luke xii. 19, 20.

41. εἰς ὄνομα προφήτου] i. e. 'quā, quatenus, est propheta.'

(Vorst, Heb. 740.) But εἰς τὸ ὄνομα is more forcible than ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι. It signifies an inward movement of love to, and, as it were, identification with, the prophet (see xviii. 20), and consequently a reception of his message into the soul. He who receives a minister of Christ, because he is such, and with love and adhesion to Christ, the True Prophet (as distinguished from men, who are only His instruments), shall partake in the reward promised to those "who turn many to righteousness" (Dan. xii. 3).

The prophet to be received may be an unworthy person—a Judas. Our Lord, foreseeing this, says that the office is to be regarded, and not the person; and that you will not lose your reward, if you receive a prophet, though he who is received is unworthy. (Jerome, Hilary. Cp. Article XXVII.) Receive him in the Name of a Prophet; not for the sake of any secular pre-eminence or any worldly consideration, but because he is a prophet sent by Me, and authorized by Me to dispense to you My Word and Sacraments, and whatever he may be personally, yet if you receive what he brings to you from Me, you will receive a prophet's reward.

— ὁ δεχόμενος δίκαιον] רַחֵם (tsaddik), i. e. any good and holy man, though not a preacher of Christ. See Matt. xiii. 17, πολλοὶ προφῆται καὶ δίκαιοι. Greg. M. (Hom. in Ev. i. 20) thus illustrates this; "etsi fructum ulmus non habet, vitem tamen cum fructibus portans, hæc ipsa sua efficit quòd benè sustentat aliena." The Elm, though barren, helps the Vine, which it supports, to bear fruit.

42. ἕνα τῶν μικρῶν] μικρὸς, i. q. רַחֵם (katon), little, a disciple, as distinguished from רַב (rab), great, a master. Cp. xviii. 6. 10.

This is the third case here mentioned—whoever does the least act of kindness to one of the least of my disciples, in My name, and because he is my disciple—shall not lose his reward.

— τὰ ἔργα] the Miracles. Cp. Luke vii. 18.

— Χριστοῦ] "Opportunè scribit Christū, non Jesu, quia τὰ ἔργα eum esse Messiam probant." Calmet.

— πέμψας διὰ τῶν μαθητῶν] διὰ Β, C, D, P, Z, Δ, δύο, Ε, F, G, K, L, M, S, U, V, X (Elz.); but it is more likely that διὰ should have been altered by copyists into δύο than δύο into διὰ.

Many modern expositors have supposed that St. John, now a prisoner, wavered in faith, and put this question in doubt. But this notion is altogether alien from the tenour of the narrative, and irreconcilable with the words of Christ (see on v. 7), and at variance with the expositions of the Ancient Church. refers to Tertullian adv. Marcion. iv. 5 (cf. de Bapt. c. 10) for that opinion; but the sense of that passage is ambiguous. The following ancient testimonies may suffice;

John does not put this question from ignorance, for he himself had proclaimed Christ to be the Lamb of God. But as our Lord asked concerning the body of Lazarus, 'Where have ye laid him?' (John xi. 34.) in order that they who answered the question might, by their own answer, be led to faith, so John, now about to be slain by Herod, sends his disciples to Jesus, in order that by this occasion they who were jealous of the fame of Jesus (ch. ix. 14. John iii. 26), might see His mighty works and believe in Him, and that while their Master asked the question by them, they might hear the truth for themselves. Jerome.

S. Ambrose says well on Luke vii. 19, "Misit discipulos suos ad Christum Johannes, ut supplementum scientiæ consequantur, quia plenitudo Legis Christus est." See also Theophyl. on Luke vii. 18.

John had no doubts concerning Christ. In the Baptist, the Law is as it were in prison; its work is now done, and it sends its disciples to the Gospel, in order that they who do not believe, may see the proofs of its own sayings in the works of Christ. And St. John thus provides for the faith of his disciples by sending them to see Christ's miracles, by which they would be convinced that his own testimony to Christ was true, and that they were not "to look for another." (Hilary.) Our Lord refers to His own miracles, v. 4, and does not give a direct answer to the express question of St. John, but to the silent scruples of his messengers, whom He warns by the words "Blessed is he who is not offended in Me." If these words had been applicable to St. John, as some imagine, how could our Lord have given such an eulogy of St. John as He immediately proceeds to do? Jerome.

The design of this mission and history was to show the nature of St. John's own office, viz. that it was temporary, transitory, and manuductory to Christ; and to declare also the nature of the Evidences on which Christianity rests, viz. the mighty works of Christ.

Our Lord gives the clue to this, the true interpretation of the passage, when He says to the Jews (John v. 33), "Ye sent unto John and he bare witness unto the truth; but I receive not My witness (τὴν μαρτυρίαν) from man; he was indeed that burning and shining lamp (ὁ λύχνος, not τὸ φῶς), which I kindled in the world, and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light; but the witness which I have is a greater witness than that of John; the Works which My Father has given Me to finish,—the Works themselves that I am now doing, they bear witness of Me, that the Father hath sent Me." Cp. also John x. 37, 38.

We find (Luke vii. 18, 19) that St. John's disciples had come to him in the prison and spoken to him of Christ's miracles. It was no questioning or doubt in his own mind, but it was the announcement of these miracles which was the occasion of his sending to Jesus. And it was providentially ordered, that at the very time when John's messengers arrived, our Lord was engaged in working those miracles by which He showed His divine mission, and fulfilled the prophecies concerning the Messiah. See Luke vii. 21 and Isa. xxxv. 5; lxi. 1.

Christ put it into the heart of John in prison to send to Him, and to send at this very time, in order to show more clearly the true ground of belief in Christ. St. John the Baptist—the greatest of those who had been born of women—the divinely-appointed precursor and herald of Christ—comes, in the person of his disciples, to Christ—to Christ working the works of the Messiah. And now "his joy is fulfilled." He sits at Christ's feet, and hears His word. The λύχνος comes to the φῶς; the φωνὴ βοῶντος comes to the eternal Λόγος; the πρόδρομος comes to the Ὁδός; the Κήρυξ comes to the Κριτής; the twinklings of the φωσφόρος, or morning star, are lost in the full effulgence of the Divine ἥλιος,—the Ἀνατολὴ ἀφ' ὕψους,—the risen Sun of Righteousness.

John had said of Christ, "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John iii. 30), i. e. my light must wane and vanish, being absorbed in His. Thus he finishes his mission, by bringing all men, as far as he is able, with his last breath to Christ. And thus in this history we see a Divine Sermon on the Evidences of Christianity. The groundwork of our faith is in the Works of CHRIST. There is the foundation of our belief. Hence St. John the Evangelist says at the close of the last Gospel (John xx. 30), "Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of His Disciples which are not written in this book; but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name."

And if it be asked, why we believe that the Gospels, in which these works are recorded, are true, we may reply,—Because these Works are described as having been performed in the presence and on the persons of multitudes of people; and because the Gospels were published in the age and country wherein those works are affirmed in them to have been done; and because the Gospels, which describe those wonderful Works, were received as true Histories, in that and other countries, by the Church of Christ, which gladly suffered persecution for receiving them as true, and because they were at length received as true by that very Power which persecuted the Church for receiving them—the Empire of Rome; and because they have been so received even to this day; and because the more they are examined, the more they prove themselves to be true.

The sending of his disciples to Jesus was the crowning act of St. John's ministry. He thus guarded against a schism between his own disciples and those of Jesus; he bequeathed his disciples to Christ; he had prepared the way for Christ in the Desert; he now prepares it in the Prison; and the happy result of this mission is intimated in those touching words, "His disciples took up the body of John and buried it, and came and told Jesus." (Matt. xiv. 12.)

3. ὁ ἐρχόμενος] the Coming One, ἡβ (Habba), i. e. the Messiah, whose Coming was expected from the beginning. Gen. xlix. 10. See particularly Ps. cxviii. 26, "Blessed is He that cometh." Cp. Isa. xxxv. 4. Mal. iii. 1. John vi. 14; xi. 27. Heb. x. 37. 1 John v. 6. Cp. ix. 39; xii. 46. See Vorst de Hebr. p. 713.

— προσδοκῶμεν] may we, should we look for —? the conjunctive mood.

4. ἀπαγγέilate] Eng. Version, 'show John again.' It is hardly necessary to remark, that 'again' does not here mean 'a second time,' but it represents the preposition, ἀπὸ, and ἀπαγγέilate means 'Go back and report to him.' He does not refer them to His own words, nor to those of His disciples and the people; but to the testimony of their own senses, 'Go and report to John what ye, his disciples, hear with your own ears, and see with your own eyes,' viz. My works. There is your answer.

5. τυφλοὶ] Our Lord here repeats the substance, and not the precise words, of several prophecies concerning the Messiah; to which he adds a caution derived from another prophecy foretelling that to some He would be a rock of offence. (Isa. viii. 14.)

On this mode of dealing with prophecy see Surenhus. p. 227. The same may be said of the prophecy of Malachi iii. 1, quoted by our Lord v. 10.

It is to be remembered generally, that our Lord as the Great Prophet held in His hand the "Key of the House of David" (Isa. xxii. 22. Rev. iii. 7); the "Key of Knowledge" (Luke xi. 52): one use of which was to unlock Prophecy; and therefore in quoting the prophecies He often inserts words, or modifies them, in order to make their sense more plain to the hearer.

7. πορευομένων] as they departed. He would not praise John in the presence of John's disciples, lest he should be suspected of flattery and collusion,—He waited till their departure. See Luke vii. 24.

— Τί ἐξήλθετε:] What went ye out for to see? Our Lord had answered the question of St. John's disciples by an appeal to their own senses. He now replies to the thoughts of the multitude concerning John,—thoughts suggested by the sound of John's message, of which they did not penetrate the sense, as He did, who had inspired John by His Holy Spirit to send the message at this time, and who reads John's heart. He now replies to the present thoughts of the multitude by an appeal to their own former acts. He first tells them what John is not, and then what he is.

What went ye out into the wilderness to see? Not a reed, planted in the morass of a weak and watery faith, and quivering in the wind of doubt. Not a Reed—but a Rock. Not a man of soft and effeminate disposition. No; for he preached in the wilderness; and when he went into a King's house, it was not in soft clothing, but in the hairy garb of an Elias; it was not to mingle in the splendours of the Court, but constantly to speak the truth, and boldly to rebuke vice; for which he is now in prison, and about to die.

It may be necessary to confirm this exposition from ancient authorities. "He replies to the thoughts of the crowd. They might imagine from St. John's message, and the words in which it was delivered, that the Baptist wavered in his faith, and that his imprisonment had shaken his constancy. Our Lord, therefore, reminds them of what John was, how he had acted, and how they themselves had behaved to him. What went ye out for to see? Not an inconstant and vacillating man. Not a reed shaken by the wind. But a man of inflexible resolution and invincible courage. What went ye out into the wilderness to see? Not a man of effeminate temper. Not a sycophant, who would flatter any for hope of gain. No; his rigorous fare, his simple garb, the very place in which you found him, refute this notion. If he had been such, he would have been in the court, and not in the desert. But what went ye out for to see? a Prophet; yea, I say unto you, and more than a Prophet. And then He refers to their own Scripture for the true character and office of John." Chrysos., Hilary, Jerome (ad Algasium, p. 183), Ambrose in Luc. viii. 23.

The following is from S. Greg. M. Homil. p. 1454. "Arundo vento agitata Johannes non erat, quem à statùs sui rectitudine nulla vocum varietas inflectebat. Discamus ergo arundines non esse. Solidemus animum inter auras linguarum positum; stet inflexibilis status mentis; non nos prospera elevent, non nos adversa perturbent; ut qui in solitudine fidei figimur, nequaquam rerum transeuntium mutabilitate moveamur."

11. οὐκ ἐγήγερται—μείζων] there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist. The greatness of John as compared with those who preceded him was seen in various particulars;

He was sanctified in the womb, and there prophesied of Christ, by leaping for joy;

He inaugurated the Baptism of Repentance, and he baptized Christ;

He announced the Advent of the kingdom of heaven;

He proclaimed Christ already come as the Bridegroom, the Lamb of God, the future Judge;

He was typified by Elias, one of the greatest of the old Prophets;

He was "plus Propheta, nam Eum quem præcurrendo prophetaverat, ostendendo monstrabat." (Greg. M. l. c. Cp. à Lapide.)

—ἐν γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν] in those who are born of women: as distinguished from those who are born again of Water and the Holy Ghost. John iii. 5. Titus iii. 5. Of those who were born by the natural birth, none was greater than John the Baptist, who was the forerunner of Him, Who is the Second Adam; and by virtue of Whose Incarnation, and of their Incorporation with Him, those who come after John in time are born spiritually, and so are greater than John.

—ὁ δὲ μικρότερος] He that is least among Christians who have been born of God (John i. 13; iii. 3—8), and have seen Christ fully set forth in His crucifixion and ascension, and have received the graces thence ensuing, and felt the fulness of the blessings vouchsafed by God in the Kingdom of Heaven, or Christian Church; for (as Maldonat. says) "minimum maximi majus est maximo minimi."

And by reason of the greatness of these gifts, they who are less than John, are yet; by being in the Kingdom of Heaven fully opened, greater (quoad statum) than John the Baptist, who saw these things as yet future. (Cp. Matt. xiii. 16. Luke x. 23.) And see how this saying was fulfilled and explained in the graces poured on those who had been baptized by John, and afterwards received the full outpouring of the gift of the Holy Ghost, when they were baptized in the name of Christ, and were confirmed by the laying on of the hands of him who calls himself the least of the Apostles.—St. Paul (Acts xix. 6); and they—being born anew of the Holy Ghost—became greater than John, who was the greatest of the prophets, and of all who had been born of women.

The phrase ὁ μικρότερος is understood by some of the Fathers to mean Christ Himself (Chrys., Macar. (p. 170), Aug., Hilary, Theophyl., and also by Estius, Fritzsche, Arnoldi); and this interpretation so commended is not lightly to be set aside. Cp. John i. 15. 27. 30. "He that cometh after Me (in time) is preferred before Me." (Matt. iii. 11.)

And there is something in favour of this interpretation in the words οὐκ ἐγήγερται μείζων ἐν τοῖς γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν, i. e. in those who have been begotten by human fathers from women; which Christ was not.

No one has appeared among those springing from human parents greater than John the Baptist. But do not suppose that he is greater than I am. I am not γεννητὸς γυναικῶν, but Θεοῦ, and though after him in the Gospel (because he is my precursor), yet I am greater than he; and so μικρότερος, and yet elder; greater, μείζων, and yet less. Rom. ix. 12.

On the whole, it may well be supposed, that both the meanings here given, were in the mind of Christ when He spoke these words. Cp. on Rom. xii. 19.

12. βιά[ε]ται] suffers violence; βιάως κρατεῖται (Hesych.), and cannot be entered except by those who strive for entrance (vii. 13, 14. Luke xiii. 24.) S. Ambrose, in Luc. xi. 5, "Vim facimus Domino, non compellendo, sed flendo; non provocando injuriis, sed lacrymis exorando. O beata violentia, &c. Hæc sunt arma fidei nostræ," and Greg. M. "Joannes qui poenitentiam peccatoribus indixit (quæ vitam æternam percipiunt) quid aliud quam regno colorum fieri violentiam docuit? Ergo hæreditatem justorum rapiamus per poenitentiam," and by earnest prayer, "Hæc Deo grata vis est," Tertullian (Apol. 30). Hence Christ says (Luke xiii. 24), ἀγωνί[ε]σθε εἰσελθεῖν διὰ τῆς στενῆς πόλης.

13. ἕως Ἰωάννου] until John. Cp. Luke xvi. 16. The emphatic word is they prophesied, i. e. as concerning something future: i. e. they prophesied of Me and My kingdom. But now He that was to come is come. Hence the dignity and blessedness of John, who was chosen to proclaim His coming. "Usque ad Johannem Lex; ab eo Evangelium." Cp. Athanas. de Incarn. xl.

14. εἰ θέλετε δεξασθαι] if ye are willing to receive it. Our Lord knew that they looked for Elias in person, and therefore He endeavours to correct their error. So the Angel had said to Zacharias, the father of the Baptist (Luke i. 17), that John would come in the power and spirit of Elias, i. e. not in his person: and St. John had denied that he was Elias (John i. 21). See below on Matt. xvii. 10, 11.

16. Ὁμοία παιδίῳ] Like to children. A Hebrew adage (see Vorst, p. 813). By the children many interpreters understand the Baptist and our Lord. But this seems harsh. The γενεὰ itself is said to be δὲ μοῖα παιδῶν; and the querulous murmur of the children, complaining that others would not humour them in their fickle caprices, is compared to the discontented censoriousness of that generation of the Jews, particularly of the Pharisees, who could not be pleased with any of God's dispensations, and rejected John and Christ, as they had done the Prophets before them. The sense therefore is, Ye are like a troop of wayward children, who go on with their own game, at one time gay, at another grave, and give no heed to any one else, and expect that every one should conform to them. You were angry with John, because he would not dance to your piping; and with Me, because I will not weep to your dirge. John censured your licentiousness, I rebuke your hypocrisy; you vilify both, and "reject the good counsel of God," who has devised a variety of means for your salvation. (Luke vii. 30.)

19. Καὶ (adversative, as Hebr. vau, and yet) ἐδικαιώθη] δικαία ἐλογίσθη. (Euthym.)

These wayward children cannot be pleased; but all who are really wise children of God, although they may be called babes by those who think themselves wise men, approve all the methods, however various, of Divine Wisdom, and profit by them, and press into the kingdom of heaven. Cp. Luke vii. 29, οἱ τελῶναι ἐδικαίωσαν τὸν Θεόν, βαπτισθέντες τὸ βάπτισμα Ἰωάννου.

The wisdom of God is aptly called πολυποικίλος by St. Paul, Ephes. iii. 10, and this its property was shown in the diverse characters of the missions of John and Christ both tending to the same end.

21. Χοραζὶν] Chorazin. Near the Sea of Galilee, about two miles from Capernaum. (Jerome.) It is observable that the very names of these cities denounced by our Lord have perished; and that their precise site is unknown. Cp. Robinson on Palest. iii. 294.

—Βηθσαιδάν] Bethsaida, i. q. "רֵבָה (beyth), domus, et ἰσχυρὰ (tsayada), piscatio, venatio;" the town of St. Peter, Andrew, and Philip, a very appropriate name for those who were to become "fishers of men."

Our Lord had worked very many miracles in Chorazin and Bethsaida; and yet there is no mention in the Gospels of any miracle performed by Him there. How much is recorded, and yet how much is left unnoticed by them! John xxi. 25.

Chorazin and Bethsaida were on the Sea of Galilee. Hence He compares them with Tyre and Sidon,—maritime cities.

—ἂν μετενόησαν] would have repented. Hence, and from v. 23, it is proved, that our Lord's knowledge extended to contingencies, i. e. to what would have happened, if something else had happened. See 1 Sam. xxiii. 10—13, concerning what would have happened, if David had gone to Keilah.

22. Πλὴν λέγω] On this text, see the Treatise of S. Athanas. pp. 82—86.

23. Καφαρναούμ] Capernaum. "Beatior quàm Chorazin (præsentia Christi), sed ex peccato infelicior; ideo cum Sodomis confertur, non Tyro." (Bengel.)

25. Ἐξομολογούμαι] I glorify Thee. I signify my entire acquiescence in Thy doings, and thank Thee for them. The LXX use this word for ἡδονή (hodonah), "laudavit, celebravit, glorificavit." Cp. Luke ii. 38. 2 Sam. xxii. 50. Vorst de Hebr. p. 173.

Some interpreters suppose that this verse is to be interpreted as if it were ἀποκρύψας ἀπεκάλυψας, i. e. "quum abdidisses ab illis revelasses his" (see Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 505, and compare Rom. vi. 17), but this seems to be a distortion of the words. The sense is, I acquiesce in all Thy dispensations, and praise Thee for them.

Our Lord does not say, that God denied means of salvation to any; but He thanks Him, because He has revealed to the Apostles what He has hidden from the Pharisees (Jerome), and thus punishes pride and rewards meekness. He thus teaches the proud, that if they will become humble they will be able to see the wondrous things of God's law, and so escape the punishment due to pride, and receive the blessings promised to the meek (cp. Rom. vi. 17). He recognizes God as Supreme Ruler over all, and blesses Him in all His ways, whether of judgment or of mercy, and therefore He adds, οὕτως ἐγένετο εὐδοκία ἔμπροσθέν σου. He thus teaches us to submit our will and judgment to God's will and judgment in all things, and to say, "O Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments." (Rev. xvi. 7.) "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, Thou King of Nations." (Rom. xi. 22. Rev. xv. 3; xix. 2.)

—σοφῶν κ. σ.] Those who think themselves wise. Cp. on ix. 13, and 1 Cor. i. 20. Aug. (Serm. lxvii. and lxviii.) "nomine sapientium et prudentium superbos intelligi ipse exposuit."

—νηπίοις] babes. Those whom the world calls such, and who are νήπιοι τῇ κακίᾳ. 1 Cor. xiv. 20.

26. ὁ Πατήρ] On this use of the nominate see Matt. xxvii. 29, χαίρε, ὁ βασιλεὺς. Luke viii. 54, ἡ παῖς ἔγειρε. xii. 32, μὴ φοβοῦ τὸ μικρὸν ποιμνίον. Luke xviii. 11. Winer, p. 164.

27. οὐδὲ τὸν Πατέρα] Hence it was argued by some, that the God who was revealed in the Old Test. before the Incarnation, is not the God of the Gospel. For a refutation of this heresy, see Iren. iv. 6, who shows that all Divine Revelations are from God, through Christ, the Word of God. (Cp. xiii. 52.)

28. Δεῦτε] "Come all: not this man or that man, but all, all that labour and are heavy laden, all that are in distress, and in sin. Come, not that I may condemn you, but release you: come, because I desire your salvation; and I will give you rest. Come, take My yoke, and bear My burden; and be not fearful, when you hear of a yoke, for it is easy; nor of a burden, for it is light. But how is this compatible with what He said before, 'Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth to life?' (Matt. vii. 14.) Because strait it is, if we are lukewarm and listless; but if we obey Christ's precepts, and follow His example, the yoke becomes easy. And how are we to do this? By meekness. And therefore our Lord begins His divine Sermon, Blessed are the poor in spirit (Matt. v. 3), thus you will find rest for your soul. Hence St. Paul calls his own afflictions a light burden (2 Cor. iv. 17. Cp. Rom. viii. 18. 35), and on the other hand, no yoke so hard, no burden so heavy as that of sin.” Cp. Zech. v. 7, 8. (Chrys.). See also Bp. Sanderson, iii. 366.

29, 30. τὸν ζυγὸν μου] My yoke. Christ here speaks of His yoke and of His burden (φορτίον). A metaphor from cattle ploughing and carrying—an emblem of Christian life—especially the ministerial. Isa. xxxii. 20. Eccus. vi. 24, 25, and see on Acts xxvi. 14. Christ has a yoke and a burden for all, but it is very different from the yoke and burden of the Law, Acts xv. 10. Gal. v. 1, and much more does it differ from the yoke and burden of Sin. Rom. vi. 17. 2 Pet. ii. 19. His yoke is easy and His burden is light.

This invitation of Christ was followed by a remarkable result. See on Luke vii. 37.

30. ζυγὸς χρηστός—φορτίον ἐλαφρόν] Cp. Isa. x. 27, “The yoke shall be taken away, because of the anointing.” The Fathers compare the yoke of Christ to a bird’s plumage, which is indeed a weight to it, but enables it to soar to the sky. “Hæc sarcina,” says Aug. (Ser. xxiv. de Verb. Apostoli), “non est pondus onerati, sed ala volaturi.”

CH. XII. 1. τοῖς σάββασιν] on the sabbath; the σάββατον δευτερόπρωτον, a great Sabbath (Luke vi. 1), and therefore the argument of our Lord on this occasion applies à fortiori to ordinary sabbaths.

—τίλλειν στάχνας] to pluck ears, which it was lawful for any one to do on an ordinary day. See Deut. xxiii. 25. The Pharisees do not blame the disciples for the act, but for doing it on the Sabbath.

3. τί ἐποίησε Δαυὶδ] what David did. When he fled from Saul to Abimelech, the priest, at Nob, a city of the priests (1 Sam. xxi. 6).

4. ἄρτους τῆς προθέσεως] the shewbread. The ‘duodecim panes propositionis,’ a Hebraism, לֶחֶם הַמִּצֵּה (lechem hammarecelh), i. e. ‘panes ordinis,’ from their being set on the Holy Table in the Tabernacle before God, and sometimes called לֶחֶם פָּנֵי (lechem harranyim), “the loaves of the faces,” rendered by the LXX (Exod. xxv. 30), ἐνώπιον, as being always “in conspectu Dei,” and therefore holy (1 Sam. xxi. 6), whence incense was placed on them (Levit. xxiv. 7); an offering made afresh every Sabbath to God in the name of the twelve tribes, and an acknowledgment that they derived their sustenance in body and soul from Him whose eye was ever upon them.

—εἰ μή] See on Luke iv. 26.

5. ἱερεῖς] the Priests, who ought to be most zealous for the Law. (Bengel.)

—βεβηλοῦσι] they profane, by various works necessary for the sacrificial ritual of the Temple. Hence it was a maxim of the Jews “in templo non esse Sabbatum.”

6. ἱεροῦ μεῖζον] If the service of the temple justifies the priests in doing servile works on the Sabbath, I, who am greater than the temple and give sanctity to it, can authorize My disciples to do what they are now doing on the Sabbath Day. Christ had not interfered to prevent His disciples from plucking the corn on the Sabbath, to assuage their hunger. Therefore their act was His; and in censuring them the Pharisees had blamed Him, the Lord of the Sabbath.

7. ἔλεον θέλω] I will have Mercy. See above, ix. 13. The Sabbath was made for man (Mark ii. 27), and I who am the Son of Man, the Second Adam, the Lord of the New Creation, am the Lord and Master of the Sabbath.

8. ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου] the Son of Man. Because I also am the Son of God, therefore I am the Giver of the Law. And he who gives a law can dispense with it. This is another assertion of Christ’s Divinity.

No one else is called in the Gospel the Son of Man but Jesus, says Titus Bostrensis on Luke vi. 5. And He is called so by Himself alone. Jesus calls Himself Son of Man, because, being Son of God, He vouchsafes to become Son of Man in a singular manner for our salvation.

The following is an exposition of the argument by Jerome and other ancient Interpreters:

You break the Sabbath in the temple by slaying victims, and by offering them on the wood heaped up on the altar; and you circumcise children on the Sabbath days, and so (according to your own allegations) break the law of the Sabbath, in your desire to keep another law. But the laws of God never contradict each other. (Jerome.) Observe the circumstances here:—the place, the temple;—the persons, the priests;—the time, the Sabbath;—the act itself, they profane; and this they do, not from any special necessity, as David; but habitually, every Sabbath, and yet they are guiltless. And if they are blameless, much more are those innocent, who are with Me, the Lord of the Sabbath.

In St. Mark the argument rests on a common principle of humanity. The Sabbath was made for Man. But here He speaks of Himself, the Lord of the Temple; the Truth and not the Type. He who gave the law of the Sabbath explains its meaning. He teaches them that it was not merely prohibitory, requiring them to abstain from evil, but preceptive also, commanding to do good. And therefore He refers them to the practice of the priests, and to God’s own saying in their Scriptures, “I will have mercy and not sacrifice” (Hos. vi. 6. Micah vi. 8). Thus He gave additional life to the Law. For the season was now come in which they were to be trained by a higher discipline. (Chrys.)

He calls Himself the Son of Man, and His meaning is—He whom ye suppose to be a mere man, is God, the Lord of the Sabbath, and has power to change the law, because He gave it. (Remig.)

He calls Himself the Lord of the Sabbath,—a prophetic intimation cleared up by the event, that the Law of the Sabbath would be changed, as it has now been under the Gospel, not by any alteration in the proportion of time due to God, but in the position of the day; by the transfer of it from the seventh day of the week to the first, in memory of the Resurrection of the Son of Man, and by its receiving a new name, Κυριακή, the Lord’s

Day, in honour of Him who is the Kýrios τοῦ σαββάτου, the Lord of the Sabbath.

10. τὴν χεῖρα] his hand. St. Luke adds (vi. 6) that it was his right hand; and that the persons who watched Him were the Scribes and Pharisees, in order to accuse Him (vi. 7).

11. πρόβατον ἐν] “ἐν, cujus jactura non magna.” (Beng.) You to preserve your property, though it be only a single sheep, profane the Sabbath, according to your own sense of the terms; and yet you charge Me with profaning it, when I restore health to your brother; which I do with much less labour than you can draw a single sheep from a pit. (Jerome.)

You are evil interpreters of the Law, who say that I ought to rest from good deeds on the Sabbath. In the Sabbath of Eternity we shall rest from evil, but our Sabbath itself will be in doing good. — βόθυνον] a pit dug for water. Luke xiv. 5, φρέαρ.

13. ἀπεκατεστάθη] was restored. He does not say “as it was before,” but ὡς ἡ ἄλλη. See on Acts i. 6.

17. ὅπως πληρωθῇ τὸ ρῆθὲν] in order that it might be fulfilled which was spoken. A remarkable specimen of the manner in which the Holy Spirit, speaking by the Evangelists, deals with the Prophecies of the Old Testament in order to interpret them.— ὅπως πληρωθῇ τὸ ρῆθὲν is the form used by the Evangelist when this process of Divine Exposition is performed. It is, as it were, the title of an Evangelical Targum or Paraphrase. On this formula see above, i. 22; ii. 15. 17. 23; iv. 14; viii. 17.

The elucidation of the prophecy (Isa. xlii. 1), as explained by our Lord, is as follows. For the Hebrew עֶבֶד (ebedi), ‘my servant,’ He does not say ὁ δούλος μου, but ὁ παῖς μου, where païs offers a double sense, servant and son. (Cp. on Acts iii. 13. 26; iv. 27. 30.) And it is one of the felicitous circumstances (may not they be called providential?) which mark the formation of the LXX Version, that in this prophecy concerning Christ it was enabled to use a word (païs) which might suggest the double sense of the word, pre-eminently significant of Christ, in Whom were united the obedience of the servant and the dearness of the Son. (Cp. Heb. iii. 5, 6.) Again, where the Hebrew is עֲלֵמָה (elhamak-bo), ‘I will lay hold on him, in order to support him’ (see Ps. lxxiii. 8, especially Ps. lxxxix. 21. Isa. xli. 10), He says ὃν ἡρέτισα, ‘whom I laid hold on or chose, My delight.’

And for מְשִׁפָּט מְשִׁפָּט (ad yasim ba-arets mishpat) in

Isa. xlii. 4, ‘till He establish justice on the Earth,’ He says, ἕως ἂν ἐκβάλῃ εἰς νίκος τὴν κρίσιν, ‘till He bring forth judgment to victory,’ so that no further conflict will remain, i. e. His judgment will not only be true, but victorious.

In v. 21, He says κατ' ὄνοματι, and in His Name, for ἰσχυρήν (ulethoratho), and for His Law, which would have given an unintelligible sense to a Gentile unacquainted with the old covenant.

The next modification ἔθνη for ὄνη (iyim), islands, was almost a necessary modification, inasmuch as nῆσοι, islands, though a literal rendering, would not to a Greek or Gentile ear have the sense of ἔθνη, Gentiles, which it had to the Hebrews familiar with the Old Testament (e. g. Gen. x. 5. See Mede's Essay, p. 272).

Thus the Holy Ghost speaking by the Evangelist vindicates our Lord from the cavils of the Pharisees, as described in this chapter, and shows that His meek and pacific, and yet wise and victorious conduct in dealing with His enemies, corresponded with that predicted of the Messiah in the Old Testament. He also teaches those who required to be taught, that the prophet is there speaking of the Messiah, as indeed the Chaldee paraphrast understood him to do.

From this passage and others we perceive the reasons why the Evangelists did not always cite the LXX Version of the Old Testament, nor yet always give a literal version of their own. Their purpose was to give the sense which was in the mind of the Spirit when He wrote the Prophecies. And since the Prophecies had been spoken in times long past, and to a single people, and since the Evangelical Interpretations of the Hebrew Prophecies were designed for all ages and nations of the world, therefore to accomplish their purpose of conveying the sense, it was necessary for them often to give a paraphrase rather than a version of them. In fact, the mode in which the ancient Prophecies are explained in the New Testament, displays a perfect exemplification of the critical rule,

20. Κάλαμον] “Qui peccatori non porrigit manum, nec portat onus fratris, quassatum calamus confringit; qui scintillam fidei contemnit in parvulis, linum extinguit fumigans.” Jerome.

23. Μήτι] Not nonne, but num, and so John viii. 22.

24. Βεελζεβούλ] See above, x. 25.

²⁷ οἱ υἱοὶ ὑμῶν] your sons. Hence it has been inferred, that some among the Jews were able to cast out devils. This is the more modern interpretation, and Acts xix. 13, 14, is quoted in behalf of it; but this does not seem conclusive; for there the devils were victorious.

Some of the Fathers affirm that by the words "your sons" our Lord here means the Apostles;

Observe His mildness. He did not say, By whom do My Apostles cast them out? but By whom do your sons?—in order that they might be brought to the same mind with the Apostles, whom He calls their sons. For the Apostles had received power from Him to cast out devils (Matt. x. 1), and it does not appear that the Jews had brought any such charge against them. And the Apostles were taken from among the Jews, and yet they listened to Christ and owned Him as their Master; therefore "they shall be your judges," i.e. condemn you of inconsistency, and unbelief, and of envy and malice against Me. (Chrys., Hilary.)

The Pharisees ascribed the works of God to the power of the Devil. Our Lord does not answer their words, but their thoughts, in order that even thus they might be constrained to acknowledge the power of Him to be Divine, who saw the secrets of their hearts. And He asks this question, "By whom do your sons cast them out?"—your sons, the Apostles, concerning whom He said (ix. 28), "Ye shall sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." (Jerome.)

²⁸ Εἰ ἐγὼ] 'If I by the Spirit of God;' or, as it is in St. Luke, 'If I by the finger of God,'—that finger which the Magicians of Egypt acknowledged (Exod. viii. 19), and by which the law was written. Exod. xxiv. 12; xxxi. 18. Deut. ix. 10. (Jerome.)

—ἐφθασεν] came upon you with an idea of surprise; an Hellenistic use of the word, preserved in modern Greece. See Koray, Ἀτακτα, iii. 646.

Observe His gentleness and love. He would attract them to Himself. Why do you cavil at the blessings which are now offered to you? Why resist God's gracious designs for your salvation? Rather you ought to rejoice because the kingdom of God is come to you; and because I am present, to give you the blessings preannounced by the Prophets, and because your ghostly enemy Satan is now cast out by Me. (Chrys.)

²⁹ τοῦ ἰσχυροῦ] the strong man. We ought not to think ourselves secure. Our ghostly enemy is called the strong man even by his conqueror, and he is the "Prince of this world," which lieth in wickedness. (John xii. 31. Eph. ii. 2.) The Tempter was bound by Christ at the Temptation, when he was called Satan by Christ,—"Get thee hence, Satan" (Matt. iv. 10); and Christ entered his house and spoiled his goods,—that is, rescued us men from his grasp, and subdued us to Himself, and made us fit for Himself. "Vasa ejus et domus nos eramus." Iren. iii. 8. 1. Hilary. Cp. Cyril on Luke, p. 373.

On the use of the word σκεῦος in this sense see note below on 1 Thess. iv. 4.

³⁰ Ὁ μὴ ὦν μετ' ἐμοῦ] Observe μὴ, not οὐ (Winer, p. 428). If a man is neutral, and is not in heart with Me in My conflict with Satan, he will be treated by Me as an enemy; and whosoever does not gather with Me,—that is, labour with Me in the spiritual harvest for the salvation of souls, scatters the ears of corn which he ought to bind into sheaves to be housed in My barn. This is to be compared with Mark ix. 40. Luke ix. 50.

This is another answer to the objection of the Jews. Satan is on one side, I on the other. He rebels against God; I invite all men to him. He holds men captive, I release them. He preaches idolatry, I the worship of the one true God. He tempts to sin, I lead to virtue. (Jerome, Chrys.) How then can I be thought to work with him and he with Me? He is not with Me, and therefore is against Me. He gathereth not with Me, and therefore scattereth.

He says, indeed, in another place, "He that is not against us is for us" (Mark ix. 40. Luke ix. 50), but these two sayings are not contrary. Here He is speaking of one opposed to Him in heart and hand; but there He is speaking of one who was with them in spirit though not in person; for he cast out devils in Christ's name.

Concerning the bounds of unity, the true placing of them importeth exceedingly. There appear to be two extremes. For to certain zealots all speech of pacification is odious. "Is it peace, Jehu? What hast thou to do with peace? turn thee behind me." Peace is not the matter, but following the party. Contrariwise, certain Laodiceans, and lukewarm persons, think they may accommodate points of religion by middle ways, and taking part of both, and witty reconcilements; as if they would make an arbitrement between God and man. Both these extremes are to be avoided; which will be done, if the league of Christians, penned by our Saviour Himself, were, in the two cross clauses thereof, soundly and plainly expounded: "he that is not with us is against us;" and again, "he that is not against us is with us;" that is, if the points fundamental, and of substance, in religion, were truly discerned and distinguished from points not merely of faith, but of opinion, order, or good intention. Lord Bacon (Essays; on Unity in Religion).

³¹ Πνεύματος βλασφημία] blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. Cp. Matt. x. 1, ἐξουσία πνευμάτων. 1 Cor. ix. 12, ἐξουσία ὑμῶν.

It is observable, that both in St. Matthew here (xii. 31, 32), and in St. Mark (iii. 28, 29), our Lord says, 'sin and blasphemy' in the first member of the sentence, but only speaks of blasphemy in the latter member of the sentence, as irremissible. The question, therefore, which has been argued by Divines (see à Lapide here and Olshausen, and Professor Browne on Article XVI.) concerning sin against the Holy Ghost, may perhaps be properly reduced, as far as connected with this place, to an inquiry concerning the nature of Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost;

The Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, of which our Lord here speaks, is that which ascribes to Beelzebub the Prince of the Devils, and enemy of God and Man, works done by the Spirit of God for the salvation of man and the glory of God. They who sin thus (says Athanasius) refer the work of God to the Devil; they judge God to be the Devil; and the true God to have nothing more in His works than the Evil Spirit. Athanas. ad Serapion. § 50. Cp. St. Mark iii. 30. So Jerome, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and others interpret the passage.

Again, Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is greater than blasphemy against Christ as man, because the Holy Ghost did not take the nature of man; and Christ as man is inferior to the Holy Ghost. Athanas. contra Arian. p. 358; iv. pp. 561—567.

From this passage it is rightly inferred, that the Holy Ghost is a Person, and that He is God. See S. Cyril in Caten. on Luke xii. 10, and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. viii.

—οὐκ ἀφεθήσεται] i.e. is very unlikely to obtain forgiveness. Not that it never can. See Aug. Retract. i. 19, "de nullo quamvis pessimo in hac vitâ desperandum est;" and Ambrose, de Pœnit. ii. 4. But inasmuch as it grieves the Holy Ghost, and provokes Him to withdraw His grace from the soul and leave it to itself, it is almost a suicidal act; and it is impossible, humanly speaking, to renew such an one to repentance. Heb. vi. 4—8. But with God nothing is impossible. (Matt. xix. 26. Mark x. 27.) Cp. Aug. Sermon. lxxi. de Sermon. in Monte i. 22, and see the note on Mark vi. 5.

³² κατὰ τοῦ Υἱοῦ τ. ἀνθρώπου] He, who speaks a word against the Son of Man, being offended by My outward appearance, seeing that I am supposed to be the carpenter's son, and to have James and Joseph and Judas for My brethren, he may be forgiven; but he who sees My mighty works, and reviles Me who am the Word of God, and says that the works of the Holy Spirit, working by Me, are the works of Beelzebub, has no forgiveness. — οὔτε ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι] nor in the world to come. Some have hence inferred that sins not forgiven in this world may be forgiven in another. But this inference contradicts the general teaching of Scripture. (See Luke xvi. 26, and note. John ix. 4. Heb. iii. 13; ix. 27.) The Gloss on this passage says, "hence is refuted the heresy of Origen, who said, that after many ages all sinners should obtain pardon;" and St. Mark says (ch. iii. 29), οὐκ ἔχει ἀφεσιν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. The phrase taken together signifies nunquam, and is a Hebraism found in the Talmud. See Vorstius de Hebr. p. 42, just as ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ καὶ ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι, Eph. i. 21, is a Hebraism for semper.

It is observable that the Hebrew עֲוֹן (olam), according as it is used with certain pronouns, signifies both 'this world' and 'eternity.' Hence the similar use of αἰὼν in the N. Test., i. e. ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος, this present world, ὁ αἰὼν ἐκείνος, that world which is to come; εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, for the world, the future world, that which is κατ' ἐξοχὴν the world, for which we ought to prepare; εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, for the ages, i. e. for all ages; hence αἰώνιος, everlasting. See Matt. xxv. 46.

Since a good tree bringeth forth good fruit, and a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit (Matt. vii. 17), and since a tree is known by its fruits, therefore either (ποιήσατε) recognize Me as good, and thence infer that My works also are good; or, if you will not do this, prove Me to be evil, and therefore My works evil; for a tree is known by its fruits. But, since the fruits I bring forth are good, and you cannot deny this, therefore I cannot be evil. Therefore own Me as such, confess Me as the Son of God. You charge Me with working by means of Beelzebub, and thus you show yourselves to be children of the Evil One. You yourselves are γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν, the brood of the Old Serpent, how therefore can you speak what is good? No wonder, therefore, that you, being the children of the devil, revile the Son of God, and regard Him as an agent of the Evil One.

He thence is led to describe the punishment of evil words.

"Otiosum verbum," says Jerome, "est quod sine utilitate et loquentis dicitur et audientis, si omissis seriis de rebus frivolis loquamur;" and therefore a person is guilty of ῥήματα ἄργα, who omits to use speech for its proper purpose of edification to men and of glory to God, and abuses the best member that he has (Ps. cviii. 1) in uttering words of levity, impurity, or outrage against God, and calumny against man. How much more one who disseminates them by the public press!

— ἀποδώσουσι περὶ αὐτοῦ λόγον] This anomaly of Syntax, found sometimes in classical authors (Matth. Gr. Gr. §§ 310. 562), is of frequent occurrence in Hebrew (Gen. ii. 17. Exod. xxxii. 1. Ezek. xxxiii. 2. John xvii. 2. Acts x. 38), and is very useful in order to bring out the prominent idea (here ῥῆμα ἄργον) at the beginning of the sentence.

Here it may be observed generally, that most of the anomalies of language in the New Testament, which at first may offend the taste of the classical reader, are Hebraisms consecrated by use in the Old Testament, and are doubtless designed to remind him of the connexion of the New Testament with the Old, and to show that both Testaments are distinct from other books, and are from One and the same Hand. And they are admirably contrived to facilitate the grouping of ideas, and for presenting them in the best form and with the brightest colouring to the reader. They may indeed be called solecisms, when measured by the standards of human Philology; but they are above those standards, and are to be referred to the rules of another and higher Grammar—the Grammar of Inspiration.

— σημεῖον οὐ δοθήσεται] no sign shall be given: none in answer to their demands and to gratify their curiosity (cp. Herod's case, Luke xxiii. 8); and that sign, which shall be given, shall not be from heaven, but from the grave, and will not persuade them to believe, but condemn their unbelief.

But did not Christ give other σημεῖα? Yes; but not to the curiosity of a wicked and adulterous generation. See Mark vi. 5. Luke xxiii. 8.

But was the resurrection (typified by Jonah) given in answer to a challenge from that generation? Yes. See xxvii. 40. Mark xv. 29. John ii. 20, 21.

— Ἰωνᾶ τοῦ προφήτου] of Jonas the prophet. Jonah was a sign of Christ,—in preaching before and after His Resurrection. In offering himself to death to appease the storm and save the ship—an argument for the Atonement. In his burial and resurrection after three days. On the parallel between Jesus and Jonas, see Cyrl Hieron. Catech. xiv. p. 213.

⁴⁰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας καὶ τρεῖς νύκτας] three days and three nights. Our Blessed Lord sometimes speaks of His own Resurrection as to take place on the third day (cp. Matt. xvi. 21; xvii. 23; xx. 19. Mark x. 34. Luke xviii. 33; xxiv. 7); and sometimes as to take place after three days (Matt. xxvi. 61; xxvii. 63. Mark viii. 31). These periods therefore are coincident. This is explained from the Jewish mode of reckoning time, according to which any portion, however short, of the period of twenty-four hours was reckoned as a νυχθήμερον. See below, xvii. 1, and Hieron., Theophyl., Aug., and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. v. pp. 488. 492, and the notes.

Something like the notion derived from this text, and propagated by some in our own days, that our Lord was crucified on a Thursday, and therefore the observance of Good Friday is unscriptural, was broached and exploded in ancient times. See

Bp. Pearson, p. 488; à Lapide in loc. The following is from Kuin. "Duas tantum noctes, et unum diem Jesus in sepulcro fuit; sed Hebraei qui noctem diei initium constituebant, duas noctes cum partibus primi ac tertii diei tres dies atque tres noctes vocabant, tempus incompletum pro completo habebant; et in omnibus fere linguis, pars diei, mensis, anni, dies, mensis, annus per synecdochen dici solet. Sic etiam 1 Sam. xxx. 12, tres dies et noctes, v. 13, explicatur usque ad diem tertium; add. 2 Chron. x. 5, coll. v. 12. Gen. xlii. 17, 18. Deut. xiv. 28, coll. xxvi. 12. Vide Relandi Antiquitates Hebr. iv. 20. Hanc verò fuisse Judæorum loquendi consuetudinem, et hic ipse locus noster docet, et exinde quoque patet quod, ut probe Relandus l. h. monuit, nunquam Apostolis controversia mota est de spatio hoc dierum et noctium quo se Jesus in sepulchro commoraturum esse prædixerat."

"I have treated more fully," says S. Jerome, "on this passage in my comment on the Prophet Jonah: I will now only say, that this is to be explained by a figure of speech called synecdoche, by which a part is put for the whole; not that our Lord was three whole days and three nights in the grave, but part of Friday, part of Sunday, and the whole of Saturday are reckoned as three days."

The days of Christ's absence from His disciples were shortened in mercy to them as far as was consistent with the fulfilment of the prophecy.

Observe the great use of the Gospel in confirming the Old Testament. Our Lord here refers to the wonderful history of Jonah, swallowed and disgorged by the fish. He treats it as a true history, to be understood in its plain sense, and expounds the meaning of it, hitherto unrevealed, viz. that it was not only a history, but also a mystery; a prophecy, a typical representation of Himself,—of His own wonderful Death, Burial, and Resurrection.

Thus the History of Jonah is proved to be true, by the testimony of Him who is the Truth.

Compare the testimony of the Holy Ghost, speaking by the Apostle St. Peter, confirming the marvellous history of Balaam and the ass, in its plain, literal, and grammatical sense. (2 Pet. ii. 15.)

By this specimen of exposition, Our Blessed Lord delivers a divine Protest against the scepticism of modern days, which denies the verity of the miracles of the Old Testament; and against the Rationalism which attempts to explain them away.

He also suggests to all readers of the Old Testament the belief, that whatever they may now find there difficult to be understood, will one day be explained, and perhaps be seen to be prophetic and typical of the greatest mysteries of the Gospel; and that in the mean time it is an exercise of their Faith, and a trial of their humility,—a divinely appointed instrument of their moral probation. And it is because such histories as those of Jonah and Balaam are strange and marvellous, that they are the best tests of the strength of our faith.

—καρδία τῆς γῆς] Jonah's soul as well as body was ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ τοῦ κήτους (Jonah ii. 1). Therefore the καρδία γῆς may be what St. Paul calls τὰ κατώτερα τῆς γῆς (Eph. iv. 9. 1 Pet. iii. 19. See the passages of the Fathers, quoted by Bp. Pearson, Art. v. pp. 443—450), and this appears to be spoken of our Lord's human soul descending into Sheol or Hades.

41. Ἰωῶνᾶ] On this form of the genitive in ᾧ from nom. ᾧ see Winer, § 8, p. 57. In the N. T. we have other similar geni-tives, Κλωπᾶ, Στεφανᾶ, Κηφᾶ, Σατανᾶ, Ἐπαφρᾶ; also from as unaccentuated, Ἄννα, Καϊάφα, Ἀρέτα, Βαρνάβα.

42. Βασίλισσα Νότου] Observe the absence of the article. See i. 1.

—περάτων τῆς γῆς] Hebr. גְּזֵרֵי הָאָרֶץ or גְּזֵרֵי (aphsey or ketsoth haarets), Ps. ii. 8; lxx. 8, and passim.

43. Ὅταν δὲ τὸ ἀκάθαρτον πνεῦμα κ.τ.λ.] But when the unclean spirit has gone out of the man who was possessed by it. What is the connexion here? Our Lord is declaring the dangerous condition of that generation of the Jewish people, in consequence of their neglect and abuse of those especial spiritual privileges, which He Himself, by His Incarnation and Ministry, was now offering to them. He compares their state to that of one who has been liberated from dæmoniacal possession. They had been freed from Satan by Moses and the Prophets: and now Christ is come to perfect and secure their moral and spiritual emancipation. But as one who has been liberated by God's goodness from the Devil, and afterwards having tasted both the bitterness of bondage and the sweets of liberty, lapses into a worse state, if he does not watch and keep his spiritual house against the return of the Evil Spirit, so their state will be one of greater shame and misery, even in proportion to their present spiritual privileges. See on Luke xi. 24, and compare the declaration of St. Paul, Heb. vi. 4—8.

—ἀνδρῶν τόπων] dry places; the opposite of Paradise, and striking witnesses of man's sin, which is the cause of physical as well as moral wildness and desolation. Cp. Rom. viii. 19—22.

44. οἶκόν μου] my house. "Suum putat; ἐξῆλθον, quasi non effectus." (Beng.)

—εὐρίσκει σχολάζοντα] he finds it empty, swept, and garnished, like an untenanted lodging, ready to be let to the first comer. "Vacuum Deo, Deique gratiâ, ideoque aptam ut fiat domus Diaboli, nam Nihil agere est male agere."

45. Οὕτως ἔσται τῇ γενεᾷ τ.] The Evil Spirit had been cast out of the Jewish Nation when they received the Law; and he walked in the wilderness of heathenism. But the Heathen were now about to believe in God; and the Devil would be cast out of them. And now he was returning to assail the Jews, and the last state of that Nation is worse than the first; for they are now beset by a larger number of evil spirits, when they blaspheme Christ in their synagogues, and so they are in a worse condition than when they were in Egypt itself, before the Law. Accordingly the calamities which befell the Jews under Vespasian and Titus, were far more grievous than any in Egypt, or Babylon, or under Antiochus. (Jerome.) Here is a warning to those who speak softly of Judaism as it is now. We must pray for the Jews, and even the more fervently, because Christ has taught us to abhor Judaism.

46. οἱ ἀδελφοί] his brethren. Compare xiii. 55, where his brethren are called James and Joses and Simon and Judas, and these were sons of a Mary. See xxvii. 56. Some of the ancients imagined that these were children of Joseph by a former marriage. (Euseb. ii. 1.) But the more probable opinion is that they were consobriti, or cousins of Christ (Euseb. Hist. iii. 11); sons of the Mary who was the sister of the Blessed Virgin and wife of Cleophas or Alphæus. See x. 3. John xix. 25. Jerome, ad loc., who calls them "Mariæ liberos, materteræ Domini, quæ esse dicitur mater Jacobi et Josephi et Judæ." See also Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii. pp. 330—333, and Dr. W. H. Mill's Dissertations, ii. pp. 221—290.

The following important fragment on the four Maries is from Papias, scholar of St. John (ap. Routh, Reliq. Sacr. i. p. 16, ex Cod. MS. Bibl. Bodl. 2397).

"i. Maria, mater Domini. ii. Maria, Cleophæ sive Alphæi uxor, quæ fuit mater Jacobi Episcopi et Apostoli, et Simonis et Thadei et cujusdam Joseph. iii. Maria Salome, uxor Zebedei, mater Joannis Evangelistæ et Jacobi (confer Matt. xxvii. 56, et Marc. xv. 40 et xvi. 1). iv. Maria Magdalena. (We may add v. Mary of Bethany.)

"Istæ quatuor in evangelio reperiuntur. Jacobus et Judas et Joseph filii erant materteræ Domini. Jacobus quoque et Joannes alterius materteræ Domini fuerunt filii. Maria Jacobi Minoris et Joseph mater, uxor Alphæi soror fuit Mariæ, matris Domini, quam Cleophæ Joannes nominat (xix. 25), vel à patre vel à gentilitatis familiâ vel aliâ causâ. Maria Salome vel à viro, vel à vico, dicitur: hanc eandem Cleophæ quidam dicunt, quòd duos viros habuerit."

48. Τίς ἐστὶν ἡ μήτηρ μου;] Who is my mother? "Non spernit matrem, sed anteponit Patrem." (Beigel.)

"Qui Christi frater est credendo, mater efficitur prædicando; quasi enim parit eum quem in corde audientis infuderit; et si per ejus vocem amor Domini in proximi mente generatur." (Greg. M. Moral. in Evang. iii. p. 1445.)

His mother was perhaps moved by a spirit of vain-glory, and came to draw Him from preaching; to display to the multitude the power she had over One who could work so great miracles. (Theophylact on Mark iii. 32.) Hear what He says, because His mother and His brethren were eager to show that they were related to Him, and were vain-glorious on that account. (S. Chrys. on ch. viii. 20.) Hence we learn that, without holiness, it would have been of no benefit even to have borne Christ in the womb, and to bring forth that Wonderful Offspring.

He uttered these words (says Chrys.) not as if He were ashamed of His Mother, or denied her to be His Mother, but to show that her maternity was of no benefit to her unless she did her duty. And what she now attempted to do was an effect of exceeding vain-glory. For she desired to show the people that she had power and authority over her Son. Observe her folly—ἀπόνοιαν. (Chrys.)

Such comments show, what would have been the opinion of S. Chrysostom and the Church in his age, on the dogma now enforced by the Church of Rome as an article of faith; viz. that the Blessed Virgin was exempt from original and actual sin.

Observe then her folly and theirs, for when they ought to have come in and listened with the multitude to Christ, and if they were not willing to do this, to await the conclusion of His Discourse, and then to address Him, they call Him out, and do this in the presence of all, betraying excessive ambition, and wishing to show that they can command Him. (Chrys.)

There is but one true nobility, that of obedience to God. This is greater than that of the Virgin's relationship to Christ. Therefore when a woman in the crowd exclaimed, "Blessed is the womb that bare Thee and the paps that Thou hast sucked; He did not say, She is not My Mother, but if she desires to be blessed, let her do the will of God; He said, yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it" (St. Luke xi. 27). Chrys.

See also S. Aug. (in Joan. Tract. x.), "Mater mea, quam appellatis felicem, inde felix est, quia verbum Dei audit, non quia in illâ Verbum caro factum est, sed quia custodit ipsum verbum Dei, per quod facta est, et quod in illâ caro factum est."

How many women have blessed that Holy Virgin and her womb, and have desired to be such a mother as she was! What hinders them? Christ has made for us a wide way to this happiness: and not only women, but men may tread it; the way of

Obedience, this is it which makes such a mother—not the throes of parturition. (Chrys.)

CH. XIII. 3. ἐν παραβολαῖς] in parables. Hebr. מִשְׁלֵּי (meshalim), from root שָׁלַח (meshal), to compare, make like. See Ps. xlix. 12. Isaiah xiv. 10; xlii. 5. From the frequent use of comparisons in short pithy sayings among the Orientals (see the Talmud, passim, Cod. Berachoth, Cod. Schabbath, &c.), the word meshal often signifies some sententious adage, apophthegm, or speech (alvos, ἀπόλογος),—and therefore Balaam's prophecy is so called, Numb. xxiii. 18; xxiv. 15. Cp. Isa. xiv. 4. 2 Chron. vii. 20; and Job's speech, xxvii. 1.

The word παραβολή had been applied by the LXX to the Proverbs of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 32, ἐλάλησε τρισχίλιαις παραβολάς); but the Proverbs are inscribed παροιμίαι, which is a more general term. See John xvi. 25. Vorst de Hebr. p. 140, and Glass. Philol. Sacr. pp. 217—224. 914, and Notes on the Parables by the Very Rev. R. C. Trench, D.D., Lond. 1853, fifth edition, and Olshausen's note here, who refers with commendation to Unger's work, De Parabolarum Jesu Naturâ et Interpretatione, Lips. 1828. A List of works on the Parables will be found in Dean Trench's excellent volume, pp. 520—523. For some rules in interpreting them see xx. 2—10, and for some topographical illustrations of them see Stanley, Palest., p. 409—23.

This chapter may be described as containing a Divine Treatise on the Church Militant here on earth. The Parables in it form a whole, representing the true nature of the βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ, i. e. of the Christian Church, as far as it is visible.

That of the Sower (v. 3), explained by Christ Himself (Matt. xiii. 18. Mark iv. 14. Luke viii. 11), exhibits Christ going forth to sow the Seed of the Word, and the various reception of the same divine seed by various persons, according to their disposition and tempers, and their resistance or non-resistance to the temptations of the World, the Flesh, and the Devil; and it brings out the doctrine that we must take heed how we hear (Luke viii. 10), and must receive with meekness the engrafted Word. (James i. 21.)

That of the Tares and Wheat (v. 24) accounts for the existence of Evil in this world, and declares that it is not from God, at the same time that it assures us of God's perfect goodness, and of His desire and design, short of compulsion, that the whole world should be saved; for as our Lord declares, "the Field is the World,"—that is, in His Will and design the Church is coextensive with the World. It assures us also of the preservation of the Good, and of the continuance of the Church Visible unto the End; and of the future, full, and final Victory of Good over Evil, and the everlasting reward of Virtue, and eternal punishment of Sin.

It therefore warns us not to be staggered and perplexed by the temporary triumphs of Evil, of Heresy and Schism in the Church, and of Vice in the World. It inculcates the duties of Faith, Stedfastness, Patience, Forbearance, Courage, Hope, and Love; and of maintaining Unity in the Church, and of endeavouring to reclaim the erring, and to overcome the evil with good.

That of the Grain of Mustard-seed (v. 31) is prophetic of the growth of the Gospel from very small beginnings throughout the whole world, and of the reception of Gentile Nations beneath its shadow, as birds of the air flock to, and nestle in, the branches of a tree. And it calls attention to the marvellous and continued Propagation of the Gospel, as indicating that it is from God, and will ever be protected by His Omnipotence and Love.

That of the Leaven (v. 33) calls attention to human agency,—especially to that of the Church,—symbolized by the woman employed as God's chosen instrument in this divine work of evangelization; and it reminds all members of the Church of their missionary duties.

These Parables being prophetic, are designed to afford evidence of the truth of Christianity; and they have given, and will ever continue to give, such evidence, by their gradual accomplishment in the diffusion of the Gospel of Christ.

The Parable of the Treasure found in the field (v. 44), intimates that God, of His own accord, discovers the truth to persons engaged in doing their duty, if they have such dispositions as would lead them to sell all for the truth's sake.

The Parable of the Pearl (v. 45) indicates, that if men seek for truth, with a readiness to sell all for it, they will certainly find it.

Both these Parables inculcate the duty of forming and cherishing such a temper as would dispose us to purchase Truth at any cost, and not to sell it at any price.

The Parable of the Draw-net (v. 47) intimates the use which God makes of the Fishers of men, to draw the Net of the Gospel through the sea of this world; and it teaches, that in this Net—i. e. in the Church Visible on Earth—there are, and ever will be, some of every kind, bad fish mingled with good; but that at last the Net will be drawn to shore; and then, at the end of the world, a severance will be made for ever of the good from the bad, and some will be saved and others lost.

The last (or seventh Parable), that of the Net, like the Seventh Seal and the Seventh Trumpet in the Apocalypse, declares the final consummation of all things. See Alexander Knox, Remains, i. p. 425, where are some excellent remarks on these parables. Cp. Aug. Quest. in Matth. i. 10—16.

It teaches that the present mixed state of the Visible Church will continue to the end; that the Missionary work of the Church will also continue to the end; that the Net of Evangelical Preaching will be drawn through the whole Sea of the World; and that there is a Judgment to come.

These truths—inculcating the Christian duties of charity, patience, zeal, faith, hope, and watchfulness, are summed up in the last parable, as being of special importance and requiring continual attention.

It is observable, that all these Parables of our Lord, concerning the Kingdom of Heaven, are declaratory rather of the condition of the Church in its present mixed and imperfect state on earth, than of its future condition in heaven, when it will be cleansed from all taint and blemish; i. e. they teach us to lay very great stress on the performance of present duty, in order to future glory.

— Ἰδοὺ ἐξῆλθεν] See Clem. Rom. § 24, p. 101.

— ὁ σπείρων] The Sower. On the use of the definite article in parables describing an ideal person, whose character forms the principal subject of the picture, see Winer, p. 97. Cp. ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός, John x. 11.

8. ἐδίδου] was bringing forth. Observe the contrast of the imperfect tense in this case, with the aorists in the other cases.

9. Ὁ ἔχων ὦτα ἀκούειν] He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. A solemn saying, showing man's great proneness to inattention, and the absolute necessity of attention to Christ's words, and therefore often repeated by our Lord on earth and even from heaven, after His ascension. See Matt. xi. 15; xiii. 43; and Rev. ii. 7, "He that hath an ear," &c. Rev. ii. 11. 17. 29; iii. 6. 13. 22.

11. ὑμῖν ἐδόται] to you it is given. Faith, therefore, and knowledge are God's gifts to be sought by prayer. Thus we see the ignorance and folly of the wise, i. e. of those who deem themselves so, such as Scribes and Pharisees, and all who are like them; and hence Christ spake in parables, which would be intelligible to all who pray for grace to understand them, but not to those who despise Him and esteem themselves; and thus the Parables were designed as a moral trial and visible manifestation of men's tempers, whether they are fit for the Kingdom of Heaven, which these Parables describe.

— μυστήρια] mysteries. μυστήριον either from Gr. μύω, to shut; or (as Casaubon and others suppose) from Hebr. מִסְתָּר (mistar), from root סָתַר (sathar), to hide; hence something which is involved, or concealed, or symbolized by something external, as the soul in the body,—a sacramentum.

12. οὐκ ἔχει] he has not. For a person is not supposed to have, if he does not use what he has. God intends that His gifts should be χρήματα as well as κτήματα.

14. ἡ προφητεία Ἡσαΐου] the prophecy of Isaiah. Isa. vi. 9. The verbs are imperative in the original, here they are future (as also Acts xxviii. 26). This deserves notice, as explaining this and other similar prophecies, where the sin of man seems to be represented as due to the will of God. Wherever this appears to be the case, the true explanation is,—that sin, which God does not prevent, and is permitted by Him, is a penalty and chastisement of the sinner. In this sense, God is said to choose men's delusions, Isa. lvi. 4, and their own backslidings are said to reprove them, Jer. ii. 19.

The Holy Spirit here teaches us how these prophecies are to be understood, viz. as Divine declarations of the future; and He confirms the LXX interpretation, who had already rendered them in this way, and whose words He adopts here literatim.

By explaining here and in other places the LXX, and in not doing so always (see above, xii. 18), He shows that the sense given in the former cases is a correct and clear sense; and in the latter cases He intimates, that though it may be a correct sense, yet it is not so clear as is desirable for those (i. e. for the Gentiles as well as Jews) to whom the Gospels are delivered, and for whom they were written.

15. ἐκάμμυσαν] they closed their eyes. "Ergo Deus eos sanare voluerat." (Beng.) h ch. 3. 12.

19. οὗτος] this is he that has been sown. It is observable, that all the Evangelists use the masculine gender here, i. e. they consider the person as sown; that is, the seed is not responsible for the use made of the seed; but the person who receives the seed is responsible, and is therefore identified with it: the seed passes into him, is moulded up with him, and assumes his nature; it loses, as it were, its own gender and number, and takes his. See Mark iv. 16. 18, οἱ σπειρόμενοι, and Luke viii. 13, οἱ ἐπὶ πέτρας.

24. παρέθηκεν] he propounded; literally, he set before them—as spiritual food.

25. ζιζάνια] zizania. ‘Talmudici nominant, זִיזִי (zozim),’ a degenerate wheat, and which may also be reclaimed into wheat. See Tractat. Kilaim, I. Halach. I (Melchior apud Mintert in v.), “genus seminis quod tritici erat non assimile, verum degenerabat.” Latin Lolium temulentum. Virg. Georg. i. 154. Fr. gyroie. Cp. Winer, Lex. sub v. Lolch, oder Tollkorn. See also Dean Trench on the Parables, p. 91.

26. ἐφάνη τὰ ζιζάνια] The Tares were apparent. This, combined with v. 30, supplies an answer to those who say that heretics may be destroyed by force, if they are known to be such. (Chrys.) Aug. Qu. in Matt. qu. 2. In such a case, if they remain obstinate, they are indeed to be separated by the wholesome exercise of Church Discipline from Communion with the Church in holy offices (see Matt. xviii. 17. 1 Cor. v. 5. 9. Article XXXIII.), and therefore this parable gives no countenance to the Erastian theory that all Church power consists merely in persuasion. Cp. Hammond on the Power of the Keys, i. p. 429. Bp. Sanderson, Prælect. vii. 29. Archd. Pott on Christian Sovereignty, p. 24.

On the other hand, they are not to be eradicated from the soil, because, through the frailty of human judgment, what may seem to be ζιζάνια, may not be ζιζάνια; and wheat may be rooted up as tares; and because what are now degenerate wheat, may one day become good wheat, and be gathered as such into the garner of heaven. (Cp. Jerome here.)

30. ἄφετε συναυξάνεσθαι] let them grow together. For ancient expositions of doctrine to be derived from this Parable, and also from that of the Draw-net; with which we may compare the words of the Baptist concerning the Chaff and the Wheat, Matt. iii. 12, Luke iii. 17, which were generally associated by the Fathers with these parables; and the doctrinal and practical instruction deduced from them; see the language of S. Augustine, in his works against the Donatists, particularly in vol. ix. ed. Benedict. See also his Sermons, e. g. lxxxvii. 21, 22, p. 687. Some passages are quoted in Theophilus Anglicanus, part i. ch. ii., e. g. as follows:—S. Aug. iv. 497 (addressing the Donatists), says, “Tolera et zizania, si triticum es; tolera paleam, si triticum es; tolera pisces malos inter retia, si piscis bonus es. Quare ante tempus ventilationis avolasti? Quare ante tempus messis frumenta eradicasti tecum? quare, antequam ad littus venires, retia disruptisti?”—And v. 129, “Geme in areâ, ut gaudeas in horreo.”

Again, Epist. cv. 16, “Quos corrigere non valemus, etiamsi necessitas cogit pro salute cæterorum ut Dei Sacramenta nobiscum communicent, peccatis tamen eorum non communicemus, quod non fit nisi consentiendo et favendo. Sic enim eos in isto mundo, in quo Ecclesia catholica per omnes gentes diffunditur, quam agrum suum Dominus dicit, tanquam zizania inter triticum, vel in hac unitatis areâ tanquam paleam permixtam frumento, vel intra retia verbi et sacramenti tanquam malos pisces cum bonis inclusos, usque ad tempus messis aut ventilationis aut littoris toleramus, ne propter illos eradicemus et triticum, aut grana nuda ante tempus de areâ separata, non in horreum mittenda purgemus, sed volatilibus colligenda projiciamus; aut disruptis per schismata retibus, dum quasi malos pisces cavemus, in mare perniciosæ libertatis exeamus.”

S. Cyprian, de Unit. Eccles. p. 111, “Nemo existimet bonos Ecclesiâ posse discedere. Triticum non rapit ventus; inanes paleæ tempestate jactantur.” And Epist. liv. p. 99: “Etsi videntur in Ecclesiâ esse zizania, non tamen impediri debet aut fides aut caritas nostra, ut, quoniam zizania esse in Ecclesiâ cernimus, ipsi de Ecclesiâ recedamus. Nobis tantummodo laborandum est ut frumentum esse possimus, ut, cum ceperit frumentum Dominicis horreis condi, fructum pro opere nostro et labore capiamus.”

Among English Divines we may refer to the words of Hooker, iii. 1. 8 and 10, “Our Saviour compareth His Church unto a field, where tares manifestly known and seen by all men do grow intermingled with good corn, and even so shall continue till the full consummation of the world. God hath ever, and ever shall have, some Church Visible upon earth. The Church of Christ which was from the beginning, is, and continueth unto the end. Of which Church all parts have not been always equally sincere and sound.”

And, again, lxvi. 6, “The (Visible) Church of God (on earth) (i. e. as far as it is an object for the sense and judgment of man) may contain them which are not indeed His, yet (by reason of their outward profession of Christ) must be reputed His by us, that know not their inward thoughts.”

“For to this, and no other purpose, are meant those Parables which our Saviour in the Gospel hath, concerning mixture of Vice with Virtue, Light with Darkness, Truth with Error, as well openly known and seen as cunningly cloaked.”

θερισμοῦ ἐρῶ τοῖς θερισταῖς, Συλλέξατε πρῶτον τὰ ζιζάνια, καὶ δῆσατε αὐτὰ εἰς δέσμας πρὸς τὸ κατακαῦσαι αὐτὰ, τὸν δὲ σῖτον συναγάγετε εἰς τὴν ἀποθήκην μου.

So Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ix., "Within the notion of the Church (Visible on Earth) are comprehended good and bad, being both externally called. For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a Field, in which wheat and tares grow together unto the harvest; like unto a Net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind; like unto a Floor, in which is laid up wheat and chaff. I conclude, therefore, as the ancient Catholics did against the Donatists, that within the Church, in the public profession and external Communion thereof, are contained persons truly good and sanctified, and hereafter saved; and, together with them, other persons, hereafter to be damned." See also Bp. Beveridge and Professor Browne, on Article XXVI.

(S. Ambrose, on Luke xiii. 21.) The indicative ἐζυμώθη (not subjunctive ζυμωθῇ) shows that the whole world will be leavened.

35. τοῦ προφῆτου] the Prophet. Ps. lxxviii. 2, attributed to Asaph. St. Matthew here follows the LXX in the former part of the quotation, but in the latter ἡ ἀββία χιδοθὶν minnikedem, where the LXX have φθέγγομαι προβλήματα ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, he has paraphrastically, but more strongly and expressively, ἐρεῖξομαι (a word properly applied to Him who is the Fountain of living waters) κεκρυμμένα ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου. See Surenhus. pp. 245, 246.

VOL. I.

This is a difficult passage. If we examine the lxxviii Psalm, we find it to be a History of the Ancient Church in the Wilderness. And it commences with the solemn appeal, "Hear My Law, O My People," words only appropriate in the mouth of God. And in the second verse historical records are called parables and dark sayings (chidoth), piercing words, ἀντίκεντρα.

The solution of these questions seems to be given by the Holy Spirit in the present passage applying those words to Christ. Christ speaks by Asaph. Christ calls on His people to hear His own Law. And the historical records of the Ancient Church are dark sayings, for they are τύποι εὐαγγελίου. As St. Paul shows (1 Cor. x. 11), they are figures of us who are Christians; they are symbols of our Sacraments; they are not only true Histories, but Prophetical Parables in action. As far as the People of Israel was a Son of God, it was a Type of Christ: hence the Holy Spirit applies to Christ a passage of Hosea spoken of Israel, "Out of Egypt have I called my Son." See above, ii. 15. In this respect, also, their history is parabolical, and is so treated by the Holy Spirit in the Gospel.

Viewed in this light the historical records of the Old Testament, describing the events in the wilderness, are something more than true narratives; they are also Prophecies and Types, and belong to the same system of Divine Teaching as the spoken Parables of this chapter; and therefore the same words may be applied to both, "I will open my mouth in Parables."

41. τοὺς ἀγγέλους αὐτοῦ] His Angels, the Angels belonging to Christ. He is therefore God.

— σκάνδαλα] offensiones, προσκόμματα, σκάζω, claudico, Hebr. ἡῡῡῡ, offendiculum, a cause of stumbling and of sin. And σκανδαλίζω, to cause to stumble or sin. See 1 Cor. i. 23; viii. 13. Rom. xiv. 13. 21. For an excellent account of these words, see Vorst de Hebr. pp. 87—101.

43. τότε] then the righteous shall shine forth as the sun; like Christ. Rev. i. 16.

x Mark 6. 5.

44—52. θησαυροῦ] treasure. Christ is the treasure hid in the field ; He is hid in the field of Holy Scripture, where He is pre-signified by types and parables. (Iren. iv. 26.) On these parables see the Hom. of Greg. M. in Evang. xi. p. 1473.

46. πέπρακε] has sold—without a moment's delay.

49. ἀφοριοῦσι] On the contracted form of the future (ἀφοριῶ) in New Testament, see Winer, p. 69. So μετοικιῶ, Acts vii. 43. γνωριοῦσι, Col. iv. 9. Cp. Matt. iii. 12 ; xii. 21 ; xxv. 32. Luke i. 48, for other examples.

52. γραμματεὺς—καὶνὰ καὶ παλαιά] A scribe, ἱεὺς (sopher) (Vorst de Hebr. p. 83), a teacher (σοφὸς), connected with ἔρ (sepher), a book, i. e. an interpreter of the sacred Volume. Christ is the Divine Teacher, the heavenly Scribe, who brings out of His own treasure things new and old, in order to enrich the world with holy wisdom ; and every skilful Teacher of His religion must imitate Him in this respect.

Christ in His Parables, Precepts, and Prayers, did not disdain to avail Himself of what was already received in the world. He built His religion on the foundation of the Old Testament, and also on the primæval basis of man's original constitution and nature rightly understood. (See Bp. Butler's Sermons on Human Nature.) And He teaches His Apostles and Ministers not to reject any thing that is true, and therefore of God ; but to avail themselves of what is old, in teaching what is new, and, by teaching what is new, to confirm what is old ; to show that the Gospel is not contrary to the Law, and that both are from One and the Same Source (cp. Iren. iv. 9), in harmony with Nature (see Iren. iv. 13), and that One and the same God is Author of them all. God the Father is the Original of all ; and God the Son, the Eternal Logos, Who manifests the Father by Creation and by Revelation,—Who made the World and Who Governs it,—is the Dispenser and Controller of all.

The necessity of this precept has been shown in the history of the Marcionite and Manichæan controversy (see Tertullian, adv. Marcion. p. 365, and S. Aug., Works against the Manichæans, in vol. x. ed. Bened.), and in the erroneous teaching of some in more recent times, who either, on the one hand, would set aside Revelation on the plea that Reason is sufficient (see Leland's History of Deism, ii. 32. 182), or, on the other hand, would disparage Reason as if it were superseded by Revelation. See Hooker, I. xiv. ; II. iv. ; and II. viii. 7, and Bp. Sanderson's Praelations, Præl. iv. Works, vol. iv. 76. 142.

"The Apostles," says Jerome, "were like Christ's notaries, who registered His words on the tables of their hearts, and drew out from that storehouse of doctrine things new and old, proving what they preached in the Gospel by testimonies of the Law and the prophets ; whence the Bride says in the Canticles, 'At our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old, which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved' (Cant. vii. 13)."

53. μετῆρεν] He departed. "Finem fecit habitandi Caper-naumi. Deinceps ab Herode agitatus" (et ab incolis spretus et ut cæteris prædicaret) "minus uno loco mansit." (Bengel.)

54. Πόθεν τούτῳ ἡ σοφία] Whence has this man this wisdom ? Strange blindness in these Nazarenes ! They wonder how Wisdom itself has wisdom, and how Power itself has power. But here was its cause, they deemed Him the carpenter's Son. But their error is our safety ; for thus His humanity is proved. (Jerome.)

55. ὁ τέκτονος υἱός] Mark vi. 3, ὁ τέκτων. Cf. Sozomen. vi. 2, who relates that when a Christian was scoffingly asked by a heathen, What the carpenter's son was doing ? he answered that He was making a coffin for Julian.

— ἡ μήτηρ] His mother. Hence we may infer that Joseph was now dead.

— Μαριάμ, Ἰάκωβος] Mary, James, &c. "Hos sic nominant, quasi nil haberent nisi nomen." (Beng.)

— οἱ ἀδελφοί] His brethren. See above, xii. 46. "Ἰάκωβος (i. e. minor) καὶ Ἰούδας auctores Epistolarum Canonicarum . . . Simon vel Simeon successit fratri Jacobo in Episcopatu Hierosolymitano" (à Lapide). Euseb. iii. 11. Cp. Euseb. iv. 22.

Joses here seems to be the same as Joses in xxvii. 56. It is probable that the four persons here named were sons of Cleopas or Alphæus.

CH. XIV. 1. [Ἡρώδης ὁ τετράρχης] Herod. Antipas, or Antipater, son of Herod the king, by Malthace, a Samaritan woman. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1. 9.) Tetrarch or ruler of Galilee and Peræa. (Ibid. xvii. 8.) He had married the daughter of Aretas, King of Arabia, but deserted her for Herodias, daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5), and wife of Philip, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne (Joseph. ibid.). If a man died childless, his brother was commanded to marry his wife and raise up seed to his brother (Deut. xxv. 5). But if not, not. But Herod took to himself the wife of his brother, who had a daughter by him, and therefore John reproved him. (Chrys.)

Philip was alive at this time; and Herodias had issue then living by him; so that Herod was guilty of adultery. See Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6. 7. After the Baptist's death she commanded his dead body (πτῶμα, Mark vi. 29; σῶμα, Matt. xiv. 12) to be cast out in contempt without burial (Hieron. c. Rufin. iii. 42. Nicephor. i. 19), which accounts for the fact recorded in connexion with it by the Evangelists. Josephus relates that the army of Herod was destroyed by Aretas, his father-in-law, on account of the outrage committed by Herod Antipas on his daughter, and that the current opinion among the Jews was that this destruction was a retribution on him from heaven for the murder of the Baptist (Ant. xviii. 7).

2. παισίν ["Amicis et familiaribus suis: παῖσιν id. qd. δούλοις, φίλοις, ut 2 Esr. i. 32. 1 Mac. i. 6. Etenim ab Hebræis דַּבְּרִי dicuntur non modo ii, qui proprie servi sunt, sed etiam homines liberi et ingenui, ministri principum, regum, ac virtutis Orientis. Hinc interpretes Græci veteres τῶν modo dicuntur παῖς 1 Sam. xviii. 22. Jos. i. 7. 13, quo posteriori loco Symmachus habet δούλος, modo φίλος, ut Esth. ii. 18."] (Kuin.)

3. ἐδήσει he bound. The aorist, not for plusq. perf. But the writer takes himself and the reader back to a past point in the history, and writes from it; and so the sense is,—Herod, having apprehended John at that time, bound him, &c. Cp. xxvii. 60, and ἀπέστειλεν, John xviii. 24.

John the Baptist, who came in the power and spirit of Elias, rebuked Herod and Herodias, as Elijah did Ahab and Jezebel. (Jerome, Aug. de Cons. Ev. ii. 44.) See on Mark vi. 25.

— Φιλίππου of Philip. "*Herodes Philippus h. l. memoratus, non debet confundi cum Herode Philippo, tetrarcha Iturææ et Trachonitidis, ejus mater fuit Cleopatra, sed notatur h. l. alius Herodis M. filius ignobilis et obscurus, qui, a patre exheredatus, vitam privatus transegit, susceptus e Mariamna, Simonis Pontificis M. filia: vid. 4. ἔλεγε used to say.

5. εἶχον held him as a treasure; so that in killing him Herod robbed them. Cp. xxi. 26. 46.

6. Γενεσίων ἀγομένων When his birthday feast was being kept. Cp. Gen. xl. 20. On this sense of ἀγεῖν see Luke xxiv. 21. Acts xix. 38.

— ἡ θυγάτηρ her daughter, called Salome. Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5. 4.

8. Δός μοι ὧδε ἐπὶ πίνακι Give me here in a charger; a large dish taken from the table at the birthday feast of Herod. See below on Mark vi. 25.

9. διὰ τοὺς ὅρκους on account of his oath. On Herod's Oath, and other rash Oaths, see Bp. Sanderson, Præl. iii. § 16, De Juramenti Obligatione, who compares it with the Oath of Ahasuerus, Esth. v. 3—6; vii. 2, and with the promise of Solomon, 1 Kings ii. 20, "Esto Herodis juramentum nobis exemplum in cautelam; esto illud Salomonis in imitationem, et meminerimus juramentum, sic indefinite prolatum, cum suâ justâ exceptione tantum esse semper intelligendum." See also Sanderson's "Case of a Rash Vow," v. pp. 61—74.

10. καὶ πέμψας Probably at or near Machærus. On the history see Wieseler, p. 244, and above, xi. 2.

12. ἀπήγγειλαν τῷ Ἰησοῦ they came and told Jesus of their Master's death. Observe how the disciples of John had been conciliated by Jesus. They take refuge with Him. They had been convinced by the answer which our Lord had given them, and the calamity which had happened to their Master was to them a providential corrective, and put an end to their rival partizanship for their earthly Master, and sent them as disciples to Christ, their Divine Master, and John's. (Chrys.) See above on xi. 2—14.

13. ἐν πλοίῳ εἰς ἔρημον τόπον κατ' ἰδίαν From a comparison of this passage with Luke ix. 10 and John vi. 1, it appears that our Lord crossed the Lake (ἀπῆλθε πέραν τῆς θαλάσσης, says St. John, vi. 1), and that the place to which he crossed was called Bethsaida. It has been supposed by some that this was the same as the town so called of Peter, Andrew, and Philip, which was near Capernaum on the west side of the Lake; but this is not consistent with the narrative.

It is not surprising that there should be more than one place called Bethsaida (i. e. the place of fishing) near the lake. See note above on xiv. 21. And there was on the northern shore a town called Bethsaida, or Julias. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 2. 1; Bell. Jud. ii. 9.) Hence St. Matthew's expression, ἀνεχώρησεν ἐκείθεν, i. e. he retired from Capernaum and its neighbourhood; and went over the Sea to a more sequestered place. This was in the Spring, a little before the Passover. John vi. 4. Cp. on Luke ix. 10.

— περὶ on foot, i. e. by land. Cp. περὶ θάλασσαν, as distinguished from sailing by sea, Acts xx. 13.

15. Ἐρημός ἐστιν ὁ τόπος] The place is desert. Our Lord's Miracles of feeding the Multitudes were wrought in desert places (cp. xv. 33); partly to make the miracle more evident and impressive, and partly, it is probable, to suggest to them that the same God Who, Himself invisible, had fed their forefathers with miraculous sustenance for forty years in the Wilderness, was now come in human form to visit His people.

20. ἐχορτάσθησαν] they were filled. χορτάζομαι (from χόρτος, grass) had been already used by the LXX for σῶψ, satiatus fuit, Ps. xvii. 14, 15; xxxvii. 19; lix. 15, and passim, especially in reference to satiety from the Divine bounty, e. g. xvii. 15, χορτάσθῃσιν ἐν τῷ ἰδεῖν τὴν δόξαν Σοῦ. Ps. cvii. 9. The word so used seems to suggest that those so fed are the Sheep of God's pasture, and that He vouchsafes to be their Shepherd (Ps. xxiii. 1), and so is very appropriate when applied to those who are fed by Christ, the Good Shepherd (John x. 14).

Christ blesses and breaks, and what is blessed and broken becomes a 'seminarium' of food for the multitude. So the spiritual food of the Word of the Old Testament, when its mysteries are brought forth by Christ and broken for nourishment, feeds the Nations. Observe also, the multitude are fed by Christ through the Ministry of His Apostles. (Jerome.) So now all the nations of the world are fed with the heavenly food of the Word and Sacraments by Christ through an Apostolic Ministry.

The manner of this miraculous act baffles our intelligence. It was not, that five loaves are multiplied into more; but fragments succeed fragments imperceptibly. The substance increases, whether on the table, or in the hands of those who receive it, or in the mouth of those who eat it, I know not. Wonder not that fountains gush forth, or that wine streams from grapes, or that all the riches and plenty of the world flow in an unfailling stream. The Author of the universe displayed Himself by this abundant increase of bread. His invisible Will acts by visible operation, and the Lord of heavenly mysteries executes the miracle of what was present to the eye. The Power of Him who works transcends all nature, and the mode of that Power transcends all intelligence, and we have nothing left but to adore. (Hilary.) — κοφίνους] baskets. Mark the difference between our Lord's miracles and that wrought by Moses. The manna was only sufficient for him who gathered it, and it could not be kept. Theophyl. in Marc. vi. 43.

On the word κοφίνος see below, xvi. 9. It is observable, that this word had been already used by the Septuagint Translators in describing the drudgery of the Israelites in Egypt in gathering clay to make bricks, Ps. lxxxi. 7. The κοφίνος of toil now became a receptacle of heavenly food. As S. Ambrose says, Luke ix. 17, "Populus, qui ante lutum in cophinis colligit, hic jam vitæ cœlestis operatur alimonium: per duodecim cophinos tanquam tributum singularum fidei fundamentum redundat."

21. ὡσεὶ πεντακισχίλιοι] men about five thousand. Our Lord's Miracles were also Prophecies. He had said to His Apostles, "Give ye them to eat" (v. 16), and thus He prefigured the dispensation of the spiritual food of His Word and Sacraments, by the ministry of the Apostles and their successors.

And this miraculous prophecy had a remarkable fulfilment in what is said, Acts iv. 4, "Many of those who heard the word believed, and the number of the men (τῶν ἀνδρῶν) was about five thousand." See Hilary here, and note below on Acts iv. 4.

22. ἕως οὗ] until he should have sent away; so xxvi. 36, until I shall have prayed.

23. ἀνέβη—26. περιπατοῦντα] He went up unto the mountain to pray.

Our Lord went up to a mountain, and there prayed. Thence His Divine eye looks on His disciples toiling in the ship in the dark and stormy night. And in the fourth or last watch of the night He comes walking on the waves of the Sea, and enters the ship, and calms the storm.

This action seems to have had a spiritual and prophetic meaning. Our Blessed Lord has now dispensed the food of life to the world in the Word and Sacraments ministered by His disciples. He has ascended up into heaven alone, to pray for His Church, and thence He looks down upon her tossed on the waves, and He will come again at the fourth watch, treading under foot the storms and billows of this world, and will enter the ship, and bring her to the heavenly haven where she would be.

This is thus expressed by an ancient father of the Western Church:—"Quod ascendit relictis turbis Dominus orare in montem,—relictis turbis solus post Resurrectionem ascendit in cœlum et ibi interpellat pro nobis. Interea navis portans discipulos, id est Ecclesia, fluctuat et quatitur tempestatibus tentationum. Opus est in navi simus; nam si in navi pericula sunt, sine navi certus interitus. Etsi turbatur navis, navis est tamen. Tene te itaque in navi, et roga Deum . . . Quarta vigilia noctis finis est noctis. In fine sæculi venit Dominus: videtur ambulare super omnes tumores maris, hoc est super omnes hujus sæculi principatus . . . sub ejus pedibus totam hujus sæculi rabiem subjectam." See Aug. Sermon. 75 and 76, and cp. below on John vi. 19, 20.

25. Τετάρτῃ φυλακῇ] In the fourth watch. Formerly the Jews had divided the night into three watches. (See Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. voc. תרע"ה.) But when Judæa became a Roman province, they adopted the Roman division into four watches. (Lips. de Milit. Rom. p. 123.) The LXX had already used φυλακῇ in the sense of watch. (Exod. xiv. 24.) "The fourth watch is the last," says Jerome.—Our Lord will come to the aid of His Church, at the end of the world.

He allows His disciples to be tried by dangers, that they may be taught patience; and does not come to them till morning, that they may not expect to be delivered at once, but may hope for deliverance, if they have perseverance and faith. Theophyl. in Mark vi. 25.

Thus Christ deals with His Church, typified by the Apostolic ship. He leaves her to be tossed from time to time by the waves of this world, and to be assailed by the blasts of the Evil One, and He will return to her in the fourth watch of the night. The first watch of the night was the age of the Law; the second, of the Prophets; the third, of the Gospel; the fourth, of His glorious Advent, when He will find her buffeted by the spirit of Antichrist, and by the storms of the world. And by Christ's reception into the ship, and the consequent calm, is prefigured the eternal peace of the Church after His second Coming. Hilary.

26. φάντασμά ἐστι] it is a spirit. On this narrative, in connexion with the solemn question concerning the nature and state of the body after the Resurrection, see v. 29, and Luke xxiv. 31, and John xx. 19.

27. ἐγὼ εἰμι] I AM.—A declaration of Divine power, proved by walking on the sea: cp. John viii. 58.

29. Ἐλθέ] Come. When Christ commands, we may, and must, do, what it would be sin to attempt to do, without such a command (Matt. iv. 7); and so long as we have faith in Him, we shall be able to do what He commands us to do: and therefore our prayer to Him must be, “Da quod jubes, et jube, quod vis.”

— Πέτρος περιεπάτησεν] Peter walked. Peter, while in the body, was enabled by Christ to walk on the sea; so the risen bodies of the Saints will be enabled by Christ to fly upwards, and traverse the liquid fields of the sky, and meet Him in the air. 1 Thess. iv. 17. See on Luke xxiv. 31. John xix. 19.

St. Peter walked on the sea. Let then those who imagine that our Lord had not a true human body, because He walked on the waves, explain how St. Peter also walked on the waves, who certainly had a real body. (Jerome.)

31. Ὀλιγόπιστε] O thou of little faith. It is of no use to be near Christ in person, unless we are near Him by faith. If we are near Him by faith, no storm can drown us. It is not the Tempest, but our own weakness of faith which is to be feared; therefore our Lord does not calm the storm, but takes hold of Peter's hand. And He brought the Apostle to the ship, as a Bird brings its young on its wings to the nest, when it has attempted to fly before its time, and is about to fall on the ground. (Chrys.)

Christ treads the waves of this world, and walks amid its storms. He treads the winepress alone, Isa. lxi. 3. He alone is the Redeemer of the world, and all who are saved are redeemed by Him alone. It is He, and He alone, who enables others to stand and walk on the sea of trouble and of doubt. Peter sinks without Christ. (Cp. Hilary.)

Peter is the image of weak faith, staggered by the storms of this world; but after he had received the gift of the Holy Ghost, he who is here like a fluent wave, became like a steadfast rock, unmoved by the tempest of persecution and the fear of death. (Cp. Aug. Sermon 76.)

36. κρασπέδου τοῦ ἱματίου] The word κρασπέδον had been employed by the LXX to designate the ῥιπιδί (kanephorth), literally wings, of the garment, which were to be made of purple, according to the law (Numb. xv. 38. Deut. xxii. 12), to remind them of the law, especially of the Sabbath. See below, xxiii. 5.

Observe Christ's miraculous power, exerted here and on other occasions (ix. 20) by the skirts of his clothing (Ps. cxxxiii. 2), in connexion with the prophecy (Malachi iv. 2), which speaks of “healing in His wings;” the word “wings” being used by the Hebrews to describe the fringes of the garments.

Consider also its connexion with Zech. viii. 23, “They shall take hold of the skirt (κρασπέδον) of Him that is a Jew,”—a prophecy specially applicable to Faith taking hold of Christ.

CH. XV. 1. οἱ ἀπὸ Ἱερ. Γραμματεῖς] the Scribes that were from Jerusalem. Cp. Heb. xiii. 24, οἱ ἀπὸ Ἱταλίας.

2. παράδοσιν] Partly the ῥῆμα (kabbala), tradition; from ῥῆμα (kibbel), to receive; and called tradition of the elders, because it was pretended by the Pharisees and Rabbis of the Jews that it had been orally delivered by God to Moses on Mount Sina, and thence handed down by oral tradition to their own times; partly the oral precepts which were afterwards embodied in the Talmud (or Doctrine), from root ῥῆμα (lamadh), to teach; which at first consisted of the Mishna (about A.D. 219), i. e. the oral repetition of the Law (from ῥῆμα, shana, to repeat); and to which was afterward added (about A.D. 500) the Gemara, or the complementum, root ῥῆμα (gamar), to finish, of the Mishna. See Buxtorf, Synag. Judaic., cap. iii. p. 59.

— ὅταν ἄρτον ἐσθίωσιν] when they eat bread. ἄρτον ἐσθίειν = Hebr. אכל akal, said of eating food generally. Mark iii. 20. Luke vii. 33; xiv. 15.

3. παράδοσιν ὑμῶν] You pretend that these things have been delivered by God to the elders; but they are in fact your traditions, and are opposed to God's Law.

4. Τίμα] Honour; τιμή (from τίω, pendo, to pay) in Scripture does not mean merely homage and salutation, but succour, support by alms and offerings; thus the Apostle says, “Honour widows that are widows indeed” (1 Tim. v. 3); “and let the presbyters who rule well be counted worthy of double honour” (1 Tim. v. 17), i. e. stipend.

— θανάτῳ τελευτάτω] A Hebraism from Levit. xx. 9, where the LXX has θανάτῳ θανατούσθω, and Exod. xxi. 17, ὁ κακολογῶν πατέρα ἢ μητέρα αὐτοῦ τελευτήσσει θανάτῳ.

5. Δῶρον] A gift. κορβάν (qorban). See xxvii. 6. Mark vii. 11. “It is a gift,”—an offering consecrated to God, and therefore I cannot apply it to your benefit. That, in which thou mightest have been benefited by me, has been vowed and hallowed by me to God as a Gift to Him; and therefore cannot without sacrilege be alienated from Him and applied to thy use. And it will be most profitable to thee also, being so applied as a gift to God.

By suggesting to Children such language as this toward their Parents, the Pharisees taught hypocrisy and undutifulness to Parents, under the mask of piety to God.

There seems to be an apostrophe after ὡφελήσῃς, as if our Lord abstained with horror and indignation from pronouncing the words of blasphemy with which this hypocritical infraction of the divine command was completed.

The apodosis cannot begin with καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ, for the Pharisees were too shrewd to say that; but they are our Lord's words. See next note.

They who inculcated this doctrine, being Priests or connected with them, derived private advantage from it. (See Theophyl., Mark vii. 11.)

— καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ. And, through your tradition, he shall not honour his father,—although God commands, “Honour thy father.” Cp. Mark vii. 11, where the construction is similar.

7—9. [Ἡσαΐας] Isa. xxix. 13. Cp. Mark vii. 6, 7, where the prophecy is cited with the same variation from the LXX as here by St. Matthew, i. e. δ. δ. ε. ε. α. for διδάσκοντες ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων καὶ διδασκαλίας. The original of Isaiah signifies “the reverence with which they regard Me is only a human command,” i. e. their religion is based on human commandment, and not on My Law. They substitute human traditions for divine commands. Our Lord gives the sense of the prophecy; and adds, that such worship is vain. See Surenhus. p. 249. Such explanations and additions coming from Him, Who is the Author of the Law, are to be regarded as already pre-existing in His Mind when He gave the Law, and are involved in it.

8. Ἐγγίξει μοι. On the reading of this passage see Scrivener, and Tregelles on the Printed Text of N. T. p. 139.

9. διδάσκοντες. On this text—“teaching for doctrines the commandments of men”—see Bp. Sanderson's Sermon ad Clerum (Serm. v. vol. ii. pp. 141—168), who shows its application to those who,

Either of their own authority impose Rites and Ceremonies as necessary to salvation; or,

Enforce new articles of faith, as the Church of Rome does, and make them terms of Church Communion; or, Affirm things to be unlawful, which cannot be proved so to be, and on the plea of such alleged unlawfulness, separate from the Church, and rend it by schism.

See also Hooker, I. xiv. 5, and II. viii. 5.

11. κοινοῖ] defiles; κοινὸν, ἀκάθαρτον, Hesych. κοινὸς, common, had been used in the sense of unclean in the books of the Maccabees, 1 Macc. i. 47. 62, in connexion with the war of persecution waged by Antiochus Epiphanes against the Jews, in requiring them to eat swine's flesh, and other unclean meats.

Our Lord did not intend to disparage the difference between clean and unclean meats, as it had been defined in the Levitical Law, which had an intrinsic, moral, and spiritual meaning, now corrupted and obscured by its Teachers, who laid stress only on external acts. But He designed to show that the source of all uncleanness is the heart, and that unless that is cleansed, all outward cleansings are vain.

14. βόθυνον] “foveam, et metaphor. interitum;” a pitfall, more properly than a ditch. See Isa. xxiv. 17, 18, where the LXX has βόθυνος for πῖθ (pachath), a pit, of destruction; a pitfall set by hunters for wild animals, or a well. See xii. 11.

16. Ἀκμὴν] even to this point, ἀκμή; ἔτι, Hesych.: used in this sense by Xenophon and Polybius. (See Kuin.)

21. τὰ μέρη] the borders. See Acts xvi. 12.

22. Χανααῖα] of Canaan, Hebr. כְּנַעַן (kanaan), i. q. mercator, and an appropriate name for those who lived near the coast and led a mercantile life.

St. Mark here (vii. 26) reminds his Gentile readers by the words, ἦν ἡ γυνὴ Ἑλληνὶς Συροφοίνισσα, that Our Blessed Lord had offers of mercy for them, even for those among them who, like the Συροφοίνικες of Tyre and Sidon, had been polluted by idolatry and its associate sins (cp. Ps. xlv. 12; and St. Matthew reminds the Jews by the word Χανααῖα that Christ would receive the descendants of those seven nations of Canaan which had been exterminated by their forefathers at God's command. Cf. Acts xiii. 19.

25. προσεκύνει] she was worshipping Him; even at that very time when He seemed to be repelling her.

^{26.} κυναρίοις] dogs. Not that our Lord regarded them as such, but because they were so called by the Jews, whose language He adopts.

^{27.} Ναὶ, Κύριε· καὶ γὰρ] Yea, Lord, thou sayest true; it is not right to take the children's bread and give it to the dogs. For the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from their master's table. Let me therefore not have bread, but only crumbs; and do not give me even them; but allow me to pick up those crumbs which fall from the table; for this is our lot. A beautiful image of the humility of the Gentiles, hungering and thirsting for the least fragments of the Gospel which dropped from the table of the Jews who despised it. Cp. Ps. lxi. 23. Acts xviii. 28.

^{28.} Ὡ γύναι, μεγάλη σοῦ ἡ πίστις] O woman, great is thy faith. Observe σου put emphatically; great is thy faith, especially as contrasted with the lack of faith in others. She showed humility by not rejecting the title κυνάριον; faith, by calling Christ the Son of David, and by perseverance in her entreaty for help, and by her fervency increased by repulses, though she was a Gentile, and He was sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

When our Lord had taught His disciples concerning the difference of meats, He opened the door of the kingdom of heaven to the Gentiles. But why then did He say to the disciples, "To the way of the Gentiles go ye not?" (Matt. x. 5.) He did not go there to preach, as appears from Mark vii. 24. The woman came to Him, not He to her.

Here is an evidence of divine inspiration acting on the heart of St. Matthew. He, who wrote specially for the Jews, tells his Jewish readers that Christ had mercy, love, and praise for this poor woman, whom he calls—not as the other Evangelists do, a Gentile, but—a Canaanite, i. e. descended from those whom their ancestors were commanded by God to destroy.

Observe, the Evangelist calls her by a name then obsolete, 'Canaanite;' reminding us of those godless Nations of Canaan who had subverted even the laws of Nature; and so by her very name he displays the wonder and proclaims the greatness of her faith. The Canaanites had been ejected from Canaan that they might not pervert the Jews; and now this Canaanite comes forth from her own land to seek Christ, who came to the Jews and was rejected by them. (Cp. Chrys.)

In proportion as the woman's supplication became more intense, so our Lord's remonstrance became more strong. He at first was silent; then He calls the Jews His sheep, and says that He was sent only to them; then He calls them His children, and the Gentiles dogs. And on this rebuke the woman frames her reply; she shows patience and faith, although she might seem to be treated with scorn. Let them be children and me a dog; yet, as such, I am not forbidden to eat of the crumbs which they let fall. Our Lord had foreknown that she would answer thus; and therefore He at first refused, and rebuked her, in order that He might bring out her faith and humility as an example. His silence and reproof were like the silence and reproof of one who is desirous of revealing a hidden treasure to the eye. The Jews boasted themselves the children of Abraham and despised the Gentiles; she calls the Jews her masters and herself a dog; and thus she became a child of God. O woman, great is thy faith!

He delayed the gift, in order that He might utter at once this speech, and place a crown of glory on her head. See the blessed reward of faith and humility and perseverance in prayer. (Chrys.)

This miracle was prophetic. The woman of Canaan in the heathen regions of Tyre and Sidon is typical of the Gentile World coming to Christ, and thankfully accepting the crumbs which fall from the children's table, and therefore welcomed by Christ, while the children of the kingdom are cast out. (Cp. Hilary.)

^{32.} ἤδη ἡμέραι τρεῖς προσμένουσιν] there are now three days to them waiting on Me. See on Mark viii. 2.

^{33.} Πόθεν ἡμῖν ἐν ἐρημίᾳ] An objection has been made to this narrative of the miraculous Feeding of Four Thousand by some (De Wette and Schleiermacher). It is alleged by them, that it is only a repetition or loose tradition of the narrative of the former miraculous Feeding (Matt. xiv. 13). It is said, that the Apostles could not have used such language as they do here, after they had been witnesses of, and even partakers in, the former miracle.

The answer has been given by anticipation to this objection, in the Old Testament (see Ps. lxxviii. 11. 20—32; cvi. 21) recording the incredulity and insensibility of the Israelites in the wilderness—after the mighty works of God in delivering them from Egypt and in the supply of water and food, of which they had been witnesses and partakers. God gave water miraculously twice in the wilderness, and fed the people by two miraculous supplies, manna and quails. So our blessed Lord fed the people in the wilderness miraculously twice. And the parallel extends further; i. e. it is seen not only, in each case, in the goodness of God, but also in the obduracy of man. Even after the Manna, Moses himself doubted concerning the possibility of a supply of flesh. (See Numb. xi. 21—23.) The Apostles in the wilderness of Galilee are as yet children of the literal Israel in the wilderness of Arabia. And even after this second miraculous feeding, to which Our Lord refers (Matt. xvi. 7—10), they are still ὀλιγόπιστοι, and are rebuked as such by Him.

It is strange, that the objectors to St. Matthew's veracity do not appear to have perceived, that, if the Apostle St. Matthew (and the same may be said—'mutatis mutandis'—of Moses) had intended to invent, or to disguise the truth, instead of to relate it honestly and fully, he would have magnified the effects of the first miracle on the minds of the disciples, and he would not have recorded what was not creditable to himself and his brethren—their unbelief. But by showing to us, that after the miracle had been wrought once, and even twice, they were still ἀσύνετοι and ὀλιγόπιστοι, he gives a striking proof—the more striking because a silent one—that he has told the truth, and has exaggerated nothing in his history of the works of Christ.

It is observable also, that in the second Miracle the numbers fed are less than in the former; and this is another evidence of veracity. If the second narrative had been a mere 'loose tradition' of the former, the number would have increased and not diminished.

See another argument for their distinction in xvi. 9, 10.

37. σπυρίδας] See on xvi. 9.

39. Μαγδαλά] St. Mark says (viii. 10), εἰς τὰ ὄρια Δαλμανουθά, a region a little North of Tiberias, on the western coast of the Sea of Galilee, perhaps the birth-place of Mary Magdalene. Jerome, Aug. read Μαγεδάν, which is found in the old Syriac (Cureton), and in B, D, and is received by Tisch. ed. 1856, and has an oriental origin. See the MSS. in Rev. xvi. 16.

CH. XVI. 1. Σαδδουκαῖοι] Sadducees. As far as we know from the Gospels, they attacked Christ Himself only twice (Beng. Cf. xxii. 23); but after the Ascension they were bitter enemies of the doctrine of the Resurrection (Acts iv. 1; v. 17)—a silent evidence of its truth. See note below on Acts iv. 1.

— σημεῖον ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ] a sign from heaven; as much as to say that the Miracles he had wrought were only from earth, and not so great as those wrought by Moses, who gave bread from heaven; and by Elias, who went up into heaven.

2. Ὁψίας γενομένης] Cp. Plin. N. H. xviii. 35. Virg. Georg. i. 425—455.

4. σημεῖον—οὐ δ.] a sign shall not be given to this generation.

But hereafter He will show signs from heaven. He will fold up the heaven as a scroll, and will eclipse the Sun, and the glory of His presence will be like lightning. But the time for these signs is not yet come. (Chrys.)

— Ἰωνᾶ τοῦ προφήτου] of Jonas the prophet. On the sign of Jonas, see above, xii. 39.

6. ζύμης] leaven of the Pharisees. Our Lord commanded His Disciples to observe and do all that the Scribes and Pharisees command while sitting on Moses' seat (Matt. xxiii. 1—3), i. e. while teaching in His name and in accordance with His writings.

But he here teaches them to beware of their ζύμη, or leaven, by which they corrupt the sound doctrine of Moses; i. e. their hypocrisy (Luke xii. 1), by which they deceive others and themselves. Cp. 1 Cor. v. 6—8.

Thus He gives the rule to be observed by the People. If any of the Clergy teach what is false, it is the duty of the people προσέχειν ἀπὸ τῆς ζύμης; but at the same time they must observe and do whatsoever the Ministers of Christ preach in His Name and in accordance with His Word. See above, x. 4, on the choice of Judas, and x. 41.

9, 10. κοφίνους—σπυρίδας] All the four Evangelists use the word κόφινος in connexion with the former miracle (Matt. xiv. 20. Mark vi. 43. Luke ix. 17. John vi. 13); and the two Evangelists (Matt. xv. 37 and Mark viii. 8) use the word σπυρίδες in the latter case. And now, in this question, our Lord preserves the same distinction: which would well have been retained in the English version. Here is another proof of the diversity of the two miracles. See above, xv. 33.

Chrys. asks, on cap. xv., "Whence is it that the fragments in this latter miracle are fewer than in the former, although they who ate were not so many? It is, either because the basket (σπυρίς) in this miracle is larger than in the former (κόφινος), or that by this point of difference they might remember the two several miracles. Wherefore also our Lord then made the number of the κόφινος to be equal to that of the disciples, but now He makes the σπυρίδες to be equal in number to the loaves." See Mark viii. 19.

The κόφινος is used by the Septuagint once for Hebr. דִּדְחָ (dudh), Ps. lxxx. 6, which seems to have been a vessel capable of holding liquids (three χόες or congi), probably a metal or earthenware jar. (Cp. Judges vi. 19.) The Jews were noted for their use of cophini (see Juvenal, iii. 15; vi. 542), which they carried with them for the preservation of clean meats and drinks free from contamination.

And the σπυρίς (Lat. sporta, sportula) appears to have been of juncus or vimen and palm-leaves, and not suited for liquids. It was of sufficient size to hold a man. Acts ix. 25.

The fact that they had with them so many κόφिनος and σπυρίδες (perhaps each of the Apostles had one for his own use) seems to indicate that the places where the miracles were wrought were not very lofty. In fact the words τὸ ὄρος are little more than a negation; i. e. they signify ground raised above τὸ πεδῖον, or plain (see on v. 1); and this is confirmed here by the circumstance that women and children were present as well as men, some probably aged, in great numbers.

12. ζύμης τοῦ ἄρτου] the leaven of bread. On the inferences to be derived from this narrative, see on Luke xxii. 38.

13. Καισαρείας τῆς Φιλίππου] Cæsarea Philippi, a town at the foot of Lebanon, near the springs of Jordan, so called from Philip, Tetrarch of Iturea, who named it Cæsarea (formerly Panacas, Joseph. Ant. xviii. 3. Euseb. vii. 17), in honour of Tiberius Cæsar; and also to distinguish it from the other more celebrated Cæsarea on the sea-coast (formerly Turris Stratonis), and named Cæsarea by Herod the Great, in honour of Augustus. In the great towns of Judæa how much was there now of Rome!

— ἠρώτα] He was questioning His disciples.

— μέ] Me, emphatic.

— τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου] By asking, "Whom say men that I, the Son of Man, am?" He showed how earnestly He desires that men should confess the truth of His Incarnation, thence also proclaiming His Divinity. "No one hath ascended into heaven but the Son of Man, who is in heaven" (John iii. 13). Chrys.

14. Οἱ μὲν Ἰωάννην κ.τ.λ.] Cp. above, xiv. 2. Luke ix. 7—9. John i. 19—21. The people imagine Thee to be one of these persons who are dead, and they imagine that one of these has risen again in Thee; a belief which seems to have proceeded from Deut. xviii. 15. 18. Mal. iv. 5.

It is to be observed that the Jews entertained two false notions concerning the Messiah;

First, that He was to be a temporal Prince and Saviour.

Secondly, that He was to be a man only, and not God. And one of the strongest arguments against the Socinian heresy may be founded on the surprise felt and expressed by the multitude at the announcement of His claim to be God,—a proof that our Lord made that claim; that He professed Himself to be God, and required the people to accept Him as nothing less. Cf. Blunt on the Early Church, p. 117, and below on Acts ii. 36.

16. ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος] the Son of the Living God. Not a man risen from the dead as the people imagine. Thou who art the Son of Man, and so callest Thyself (see v. 13); i. e. who art the Second Adam, art also the Christ, and Thou who art the Christ art also Son of the Living God, or (as St. Luke expresses it, ix. 20) the Christ of God. Cp. John vi. 69.

We must remember, that He who is the Son of God is also the Son of man. The confession of one of these truths without the other affords no hope of salvation. (Hilary.)

17. Σίμων Βὰρ Ἰωνᾶ] This confession, that I, who am Son of Man, am also the Son of God, is as true as that thou, Simon, art the Son of Jona. Βὰρ, the Chaldaic form used by the Prophet Daniel (the Prophet to whom our Lord had alluded in His question; see Dan. vii. 13, and note here on v. 18), for the Hebr. בֶּן (Ben), or Son.

— σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα] flesh and blood; unregenerate Humanity in its weakness, and as distinguished from what is divine and spiritual. John i. 13. Gal. i. 16. Eph. vi. 12.

18. σὺ εἶ Πέτρος, καὶ ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ οἰκοδομήσω μὲ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν] thou art Petros, and on this Petra I will build the Church of Me. It is said by Divines of the Church of Rome, that St. Peter is here described by Christ as the Rock on which He would build the Church; and that a Rock is something permanent, and that the Rock on which the Church is built must be as enduring as the Church itself; and that therefore this promise to St. Peter is also a promise that St. Peter would have successors, and is also a promise to them (see Maldonat, here); and that the successor of St. Peter is the Bishop of Rome; and that the promise here made by Christ to St. Peter is made to the Bishops of Rome in succession even to the end of the world.

On these allegations we may observe, that these words of Christ are recorded by St. Matthew alone. St. Mark and St. Luke stop at the confession of St. Peter, adding only that our Lord enjoined them not to tell any one this thing.

Hence it appears that the aim of our Lord's inquiry was to VOL. I.

elicit a true confession concerning Himself. "Whom do men say that I am? The world is in error on this point. Some call Me John the Baptist, and by other human names; but whom say ye that I am?—ye, My Disciples, in this the third year of My Ministry,—ye who have heard My words and seen My works?"

This was the main design of our Lord's question. The Evangelists St. Mark and St. Luke omit the words in St. Matthew concerning St. Peter (see on St. Mark viii. 29. Luke ix. 18. 20), which they would hardly have done, if the declaration of St. Peter's privileges, and not of our Lord's Person and Office, had been the main scope of the conversation.

Its end and aim is not Peter, but Christ. Here is the clue to the interpretation of our Lord's words to St. Peter, "On this Rock I will build My Church." The Rock is CHRIST.

We are brought to this conclusion by other considerations;—

Our Lord introduces Himself here as "the Son of Man." "Whom say men that I, 'the Son of Man,' am?" This title "Son of Man" is applied to Christ in only one passage of the Old Testament (Dan. vii. 13); and our Lord may here be supposed to allude to that passage, when He asks, "Whom say men that I the Son of Man (Bar-Enosh) am?" And there was something very appropriate in the transition from speaking of Himself as Bar-Enosh, to speak of Peter as Bar-Jona, who had acknowledged Him to be Bar-Elohim as well as Bar-Enosh.

In the book of Daniel the kingdom of the Son of Man is compared to a Stone which becomes a great Rock (Tur, the Chaldaic for Hebr. תָּרַר (Tsur); see Dan. ii. 35), and lasts for ever, and is called the kingdom of the God of heaven. (Dan. ii. 44.)

Here we see a prophetic representation of our Lord's words to St. Peter, On this Rock (i. e. on Myself, the Son of Man, confessed also to be Son of God) I will build my Church, My Kingdom, which is the Kingdom of the Living God, and it shall last for ever: and I will give to thee the keys of that kingdom.

Our Lord speaks of a πέτρα, or Rock. Now this title Rock is one which is reserved in the Old Testament to the ALMIGHTY. The language of Holy Scripture, from beginning to end, is, "Who is a Rock save our God?" (2 Sam. xxii. 32. Ps. xviii. 31.) "God only is my rock." (Ps. lxi. 2, 6, 7.) Cp. Deut. xxxii. 4, 15, 18, 30. 1 Sam. ii. 2. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3, 47; xxiii. 3. Ps. xix. 14; xxviii. 1; xxxi. 2, 3; xlii. 9; lxxi. 3; lxxiii. 26; lxxviii. 35. In the Lord Jehovah is the Rock of Ages. Cp. Isa. xxviii. 16, "a sure foundation;" xxxii. 2; xlv. 8, where the words Rock and God are interchanged: "Is there a God beside me? yea, there is no Rock, I know not any." As far as the word Rock is used in the Old Testament as a foundation to build upon (as it is used by our Lord here), it is used of God, and of Him alone.

The language of the New Testament is similar. He who builds on Christ's words, builds on a Rock (Matt. vii. 24, 25. Luke vi. 48. Cp. 1 Pet. ii. 4, 5). And St. Paul says (1 Cor. iii. 11), "Other foundation can no man lay than that which lieth (κεῖται),"—i. e. not, is laid, as the Apostles are laid on the foundation, but which lieth by its own spontaneous act, as the foundation—JESUS CHRIST; i. e. He who is JESUS as Man, and CHRIST as the Son of the Living God;—which is St. Peter's confession here. And St. Paul again says, "the Rock was Christ." 1 Cor. x. 4, where see note.

The relation of St. Peter and the other Apostles to this One Foundation, Jesus Christ (i. e. Christ confessed to be both God and Man), is distinctly marked in the Holy Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament;

In the Old Testament the Apostles were typified by the Twelve Stones taken from Jordan (see above on x. 2), as also by other emblems (see ibid.) signifying their duodenary character and co-ordinate power, as respects one another.

But there is not a single type in the Old Testament which prefigures a supremacy of one Apostle over the rest, and over the whole Church. All the Old Testament types of the New Testament Church are disturbed by the theory of such a supremacy.

αὐτῆς· ¹⁹ καὶ δώσω σοι τὰς κλεῖς τῆς βασιλείας τῶν οὐρανῶν· καὶ ὃ ἐὰν δήσῃς ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, ἔσται δεδεμένον ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, καὶ ὃ ἐὰν λύσῃς ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, ἔσται λελυμένον ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς.

In the New Testament, the actual relation of the Apostles to the one Foundation Jesus Christ, and to each other, is clearly stated in the following passages;

Christ is the Vine, they all are Branches. (John xv. 1—5.) He is their Master, they are all Brethren. (Matt. xxiii. 8.) He discourages all thought among them that one of them should be greatest. (Matt. xviii. 1. Mark ix. 34. Luke ix. 46; xxii. 24.) Christ promises them Twelve Thrones. (Matt. xix. 28. Luke xxii. 30.) The Church is built on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets (not on one Apostle), Jesus Christ being the Head Corner-stone, on Whom or in Whom (ἐν ᾧ) the whole building fitted together groweth into a holy Temple in the Lord, on Whom ye are built together. (Eph. ii. 20.) There are twelve stars in the crown of the Church militant sojourning on earth (Rev. xii. 1), and Twelve foundation-stones in the wall of the Church glorified in heaven. (Rev. xxi. 14.) And if Peter, who is one of these Twelve Stones, is taken from the other eleven and made to be their foundation, the whole structure is disturbed, and the whole fabric falls. And St. Paul calls himself not a whit behind the very chiefest Apostles (2 Cor. xi. 5; cp. 28), and in nothing (he says) am I behind the very chiefest Apostles. (2 Cor. xii. 11.)

But, it may be asked,—Can ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ be rightly interpreted as equivalent to ἐν ἑαυτῷ, i. e. on Myself?

Certainly it can. We have a reply to this question in the Baptist's words concerning himself: and also in our Lord's own words concerning Himself:

The Baptist says, Matt. iii. 3, οὗτός ἐστιν,—he is there speaking of himself. Our Lord says, Destroy this Temple, τοῦτον τὸν ναόν (John ii. 19); this He said of Himself. Whoso falleth on this stone (Matt. xxi. 44), τοῦτον τὸν λίθον,—this He said of Himself. If any one eats of this bread, τοῦτον τὸν ἄρτον (John vi. 51),—this also He said of Himself (see also v. 58). So in the present sentence,—on this Rock, ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ,—He is speaking of Himself. On the demonstrative pronouns ὅδε, οὗτος, used by a speaker for himself, see Matt. Gr. § 470, 471. Cp. Chemnitz, Harmon. Leyser, cap. 85, for an able exposition of this text, and Schoettgen, p. 143, and particularly Dr. Jackson on the Creed, book iii. ch. viii. vol. ii. p. 249.

Again: the pronoun οὗτος, this, may be used to signify a third person, and, as we have just seen, is used by a speaker to designate himself; but it is doubtful, whether any passage can be cited from the New Testament where it is used to denote a person to whom the person using it speaks. Now our Lord is speaking to Peter. Here, then, we see another evidence that Peter is not this Rock.

What He says is this: "I Myself, now confessed by thee to be both God and Man, am the Rock of the Church. This is the Foundation on which it is built." And because St. Peter had confessed Him as such, He says to St. Peter, "Thou hast confessed Me, and I will now confess thee; thou hast owned Me, I will now own thee. Thou art Peter," i. e. thou art a lively stone, hewn out of, and built upon Me, the living Rock. Thou art a genuine Petros of Me the divine Petra. And whosoever would be a lively stone, a Peter, must imitate thee in this thy true confession of Me the living Rock; for upon this Rock, that is, on Myself, believed and confessed to be both God and Man, I will build My Church. See below on 1 Cor. iii. 11, and 1 Tim. iii. 15, 16, and the clear exposition given by S. Augustine, Serm. lxxvi. vol. v. p. 595. See also Serm. cxlix. and Tract. in Johan. cxviii. cxxiv., "Petra principale nomen est. Ideo Petrus à Petrá; non Petra à Petro; quomodo non à Christiano Christus, sed à Christo Christianus vocatur. Tu es ergo, inquit, Petrus, et super hanc Petram Quam confessus es, super hanc Petram, quam cognovisti, dicens, Tu es Christus Filius Dei vivi, ædificabo Ecclesiam Meam. Id est super Me ipsum, Filium Dei Vivi, ædificabo Ecclesiam Meam. Super Me ædificabo te, non super te." And then S. Augustine proceeds to condemn those who would build the Church on St. Peter. "Volentes homines ædificari super homines, dicebant, Ego sum Pauli, ego autem Apollo, ego vero Cepha (1 Cor. i. 12, 13), ipse est Petrus (i. e. Cephas is Peter), et alii erant qui volebant ædificari super Petrum, sed (i. e. volebant ædificari) super Petram, Ego autem sum Christi. Non in Pauli nec in Petri, sed in nomine Christi baptizati estis, et Petrus ædificatur super Petram, non Petra super Petrum."

How could S. Augustine have written thus, if he had received as an Article of Faith that the Rock of the Church is St. Peter, and that the Bishop of Rome is St. Peter's successor?

And yet this is now called by Romish Divines, e. g. Card.

Bellarmino, Præf. in Libr. de Pontif. "res summa fidei Christianæ."

In contravention of this exposition now given two objections have been made. It is alleged,—

That our Lord did not speak in Greek, but in Aramaic or Syro-Chaldaic, and used the same word Cepha in both members of the sentence; i. e. that He said, Thou art a Cepha, and on this Cepha I will build My Church.

But this cannot be proved; for it is as probable that our Lord said, Thou art Cephas, and upon this Cepha I will build My Church. See Lightfoot, ad loc., and Bp. Beveridge on the 37th Article, vol. ii. p. 396.

And if the name Petros in the New Testament means a Rock, and if our Lord had intended to say that Peter is the Rock of the Church, then the Holy Spirit writing by St. Matthew would have said, σὺ εἶ Πέτρος, καὶ ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ οἰκοδομήσω μὴ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. But by using two different words, viz. Petros and Petra, He shows that Petros is not the Rock of the Church. Cf. Glass. Philol. Sacr. p. 928.

The Holy Spirit has also declared in what sense Simon Bar-Jona was called Cephas. For he records our Lord's saying, when the Apostle was first called (John i. 43), σὺ εἶ Σίμων ὁ υἱὸς Ἰωνᾶ, σὺ κληθήσῃ Κηφᾶς, and there the Holy Spirit adds, ὁ ἐρμηνεύεται Πέτρος, i. e. which word Cephas is to be interpreted a stone.

We may not say that Petros never signifies a Rock in profane authors, but it never has that sense in the LXX or the Greek N. T.; and no one doubts that Petra there and elsewhere signifies a Rock. Petra is a Rock; but, as Maldonat (one of the ablest Roman Catholic Expositors, p. 217) allows, "Πέτρος pro rupe et Atticum et rarum est."

Another objection is, that the Fathers apply the words ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ to St. Peter, and call him the Rock of the Church. But this is not true. No doubt some of the Fathers do this (e. g. Greg. Nazian. p. 591, ὁ μὲν πέτρα καλεῖται καὶ τοὺς θεμελίους τῆς Ἐκκλησίας πιστεύεται). But many of the passages quoted as from the Fathers in this sense are spurious; e. g. all the first three cited here by Maldonat, p. 219. The forged Papal Decretals did much for this Exposition.

Some Fathers say that the πέτρα of the Church is the faith of St. Peter; others, that the πέτρα is Christ, confessed to be God and Man, which is equivalent to, but a more clear assertion of, the other opinion. See the patristic authorities collected by Bp. Andrewes, Tortura Torti, p. 234, and by Bp. Beveridge on the 37th Article, pp. 582—584; and in the Editor's Theophilus Anglicanus, part ii. chapter ix. And on the subject generally, Barrow on the Pope's Supremacy, Works, vi. 98—106. Some of the same Fathers who sometimes call Peter a Rock, vary in opinion on this point. The record which Augustine in the fifth century gives of his own practice is remarkable, viz. that in his earlier expositions he had applied the words to Peter, but in his later ones to Christ. Aug. Retract. i. 21. See Theophil. Anglic. p. 246, ed. 1857. And many of the Fathers place St. Paul on a par with St. Peter. Thus Leo, Bishop of Rome, in the fifth century (Serm. lxxix. p. 165), speaks of these two Apostles as those "quos gratia Christi in tantum apicem inter omnia Ecclesiæ membra provexit, ut eos in corpore cui caput est Christus, quasi geminum construeret lumen oculorum (where some MSS. have 'Petrus et Paulus geminus oculus Ecclesiæ alter alteri æqualis') de quorum meritis nihil diversum, nihil debemus sentire discretum; quia illos et electio pares, et labor similes, et finis fecit æquales."

Thus S. Aug. iii. 2313, "Ipse Caput et Princeps Apostolorum," speaking not of St. Peter, but of St. Paul. Again, he says, x. 256, "(Paulus) tanti Apostolatús meruit principatum." So S. Ambrose, de Spir. Sanct. ii. 13, "Nec Paulus inferior Petro: cum primo quoque facile conferendus, et nulli secundus; nam qui se imparem nescit, facit æqualem." So Petrus Cluniacus (A.D. 1147) contr. Petrob. Bibl. Patr. Colon. xiii. 221, 2, calls St. Paul "Summus post Christum Ecclesiæ Magister:" and thus both St. Peter and St. Paul are called Κορυφαῖοι in the same sentence by Euthym. Zyg. Præf. ad S. Luc. Λουκᾶς Παύλῳ τῷ Κορυφαίῳ συναρμοσθεὶς καὶ συνέκδημος, καθάπερ δὴ καὶ Πέτρον τοῦ Κορυφαίου Μάρκος; and all the Apostles are called Κορυφαῖοι by Theophylact, in S. Luc. x. εὐρήσσομεν τὰς δώδεκα πηγὰς τοὺς κορυφαίους λέγων τοὺς δώδεκα Ἀποστόλους. See also Casaubon, Exerc. Baron. xv. 327, 8, and xvi. 658. S. Jerome says, ii. p. 689, "Ecclesia Catholica super Petram Christum stabili radice fundata est;" iv. 177 (ad Hedibiam), "Ipsi Prophetæ à Petrá, hoc est Christo, cum Apostolis vocabulum acceperunt." And see on Matt. vii. 25. And in his note here, S. Jerome says, Christ gave the name Petrus to Simon, who believed in Christ the Petra. And S. Ambrose says, in Luc. ix. 20, "Petra est Christus: etiam discipulo suo huius vocabuli gratiam non negavit ut ipse sit Petrus, quòd de Petrà habeat soliditatem constantiæ, fidei firmitatem." Augustine's exposition in this sense has been cited already.

There is a remarkable passage in Theodoret, in 1 Cor. iii. 11, p. 182, who says, "Other foundation can no man lay than this (Christ). This foundation was laid by Peter, or rather by our Lord Himself, for when Peter had said (Matt. xvi. 16), 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God, our Lord says, On this Rock I will build My Church. Do not, therefore, call yourselves by the names of men, for the foundation is CHRIST.'" And in England, even in the eighth century, the greatest divine of the Saxon Church, the Venerable Bede, says (in Marc. iii.), "Idem Græcè sive Latine Petrus quod Syriacè Cephas. Et in utràque lingua nomen à Petrà derivatur; haud dubiè quin illà de quâ Paulus ait (1 Cor. x. 4), 'Petra erat Christus.' Nam Simoni qui credebatur in Petram Christum, Petri largitus est nomen; cuius alludens etymologiæ dixit, 'Tu es Petrus, et super hanc Petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam.'" And what is still more remarkable, this exposition has been adopted by the most powerful of all Popes, Gregory VII. Hildebrand, who, as Cardinal Baronius relates (ad ann. 1080, vol. xi. p. 704, and see Matth. Paris ad a. 1077), when he deposed the Emperor Henry IV., sent a crown to Rodolphus, with the inscription, in a hexameter verse, "Petra dedit Petro, Petrus diadema Rodolpho," where the Petra of the Church is distinguished from Peter, and is Christ.

18. οἰκοδομήσω μου τὴν ἐκκλησίαν] 'I will build of Me the Church.' This confirms the exposition given in the foregoing note, and is a protest against all encroachments on the supremacy of Christ. Our Lord does not say οἰκοδομήσω τὴν ἐμὴν ἐκκλησίαν, nor τὴν ἐκκλησίαν μου. But He says Μοῦ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. This peculiar arrangement of the words was probably designed to bring out more clearly His own supremacy, against all other claims. Do not think that the Church I will build is the Church of thee, or of any man. It is not the Church of thee, but of Me. It is not the Church of a human Petrus, but of the Divine Petra: not the Church of Simon Bar-Jona, but it is the Church of Christ Bar-Enosh, and of Christ Bar-Elohim.

The following passages may serve to illustrate the force of the personal pronouns when placed before their substantives:—Matt. ii. 2; vii. 24; viii. 8; xvii. 15; xxiii. 8. Mark v. 30; ix. 24. Luke vi. 47; xii. 18; xv. 30; xvi. 6; xix. 35. John ii. 23; i. 19. 21. 33; iv. 47; ix. 11. 21. 26; xi. 32; xii. 40; xiii. 1. 1 Thess. ii. 16; iii. 10. 13. 2 Thess. ii. 17; iii. 5. 1 Cor. viii. 12. Rom. xiv. 16. Phil. ii. 2; iv. 14. Col. ii. 5; iv. 18. Philen. 5. 1 Tim. iv. 15. 2 Tim. i. 4. Cp. Winer, p. 140.

—ἐκκλησίαν] Church. The word Ἐκκλησία had been used by the LXX for the Hebrew kahal (kahal), connected with Greek καλέω, Latin Calendæ, and Eng. call. Root Hebr. קָלַל (kol), vox. A congregation, e.g. Deut. ix. 10; xviii. 16, and passim, and also for the Hebrew עֲדָה (edah), an Assembly, particularly of Rulers, Ps. lxxxii. 1. In the N. T. it signifies more than an Assembly convened for a special purpose; it denotes a permanent visible Society, as is shown by the present passage, where it first occurs. Cp. Matt. xviii. 17. See Hooker, III. i. 4. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ix. Our Lord here, and in xviii. 17, speaks prophetically of a Society to be founded hereafter by Himself; and the Holy Spirit, in recording His words, uses prophetically the word Ecclesia, by which that Society was to be known in all ages and countries of the world.

—πύλαι ἧδον οὐ κατισχύσουσιν αὐτῆς] the Gates of hell shall not prevail against it. The Gates, i.e. its counsels, power, and terrors. See Job xxxviii. 17. Ps. ix. 13; cvii. 18. Isa. xxxviii. 10. Grinfield, p. 102. There is an alliteration in the words שַׁעַר שִׁיחַ (shaare sheol). The Gates of a city were the places in which councils were summoned to deliberate on stratagems of war (Deut. xxv. 7. Esth. iv. 2. Lam. v. 14), and from which the army issued against the enemy; and therefore the promise of Christ here assures the Church, which is the City built on Himself, that Hell shall not prevail against her, either by secret guile or by open force. As Bengel observes, there is a 'Metaphora Architectonica' throughout, in 'porte, ædificabo, claves.'

That these words contain no promise of Infallibility to St. Peter, is evident from the fact that the Holy Ghost, speaking by St. Paul in Canonical Scripture, says that he erred (Gal. ii. 11—13). And that they do not contain any promise of Infallibility to the Bishop of Rome is clear, among other proofs, from the circumstance that Pope Liberius (as Athanasius relates, Historia Arian. 41, p. 291) lapsed into Arianism, and Honorius was anathematized of old by Roman Pontiffs as an heretic. See Liber Diurnus Rom. Pontif. Routh, Ser. Eccl. Opusc. p. 507. 515, 516, and the recently-discovered Philosophumena of S. Hippolytus, Scholar of S. Irenæus, proving the same thing, pp. 284—292.

19. δώσω] I will give. After My Resurrection. Cp. John xx. 22, and Ascension, Eph. iv. 8.

—τὰς κλεῖς τῆς βασιλείας τ. οὐρ.] the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. In Holy Scripture, keys are badges of power and trust; and are given, as such, to stewards, treasurers, wardens, &c., who have power of excluding and of admitting, of keeping in custody, and also of opening stores and dispensing them. See Isa. xxii. 22. Luke xi. 52. Rev. i. 18; iii. 7; xx. 1.

In a primary and personal sense, St. Peter, in reward for his good confession of the true faith in Christ, received and exercised the power of the keys; after the Ascension he was the first among the Apostles to admit into the Church, by the ministry of the Word and Sacraments, the Jewish converts (Acts ii. 14. 38); and also Cornelius the firstfruits of the Gentiles (Acts x. 34—48). And Peter himself notes the fulfilment of Christ's promise to himself (Acts xv. 7).

In a secondary and general sense the promise is made to the Church, and specially to all who hold and profess the faith of Peter, and are called to the office of dispensing the Word and Sacraments, and of exercising the ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor. v. 18, 19). The following are testimonies from the Fathers to this effect:—

Tertullian, Scorpiac, 10, "Memento claves hic Dominum Petro et per illum Ecclesiæ reliquisse." S. Cyprian, de Unit. Eccles. p. 107, "Apostolis omnibus post resurrectionem suam parem potestatem tribut."—p. 108, "Ecclesia una est, in quâ Episcopatus unus est cuius à singulis in solidum pars tenetur." S. Hieron. c. Jovinian. lib. i. "Dicis, super Petrum fundatur Ecclesia; licet id ipsum in alio loco super omnes Apostolos fiat, et cuncti claves regni celorum accipiant, et super eos ex æquo Ecclesiæ fortitudo solidetur." S. Basil, Const. Monast. 22, πᾶσι τοῖς ἐφεξῆς ποιμένοι καὶ διδασκάλοις παρέχει ἰσὴν ἐξουσίαν καὶ τοῦτο σημεῖον τὸ δεσμεῖν ἅπαντας καὶ λύειν ὥσπερ ἐκεῖνος. S. Ambrose, in Ps. xxxviii. "Quod Petro dicitur, cæteris Apostolis dicitur." S. August. Serm. xli. "Numquid istas claves accepit Petrus, et Paulus non accepit? Petrus accepit, et Joannes et Jacobus non accepit et cæteri Apostoli? Aut non sunt iacob in Ecclesiâ claves ubi peccata quotidie dimittuntur?" Serm. cxcv. "Has claves non homo unus sed unitas accepit Ecclesiæ." See also Serm. cxviii. cxiv. and cxv.

S. Leo, A.D. 450, Serm. iii. p. 53, ed. 1700, "Transivit in alios Apostolos jus potestatis illius et ad omnes Ecclesiæ Principes decreti huius constitutio commearit. Sed non frustra uni commendatur, quod omnibus intimetur." Serm. de Nativ., "Hæc clavium potestas ad omnes etiam Apostolos et Ecclesiæ Præsules est translata. Quod autem sigillatim Petro sit commendata, ideo factum est quòd Petri exemplum omnibus Ecclesiæ Pastoribus fuit propositum."

—ὃ ἐὰν δήσῃς—ὃ ἐὰν λύσῃς] Literally, whatsoever thou shalt have bound on earth, shall have been bound in heaven. So Vulg. cp. below, xviii. 18. The same power was given to the other Apostles, Matt. xviii. 18, John xx. 23, whence it appears that the figure is derived from binding or loosing the chain of those who are imprisoned by sin. (Cp. Luke iv. 18. Rom. vi. 18. 22.) Christ looses from the guilt of original sin by the Ministry of Baptism (Acts ii. 38; xxii. 16. Titus iii. 5), and from the bands of actual sin, on the condition of faith and repentance, by the Ministry of Reconciliation (2 Cor. v. 18, 19), particularly in the Holy Eucharist (Matt. xxvi. 28).

He binds by means of His Ministers when He withholds the means of grace from those who despise them, or are in open and flagrant sin, and separates them from Communion with the Church in Holy Offices. (¹⁷²/_H) 28 Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, εἰσὶ τινες ὧδε ἐστῶτες, οἵτινες οὐ μὴ γέσωσιν θανάτου, ἕως ἂν ἴδωσι τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐρχόμενον ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ αὐτοῦ.

20. Ἦνα μηδεὶν εἴπωσι] that they should tell no man. Because (as St. Peter's words showed, v. 22) the Apostles were not as yet fully schooled in the doctrine of the true nature of Christ's kingdom and office (see Luke xxii. 24. Acts i. 6), and would not be qualified to preach it to others, till the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon them;

Because Christ knew that they would forsake Him in His suffering, and because the Faith of those to whom they might have preached that He was the Christ, would be greatly imperilled by their desertion;

Because He would not exasperate His enemies, but allow them longer time to see and consider the evidence of His works;

Because He was now about to suffer the greatest indignities, which would make belief in His Deity a difficult matter, and would expose those who saw Him suffer, to the danger of sinning against Him as God by greater blasphemy; and because Faith in His Deity would be easier after His glorious Resurrection and Ascension into heaven.

Here therefore is a solemn warning against those who send forth persons to preach the Gospel, without due ministerial preparation and discipline; and against the presumption of those who take on themselves to preach, without adequate training for the sacred and difficult work of the Christian Ministry.

Here also is a lesson to the clergy, to be careful as to the order and method in which they propound the truths of the Gospel to their hearers. Cp. below, Introduction to the 1st Epistle to the Thessalonians.

21. Ἀπὸ τότε] From that time. Observe Christ's method in teaching. They must confess His Messiahship and Divinity. They are to be taught that yet He would suffer the greatest indignities as man. Accordingly, after the Ascension, the Apostles first endeavoured to persuade the world, (1) that He is Christ; (2) that Christ should suffer, die, and rise again. See above on xvi. 14.

— ἀποκτανθῆναι] to be killed. Our Lord does not yet say σταυρωθῆναι, to be crucified. This was to be revealed hereafter (Matt. xx. 19). But He had suggested in it what He had required, and was about to require again from His Disciples, viz. ἀραι τὸν σταυρὸν καθ' ἡμέραν καὶ ἀκολουθεῖν αὐτῷ (Matt. x. 38; xvi. 24. Mark viii. 34. Luke ix. 23; xiv. 27).

He reveals the whole scheme of His sufferings and exaltation, not at once, but by degrees. There is first the twilight, then the dawn, then the day-break, then the full effulgence of the Sun of Righteousness. See below, xx. 19.

— τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ] on the third day. St. Mark has here (viii. 31), μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας. See above, xii. 40.

22. Ὕλεώς σοι] "Propitius sit tibi!" Ἰλεος, Ἰλαος, Ἰδσκόμαι are connected by some Lexicographers with ἰλαρός (see Passow); they seem to have a common root with ἔλεος. Cp. on Rom. iii. 25, ἱλαστήριον, propitiatorium, Mercy-seat.

23. Ὑπαγε ὀπίσω μου σατανᾶ] Get thee behind Me, Satan! Thou who just now wert a lively Stone in My Church, art now doing the work of the Gates of Hell, and even of their Prince himself, by dissuading Me from suffering Death, by which I shall overthrow the Enemy, and give Life to the Church.

— σκάνδαλον] Observe, our blessed Lord here keeps up the metaphor of Πέτρος, or a Stone: thou who wert just now by thy faith in confessing Me, a lively Stone, art now by thy carnal weakness a stumbling Stone. See below, xviii. 6.

24. τὸν σταυρὸν αὐτοῦ] his own cross. He must take up his cross, as I shall take up and carry mine. See below, xx. 19, and cp. Iren. iii. 18, 12, who thence refutes the heresy of the Docetæ.

Our Lord was not content with rebuking Peter; He proceeds to show the benefit of suffering. Thou sayest, be it far from Thee, Lord; but I say unto thee, that thou wouldest destroy thyself, if thou couldest restrain Me from suffering, and if thou art scandalized with My death; and thou canst not be saved, unless thou art prepared to follow Me; thou must not expect a crown of glory, because thou hast confessed Me; this is not enough; thou must take up thy cross, i. e. be content not only to suffer, but to die the most shameful death—to follow Me.

Christ will have a voluntary service from us: He does not compel us to follow Him, but He says, "If any one is willing to follow Me." And then He sets before us the misery of not following Him; and the glorious rewards, far exceeding the sufferings, of following Him. (Cp. Chrys.)

Observe the power of Christ's grace. Peter now would dissuade Christ from suffering; but after His Resurrection, Christ prophesied to Peter that he would follow Him even to the cross, and He gave to Peter power to do so with joy. See John xxi. 18—22.

26. τί γάρ] for what, &c.? The γάρ (for) introduces the reasons for which this loss is great gain, and why the other gain is great loss. Quoted by S. Ignatius ad Rom. c. 6, p. 388.

27. ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου] the Son of Man. He again refers to Dan. vii. 13. See above, v. 18, and xxvi. 64.

28. εἰσὶ τινες—βασιλεία αὐτοῦ] there are some standing here who shall not taste of death until they see the Son of Man coming in His kingdom. This prophecy, like many others, had a progressive and expansive character. It unfolded itself by degrees and at intervals; it has put forth buds and blossoms, but it will not be in its full bloom of Accomplishment till the Great Day. Its first germination was in what immediately follows, viz. the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1—5). Its season of blossoming was in the manifestation of Christ's power and majesty in the punishment of His Enemies by the means of the Roman Armies, Christ's Legions called Cæsar's, at the siege and fall of Jerusalem. Another stage toward fulfilment may be observed in the revelation of Christ's glory to St. John in the Apocalypse. But its full manifestation will be at our Lord's Second Coming in glory, for the Universal Judgment.

This is evident from what He has just said, the Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father, with His Angels, and then shall He reward every man according to his works; and from a comparison of the parallel passages in St. Mark (viii. 38) and St. Luke (ix. 26), where our Lord speaks distinctly of that Second Coming with His Holy Angels in the glory of His Father.

The saying, therefore, in its full power, is to be understood thus: Some who are standing here, viz. remain steadfastly by Me, shall not taste of death (cp. John viii. 52); i. e. shall not feel its bitterness, for I will take away its sting (1 Cor. xv. 55), and will taste death for them (Heb. ii. 9); they will not taste its bitterness until I come again in glory; and they will not taste of that death which alone ought to be called death, viz. 'the second death,' the death of the soul (Rev. xx. 14). Thus they will not taste of death till I come. Much less will they taste of it then. They will have fallen asleep in Me, and they will rest in peace in Paradise as to their souls, till I come again in My kingdom. And then, when I come again in glory, their bodies will be raised from the grave, and be reunited to their souls; and they will enjoy the full consummation of bliss both in body and soul, in My heavenly kingdom for ever.

XVII. ¹ Καὶ μεθ' ἡμέρας ἕξ παραλαμβάνει ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὸν Πέτρον καὶ Ἰάκωβον καὶ Ἰωάννην τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀναφέρει αὐτοὺς εἰς ὄρος ὑψηλὸν κατ' ἰδίαν, ² καὶ μετεμορφώθη ἔμπροσθεν αὐτῶν, καὶ ἔλαμψε τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ὡς ὁ ἥλιος, τὰ δὲ ἱμάτια αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο λευκὰ ὡς τὸ φῶς. ³ Καὶ ἰδοὺ ὤφθησαν αὐτοῖς Μωϋσῆς καὶ Ἡλίας μετ' αὐτοῦ συλλαλοῦντες. ⁴ Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Πέτρος εἶπε τῷ Ἰησοῦ, Κύριε, καλὸν ἐστὶν ἡμᾶς ὧδε εἶναι· εἰ θέλεις, ποιήσωμεν ὧδε τρεῖς σκηνάς, σοὶ μίαν, καὶ Μωϋσῇ μίαν, καὶ μίαν Ἡλίᾳ.

The signification of ἔως ἂν here may be compared to ἔως οὗ in Matt. i. 25, where see note.

So again He says (xviii. 20), He will never be absent from His Disciples, even to the end of the world; much less will He be absent from them after it, for then, both in body and soul, they will be "ever with the Lord" (1 Thess. iv. 17).

"Itaque," says S. Ambrose, on Luke ix. 27, "si volumus mortem non timere, stemus ubi Christus est: vita tua Christus est: ipsa est Vita quæ mori nescit." And Origen here, "They that stand where Jesus stands, are they who have the foundation of their souls resting upon Jesus; and they shall never taste of death. The word until does not fix any time, when that, which was not before, shall be; for he that once sees Christ in His glory, shall by no means taste of death after that Coming." See also on John viii. 51.

CH. XVII. 1. μεθ' ἡμέρας ἕξ] after six days. So Mark ix. 2. St. Luke (ix. 28) says ὥρעי ἡμέραι ὀκτώ, about eight days. This may serve to illustrate the modes of expression by which our Lord's Rest in the grave is described. See above, xii. 39.

The Transfiguration was a type and glimpse and earnest of the future glory of the risen bodies of Christ's members. Some of the Ancient Fathers see a symbolical meaning in the period here specified—"after six days." Seven is the number of perfection and rest; the sabbatical number; after an Hexameron of labour we come to the eternal Sabbath, in which we may hope to be transfigured with Christ. (Cp. Theophyl. in Marc. ix.) Some have also connected with this, the ancient opinion that after six millenary periods, typified by the Hexameron of Creation, the Eternal Sabbath will ensue.

— Πέτρον καὶ Ἰάκωβον καὶ Ἰωάννην] Peter, James, and John, were the chosen witnesses of His glory on the Mountain of Transfiguration; and afterwards also of His Agony in the garden of Gethsemane (xxvi. 37). They who saw His visage "marred more than any" of the sons of men (Isa. lii. 14), had also seen it glorified; and they were taught, that the sufferings of Gethsemane and Calvary were His road to that glorious heavenly splendour, of which the Light at the Transfiguration was only like a gleam. See on v. 2, 3.

"When our Lord was transfigured," says Jerome, "He did not lose His form and aspect, but He appeared to His apostles as He will appear to all at the Day of Judgment."

— ὄρος] A mountain in Galilee; perhaps Tabor. (S. Jerome in Epitaph. Paulæ, and S. Cyril, Cateches. xii.) Some have supposed that this was a fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy, xxxv. 2. Dr. Robinson (Palestine, iii. 221) thinks that the Transfiguration took place on a mountain to the N.E. of the Sea of Galilee. But see above on ch. v. 1.

2. μετεμορφώθη] He was transfigured, in order to give them a glimpse of His future glory. He had been speaking to them of sufferings—His own and theirs. His Passion was at hand, they were about to see it; and He endeavours to confirm their faith in His Messiahship, recently confessed by St. Peter, who was blessed for that confession, and to sustain their courage under those sufferings, by a view of His divine glory, to which those sufferings would lead, and of the glory of the bodies of the Saints in a heavenly state. Thus He prepared them also for suffering.

Having seen in His glory a glimpse of their own, if they remained true to Him, they would be enabled to say, "I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." Rom. viii. 18.

See also note below on Luke ix. 29. Cp. Leo M., Serm. xciv.

3. Μωϋσῆς καὶ Ἡλίας] Moses and Elias, the Representatives of the Law and of the Prophets: to show their union with, and subordination to, JESUS CHRIST and the Gospel; and to show the transcendent excellence of His Glory and that of the Gospel (see on 2 Cor. iii. 11), and that He is the Christ of whom Moses and the Prophets did write. "Moses et Elias," says S. Ambrose on Luke ix. 30, "hoc est Lex et Prophetia cum VERBO." Moses had not been permitted when alive to enter the Land of Promise, but here we see him brought into it, to do homage to the true Joshua.

No man knew where the body of Moses was (Deut. xxxiv. 6). But God here unites it to that of Elias and of Christ. Our bodies may be scattered to the winds, and lost to men; but God knows where they all are; and will bring them all again at the last Day.

Moses was dead, Elias alive; Christ the Life, the Son of the Living God, is the Lord both of dead and living (Rom. xiv. 9).

Thus Moses and Elias may be regarded as representatives of the two constituent parts of Mankind at the Great Day—the Dead and the Quick. The body of Moses who had died was transfigured, so was that of Elias. "We shall not all die, but we shall all be changed." 1 Cor. xv. 51, and 1 Thess. iv. 15—18.

Hence we see that they who on earth have been faithful to Christ, though they be dead, yet live in Him, and retain their personal identity, and will hereafter have the same bodies, as on earth, but glorified. Observe, St. Peter recognizes Jesus, though He was transfigured. As Tertullian says (de Resur. Carnis, 55), "Dominus vestimenta luce mutaverat, sed lineamenta Petro agnoscibilia servaverat." Perhaps also the Holy Spirit thus intimates the doctrine of mutual recognition in a future state of glory. See the excellent remarks of S. Jerome (ad Pammachium, vol. iv. p. 323) against those who denied the Resurrection of the Flesh.

Another purpose of this manifestation was to show that Jesus was not Elias (see Matt. xvi. 14), nor one of the old Prophets, but is superior to them all—and to Moses; and is the Messias, the Son of God.

"Why," asks Chrys., "did He bring hither Moses and Elias?"

First, because men said that He was Elias, or one of the old prophets, He conducts the chief Apostles (τοὺς κορυφαίους) to the Mount that they may see the difference between the Prophets and the Lord of the Prophets. Next, that they might understand that Christ is not, as some imagine, contrary to the Law and the Prophets; and that when He claims to be equal with the Father, He does not contravene them. Next, that they might learn that He has power over life and death; and therefore He brings forth Moses who had died, and Elias who had never seen death. Next, that they might understand the glory of the cross; and that He might quell the fear of Peter, shrinking from the cross, and might elevate the thoughts of the rest. For Moses and Elias spake of His glory¹ which He was about to accomplish at Jerusalem by death. He also brings forward Moses and Elias as examples of suffering for God, and of consequent reward in glory. Chrys.

4. τρεῖς σκηνάς] three tabernacles. σκηνή from שֹׁכֵן (shachan), habitavit, whence Shechinah. St. Peter desired to remain there, and to retain Moses and Elias. He had heard Christ's prophecies concerning suffering, and Moses and Elias conversed with Christ concerning His death (Luke ix. 31). Peter shrunk from that (see Theophyl. on Luke ix. 33); he was entranced, and enraptured with the present glory; he wished to enjoy that. And he puts Moses and Elias on a par with Christ. But, as St. Mark adds (probably from St. Peter's own dictation), he knew not what he said, for they were afraid (Mark ix. 6).

"Thou errest, O Peter," says Jerome, "and knowest not what thou sayest. Speak not of three tabernacles, since there is but one tabernacle, that of the Gospel, in which the Law and the Prophets are enshrined. The Voice from heaven says, 'This is my beloved Son,' they (Moses and Elias) are His servants.'

In order that it might be known that the Voice ('Hear ye Him') referred to Christ, Moses and Elias disappeared as soon as it was uttered, and Christ alone remained to be heard. Observe, the cloud was a bright cloud; not like that from which the Law was given on Sinai. (S. Chrys.) Observe also that Christ remained after the cloud had passed away. After the cloud which hung over the Law and the Prophets has been withdrawn, the Old Testament is illumined by the Gospel. (Cp. S. Jerome.)

⁵. νεφέλη] a bright cloud overshadowed them. If we may so say, Light is God's shade. He is invisible through excess of Light; He dwells in "a privacy of glorious light." St. Peter had spoken of a σκηνή. The Cloud is Christ's σκηνή—His Shechinah. Cp. the history of the Cloud of the divine Presence at the Tabernacle and Temple, Exod. xl. 34. 1 Kings viii. 10; and see Rev. xi. 12; xiv. 14—16.

—Οὗτός—αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε] This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him. Hear Him; not Moses and the Law, nor Elias and the Prophets; but Christ and the Gospel. The voice came from heaven. See 2 Pet. i. 17, 18, where St. Peter refers to the history as well known to the Church.

—ἀγαπητός] My beloved Son. Observe, this Voice was uttered after they had been speaking of His death (Luke ix. 31). An answer from heaven to the objections of some who argue that the doctrine of the Atonement, which represents Christ as suffering the Just for the unjust (1 Pet. iii. 18), is irreconcilable with God's attribute of Love. "God is Love" (1 John iv. 16), and God the Father so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son to redeem it (John iii. 16. 1 John iii. 16; iv. 9). And God the Son loved us, and gave Himself freely for us (John xv. 13. Gal. i. 4; ii. 20. Ephes. v. 2. 25. Rev. i. 5, 6). I lay down My life of Myself. No one taketh it from Me. Therefore doth My Father love Me (John x. 17, 18). He loveth the Son, and hath given all things into His hand (John iii. 35). Cp. on Ephes. i. 6.

⁸. εἰ μὴ τὸν Ἰησοῦν μόνον] Moses and Elias vanish; Christ is left alone. The Law and the Prophets were for a time, but the Gospel remains for ever to the end. "Finis Legis Christus; Lex et Prophetia ex Verbo; quæ autem à Verbo cøperunt, in Verbo desinunt." (Ambrose, in Luc. ix. 36.)

⁹. Μηδενί] To no one. "Ne condiscipulis quidem." (Bengel.)

¹⁰. Ἡλίας δεῖ ἔλθειν πρῶτον] Elias must come first. The reason why the Disciples spoke of Elias, seems to be, they had heard that Elias should come before the Messiah. But they had just seen Elias. Could therefore their Master, who had appeared before Elias, be the Christ, as Peter had owned Him to be?

The Jews and some of the Fathers affirm that Elias will appear again in person before Christ's Second Advent (Mal. iii. 1; iv. 5. Cp. Rosenm. here). Bp. Andrewes says (contra Bellarmin., cap. xi. p. 255) that this opinion was derived from the reading in the LXX in Mal. iv. 5, τὸν Θεσβίτην, the Tishbite, which is not in the original Hebrew; and from the reading in 2 Kings ii. 1 and 11, ὡς εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, which is not a correct translation of the original, but passed from the LXX into the writings of the Greek and Latin Fathers of the Church.

On this point however it seems better to suspend our judgment. See Theophylact and others on Mark ix. Origen and Chrys. in Matt. xvii. Hilary, cap. xx. in St. Matt. Lactant. vii. 16. S. Aug. de Civ. Dei, xx. 29, and in Joh. Tract. iv.: "Quomodo duo adventus, sic duo præcones: hoc erit in secundo adventu Elias, quod in primo Joannes. Tunc Elias per proprietatem Elias erit, nunc per similitudinem Elias erat;" and Gregory, Moral. in Job xi. 9; xiv. 11; xx. 25; and Hom. vii. and xxix. in Evangel. See further on Luke i. 17, and above on Matt. xi. 14.

¹¹. ἀποκαταστήσει] On this word see on Acts i. 6.

¹². ἤδη ἦλθε] already came.

¹⁶. οὐκ ἠδυνήθησαν] they were not able to heal him. Another proof of St. Matthew's honesty. (Beng.) Cp. note above, xv. 33.

But lest the Apostles should imagine that there was no fault in themselves, He also rebukes them; but in private (v. 20).

XVIII. (¹⁷⁸/_{II}) ¹ Ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ προσῆλθον οἱ μαθηταὶ τῷ Ἰησοῦ λέγοντες,

21. Τοῦτο τὸ γένος] This kind of evil spirit goeth not out except by prayer and fasting. It was a deaf and dumb spirit, and παιδιόθεν (Mark ix. 25; ibid. 21). Its terrible power was seen in its effects. (Mark ix. 22. 26.) This was therefore a very awful form of demoniacal possession. There are therefore different kinds and degrees of diabolical agency and energy; but Christ conquers them all, and enables His servants to do so by His grace obtained through prayer and self-mortification, and used with faith in Him.

24. οὐ τελεῖ] does He not pay? Hence it would seem that this payment, though binding on the conscience, was not enforced in the civil courts.

— τὰ δίδραχμα] the didrachma = half a stater, or two denarii; the tribute which the Law imposed on the people of Israel, for the redemption of every soul and body, and was applied to the ministry of those who served in the Temple. (Hilary and Ambrose ad Justum, Epist. vii.) This was paid to the Priests and the Temple. (Theophylact.)

This half-stater was the same as the half of the shekel, ἡμέ, which was due annually from each Jew a little before the Pass-over; whence the time of this miracle may be determined.

This Temple-rate was begun to be demanded by public proclamation on the first day of the month Adar, and was due on the first of Nisan. See Mishna de Siclis, cap. i. col. 7; and Surenhus. p. 260, 261. This tribute was levied for the maintenance of the Temple and its sacred worship, i.e. for incense, wood, red heifer, shewbread, &c. See Exod. xxx. 13; xxxvii. 26. Joseph. Antiq. iii. 8. Bell. Jud. vii. 6. Antiq. xviii. 12; and Winer, Lex. vv. Sekel and Stater. This Temple-rate was afterwards sequestered by the Romans, and under Vespasian was transferred to the capitol at Rome. Joseph. B. J. vii. 6, 6. Cp. Rosenm.

25. οἱ βασιλεῖς τῆς γῆς] the kings of the earth. מלכות (malche erets), as distinguished from God the King of Heaven, Ps. ii. 2. (Rosenm.)

The sense is: If the kings of the earth do not receive tribute from their children, how can I, who am the Son of the King of Heaven, be required to pay tribute to My Father's House? If the children of earthly kings are exempt from tribute, how much more am I? But, in order that we may not be supposed to despise the law, I will pay the tribute. I will pay it, not as due from Me, but in order to avoid offence, and to strengthen and correct the weakness of others. (Theophyl.)

In a spiritual sense, the act of paying tribute, which was not due from Him, was done by Christ in the most signal manner by His death, when “He paid the things which He never took” (Ps. lxi. 5). “Sic persolvit et morte. Non debebat, et persolvebat. Ille nisi indebitum persolveret, nunquam nos à debito liberaret.” (Aug. Serm. 155.)

— τέλη] toll for wares. κῆνσον, capitation-tax, and for land; here a poll-tax.

27. βάλε ἄγκιστρον] cast a hook,—not a net,—in order that the miracle may be more apparent. A wonderful combination of Miraculous and Prophetical power. Not one fish among many caught in a net, but one fish, and that the first, caught by a hook, to bring in its mouth (not belly) the sum, and that the precise sum required for Christ and His Disciple.

— ἀναβάντα] that comes up from the deep to obey Me. Cp. Ps. viii. 8.

— εὐρήσεις στατήρα] thou shalt find a stater. Some Expositors endeavour to explain away this miracle, e.g. Dr. Paulus, who refers στόμα to Peter, and interprets αὐτοῦ ‘on the spot,’ and Leisner. And from this exposition there was only one step (which has been taken by Strauss, ii. p. 184), to treat the whole as a fable.

It has been alleged by other Expositors, that our Lord meant only that St. Peter would catch a fish, and obtain a stater by its sale; and that our Lord must have been without money at the time, or He would not have commanded St. Peter to go to the sea and fish; and that our Lord rebuked St. Peter for rashness in saying that He paid the δίδραχμα; and that it is not said that Peter caught the fish, and found the money in its mouth.

The first of these allegations is refuted by the words of the Evangelist, taken in their plain grammatical sense.

On the second we may say, that our Lord showed His Divinity by reading Peter's thoughts, and by levying tribute on the deep, and by His power and prescience with regard to the fish. And He paid the tribute in this manner, not because He had no money, but rather because, though He had money (John xiii. 29), He would show, by supplying the money, not from the common purse, or from any other ordinary source, but from the sea, that while doing an act of obedience to human authority as man, He is supreme over all as God. And so He makes the example of His obedience more striking, exemplary, and instructive; and teaches another lesson on the great doctrine of the Unity of the Two Natures, Divine and Human, in His One Person.

Doubtless our Lord, Who obeyed the Law for Man, had paid the tribute (which was an annual one) in former years; and St. Peter, knowing this, answered as he did, ναί, yes.

St. Matthew does not say that the Miracle was done. No; he leaves that to be supposed: and is there not something sublime in this silence? He had just been relating the glories of Christ's Transfiguration, and His victory over the Evil Spirit in one of his fiercest forms, and he had recorded our Lord's rebuke to the multitude for want of faith. He may well suppose his reader to be awe-struck by what he himself has seen, and heard, and written of Christ; and he may well deem it needless to say, and he does not suppose that any one will require to be told, that what Christ spake was done. And yet many now demand this, who are called intelligent, candid men! Not so the truly wise. By his reverential silence, St. Matthew shows his own faith, and exercises the faith of his readers, in Christ, Who is the Word, and by Whom all things were made.

The practical bearing of this Divine Act on the question of ‘Church-Rates,’ deserves careful consideration; some remarks on this subject have been offered in the Editor's Occasional Sermons, No. 39.

— δὸς αὐτοῖς] give to them. Although the Temple Service was then administered by His enemies, who (as He had just told His Disciples, ch. xvi. 21) were about to conspire against Him and put Him to death, yet He, who is our Divine Exemplar, paid the annual Tribute to the Temple.

2. παιδίον] a child. Mark ix. 36. Supposed by some to have been Ignatius; but this opinion is refuted by Bp. Pearson (Vind. Ign. xii. p. 527, ed. Churton).

6. σκανδαλίση] cause to stumble, i.e. to sin.—σκάνδαλον is used by the LXX for ψῆλον (mokeshe), a trap, from root שָׁחַל (yakash), and for חֶשֶׁל (michshol), from rad. חָשַׁל (cashal), titubavit; a stumbling-stone; which is the sense of σκάνδαλον here. Cp. xiii. 41. In Church-matters, says Jul. Rom. apud Arianas. (c. Arian. p. 111), οὐ λόγον ἐπίδειξις ἐστίν, ἀλλὰ κανόνες Ἀποστολικοὶ, καὶ σπουδὴ τοῦ μὴ σκανδαλίζειν ἓνα τῶν μικρῶν· συμφέρει γὰρ, and then he quotes this text.

— μικρῶν] little ones. My Disciples; however they may be despised by the world. See x. 42.

— πιστευόντων εἰς ἐμὲ] believing in Me. So πιστεύειν ἐν, and πίστις εἰς, and ἐν. This use of the preposition is derived from that of the Hebrew עַל. Vorst. de Hebr. pp. 668—677. Latin Ecclesiastical writers do not distinguish between Credo in and Credo with a dative (see Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. i.); and the difference made between the two by Aug. (Joh. Tract. 29), “Credimus Paulo, sed non credimus in Paulum,” and Ruffinus (in Expositione Symbol.), “hac præpositionis syllabâ (IN) Creator à creaturis secerit,” is derived from the language of the Greek Test. Cp. Jerome in Epist. ad Philemon. As Vorst. observes, p. 676, “Nunquam in Novo Fœdere phrasis Græca πιστεύειν εἰς τινα de Petro, Paulo, aliisque sanctis usurpatur, sed de Deo tantum,” and it is used often concerning Christ, as here—a proof of His Divinity.

— μύλος ὀνικός] A mill-stone too heavy to be turned by hand (see xxiv. 41), and requiring the power of an ass to turn it. St. Mark (ix. 42) has λίθος μυλίκος.

Consider the aptness of the expression. Man puts a stumbling-stone in his brother's way; but he who does so, had better have a mill-stone about his neck.

On the punishment of καταποντισμός, or drowning in the sea (noyade), see Casaubon, Sueton. Octav. 67.

7. Οὐαὶ—ἀπὸ] ἀπὸ = τῷ (min). See LXX in Exod. ii. 23. (Rosenm.)

If it is necessary that offences must come, why, it may be said, did Our Lord not stretch out His hand to avert them?

He became Man for us, He took the form of a servant and endured the worst sufferings for our sakes. He did all that it became Him to do for our salvation. And therefore He laments for the wicked, who will not be healed by Him; as a Physician bewails a sick man, who will not follow his advice, and be whole. In the latter case, however, there is little use in the commiseration, but here the denunciation of future Woe may excite the sinner, and heal him of his sins. And we are not to imagine that Christ's Prophecy brings the offences. No; the offences foreseen are the cause of the Prophecy. They do not come, because He foretells them; but He foretells them because they will come. Because many would choose to remain incurable, therefore He forewarned us of the fact. But why does He not remove offences or avert them? For whose sake ought He to do so? For the sake of those who are hurt by them? But they who are hurt, are hurt by their own fault; and others are not hurt by them, but win glory by them: as Joseph did, and Job did, and all good men do. Offences are stimulants to the good. They make us watch, and quicken our steps, and walk warily. They try us; they distinguish the evil from the good. Chrys.

If evil does not arise through fault of our own wills, why do men ever reprove their servants or their children? Evils proceed from our own evil will and evil acts. Men inquire what is the origin of evil? but no one who lives well will ask this question. They who lead vicious lives entangle themselves in these perplexing subtleties, which we solve not by words but deeds. For no one sins by necessity. If sins were necessary, our Lord would never have said, Woe to him by whom the offence cometh! Our Lord commiserates those who choose to be sinners. And He proves to them that sins are not necessary, by commanding us to cut off a right hand, if it offends us, or causes us to sin. Chrys.

— ἀνάγκη ἐστὶ] it is necessary. Not absolutely, and per se, but ex hypothesi; i.e. on the supposition and previous foreknowledge of certain conditions, viz. the agency of Satan on man's evil passions. Compare the words in St. Luke xvii. 1, ἀνένδεκτόν ἐστι, and 1 Cor. xi. 19, δεῖ αἰρέσεις εἶναι. This use of the word ἀνάγκη explains the sense of the celebrated and controverted passage of S. Irenæus, iii. 3, “Ad hanc Ecclesiam necesse est omnem convenire Ecclesiam,” i.e. it is certain that every Church does agree with this Church. Cp. the Editor's S. Hippolytus, &c. pp. 196—203, on the sense of ἀνάγκη, which has been much misunderstood. See also on x. 34, and on Luke xii. 49.

8. Εἰ—σκανδαλίζει σε] “Qui sibi a scandalo non cavet, aliis scandala objicit.” (Cp. Beng.)

— καλὸν—ἢ] it is good to enter in halt; and better than, &c. So Fritzsche, Meyer, Winer: but the phrase seems rather to be derived from the Hellenistic use of the LXX, Gen. xxix. 19; xlix. 12, where ἢ is the Hebrew וְ (Arnoldi). It is good, rather, &c.

10. οἱ ἄγγελοι αὐτῶν] their Angels, i.e. the Angels appointed by God to minister to them (Heb. i. 14. Ps. xxxiv. 7; xci. 11); though sent forth to do God's errands, as His ἄγγελοι or messengers upon earth, yet they always enjoy the beatific vision of His countenance in heaven; wherever they are, they carry that blessedness with them. (Gregor., Bernard. ap. Maldon.)

ἄγγελος is used by the LXX for the Hebrew מַלְאָךְ (mal'ak), which also signifies a messenger.

Our Lord here shows the dignity of every Christian, however poor, especially of the weak, who cannot defend themselves when in danger, and teaches us to revere them on account of the Angels who watch over them (Acts xii. 15); and St. Paul applies the same argument à fortiori to Christian Congregations, see 1 Cor. xi. 10. Compare Bp. Bull, Sermon. xii. pp. 289—326, on the “Ministry of Angels towards the Faithful.”

He had before said, that we must sacrifice what is nearest and dearest to us, if it offends us, or causes us to sin; He now tempers that precept with mercy, and teaches us to seek the salvation of the souls of others by means of our own. Great is the worth of the soul, for it has an Angel assigned it by God. (Jerome.)

Our Lord excites us to be zealous for the salvation of others, however poor and despised they may be. He stimulates us to this by His own example. Observe the order of His precepts. By saying that no one can enter the kingdom of heaven, except he become as a little child, He brings down our pride. By telling us that offences must needs come, He excites our vigilance. By pronouncing Woe on him by whom the offence cometh, He teaches every one to take heed not to be a cause of stumbling to others. By commanding us to cut off whatever offends us, or makes us to sin, He makes our salvation easy; and by ordering us not to despise those who may offend us, or any, however humble, He makes us more eager in promoting the salvation of others. And He presents us the example of the Angels, and His own example, and that of His Father, for our imitation, in order to stimulate our zeal. (Chrys.)

11. Ἦλθε γάρ] For the Son of Man came down from heaven to save that which was lost. Such was His love to it, and such was its value in His sight. Therefore do not thou despise it; despise not any one of Christ's disciples, or little ones, however they may be despised as such by the world: but endeavour to promote their spiritual welfare by good example, and by offices of love; for they are dear to Angels, and to God, and to the Son of God, who has come to save them.

12. τὰ ἐνενηκονταεννέα] the ninety and nine. Christ has set thee an example of tender regard for a single soul. He left the ninety and nine (the Angels of whom He had just been speaking) to seek and save the human race, which is but as a single sheep of His fold. See Irenæus, Hilary, Ambrose, and others, cited by à Lapide. The word πορευθεὶς is to be construed with ἐπὶ τὰ ὄρη.

13. χαίρει ἐπ' αὐτῷ μᾶλλον] He rejoices rather upon it. He does not say πλέον, but μᾶλλον; not plus, but magis; not more, but rather; i. e. at the time of the recovery and restoration of the one lost sheep, His joy is rather directed to that particular sheep, than to all the rest. And why? Because that particular sheep is now delivered from that condition of misery, for which He had so much grieved; and because it is restored to the company and condition of the other sheep, who have not strayed, and in whom He joys so much.

Our Lord here speaks κατ' ἄνθρωπον, and by a mode of speech common in Scripture He transfers human feelings to God Himself. Cp. Luke xv. 7.

14. οὐκ ἔστι θέλημα] Not, 'it is not the will;' but He is unwilling that any should perish: πάντας θέλει σῶσθαι, He desires all to be saved. (1 Tim. ii. 4.)

15. Ἐὰν δέ] If thy brother shall have sinned against thee, do not despise him, do not reject him, but seek for reconciliation, seek for his spiritual good. This precept is to be connected with what precedes, concerning the duties of edification of one Christian toward another.

— ἁμαρτήσῃ εἰς] A Hebraism—ἁρῇ followed by ῃ.

16. ἐπὶ στόματος] ὡπῇ (al-pi), at the mouth, or attestation, —as the cause of confirmation. Cp. Deut. xix. 15. 2 Cor. xiii. 1. John viii. 17. Heb. x. 28.

— πᾶν ῥήμα] ῥῆ ῥῆ, every thing that is spoken.

Our Lord had commanded His disciples not to give offence, and to cut off what is most dear—to separate from our nearest friend—if he offends us, i. e. causes us to sin. But lest they should proceed hastily and haughtily in this matter, He prescribes the course which they must pursue in the exercise of discipline. He calls the sinner their brother, and commands them to deal with him privately at first, and if he hearkens to them and confesses his sin, then He does not say, Thou hast inflicted punishment or obtained satisfaction, but thou hast gained thy brother. And the more refractory he may be, the more eager thou must also be as a patient and tender physician for the restoration of his spiritual health. If one remedy fails, try another, and another. Take with thee one or two more, that it may be manifest that thou art ready to do all on thy part that may conduce to amendment and restoration. But if he will not hear them, tell it to the Church—that, through fear of being cast out of the Church by excommunication, and of the binding in heaven, consequent on it, he may be so shamed, and lay aside his malice. Our Lord threatens the sinner with these punishments, in order that he may repent and escape them. Hence He does not cut off the sinner at once from the Church, but establishes a first, a second, and a third tribunal, in order that if he refuse to hear the first, he may hearken to the second or the third, and if he have no reverence for that, he may stand in awe of the future judgment of God. (Chrys.)

17. τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ] to the Church. Our Lord had already prepared His Apostles for the use of this word ἐκκλησία (see above, xvi. 18), to describe the Visible Society of His faithful people. He had informed them who were to bear office publicly in it for the exercise of godly discipline therein (cp. 1 Cor. v. 5. 1 Tim. v. 20) in His Name and for the general good.

On the mode and measure of administering reproof, public and private, see Chrys. here, and Augustine de Correctione, vol. x. p. 1316, and Serm. xiii. and lxxxi. and Epist. 95, and De Civ. Dei, i. 4, and Hooker vi. 4, and Hammond on Fraternal Correction, Works, i. p. 290, ed. 1674.

— ὁ ἐθνικός] Observe δ. Not a heathen man, who may be a good man in his way, but as the heathen in his heathenism. On this use of the article, see John iii. 10; xviii. 10.

18. Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν] Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall have bound on earth, shall have been bound in heaven. Observe the tenses here, δῆσητε and δεδεμένα: cp. above, xvi. 19. From speaking of Church-discipline as a divinely-appointed means of reconciliation and spiritual edification, He proceeds to state its authority and efficacy, and introduces this declaration with the solemn preamble—Verily I say unto you, showing its importance.

Ordering of Priests in the Book of Common Prayer of the United Church of England and Ireland. "Receive the Holy Ghost for the Office and Work of a Priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the Imposition of our Hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained. And be thou a faithful Dispenser of the Word of God, and of His Holy Sacraments; in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." "The Priest gives pardon, not as a King, nor yet as a Messenger, i. e. not by way of authority, nor yet only by declaration; but as a physician gives health, i. e. he gives the remedies which God appoints." Bp. Taylor on Repentance, x. § 4.

"If our confession be serious and hearty, this Absolution is effectual, as if God did pronounce it from heaven: so says the Confession of Saxony, and Bohemia, and the Augsburg Confession (xi. xii. xiii.); and so says *S. "Come to your spiritual physician, not only as to a learned man, experienced in the Scriptures, as one that can speak quieting words to you, but as to one who hath Authority delegated to him from God Himself, to absolve and acquit your sins." Chillingworth, p. 409 (Serm. vii.).

19. Πάλιν λέγω] Again, I say unto you. Having spoken of the efficacy of Church-Censures, and of Absolution, He proceeds to speak of that of Church-Communion in public prayer.

— ἐὰν δύο] if two do His will and ask with faith and charity in Christ's Name, and if what they ask is according to His Will, and expedient for them, it shall be done for them. See John ix. 31. James v. 16. 1 John iii. 22; v. 14.

— συμφωνήσωσιν] A beautiful word, expressive of the holy music and sympphony of hearts and voices in Public Prayer. Compare the eloquent exposition of it by S. Ignatius (ad Ephes. c. 4): τὸ ἀξιονόμαστον ὡμῶν πρεσβυτέριον τοῦ Θεοῦ ἄξιον οὕτως συνήρμωσται τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ ὡς χορδὰι κιθάρα· διὰ τοῦτο ἐν ὁμονοίᾳ ὡμῶν καὶ συμφώνῳ ἀγάπῃ Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς ἕδεται· καὶ οἱ κατ' ἄνδρα δὲ χορδὰς γίνεσθε, ἵνα σύμφωνοι ὄντες ἐν ὁμονοίᾳ χρώμα Θεοῦ λαβόντες ἕδῃτε ἐν φωνῇ μιᾷ διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τῷ Πατρὶ, ἵνα καὶ ὡμῶν αἰκίσθη, καὶ ἐπιγινώσκων δι' ὧν εὖ πράσσετε μέλη ὄντας τοῦ νιοῦ αὐτοῦ, χρήσιμον ὄν ἐστιν ὑμᾶς ἐν ἀμώμῳ ἐνότητι εἶναι, ἵνα καὶ Θεοῦ πάντοτε μετέχητε.

20. συνηγμένοι εἰς τὸ ἐμὸν ὄνομα] gathered together into My Name: not collecting themselves promiscuously in their own name, or according to their own devices, or for their own glory, much less in a spirit of strife and division; but with yearnings of love to Me and of union with Me; in the manner appointed by Me in the unity of My Church, and in obedience to My law, and for the furtherance of My glory. See Hilary and Chrys. here.

Observe the passive participle συνηγμένοι, and the preposition εἰς, and the accusative τὸ ὄνομα (stronger than ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι) containing the idea of love to, and of incorporation into, by the agency of Christ Himself. See on x. 41, and xxviii. 19.

On the meaning of the phrase to "do any thing in Christ's Name," see Dr. Barrow, Sermon xxxiii. vol. ii. pp. 246—249.

— ἐν μέσῳ] in the midst. Observe how our Lord reconciles sinners, not only through fear, but by love. Having declared the evils consequent on strife, He now displays the blessings of unity. By unity we persuade our Father to grant our prayers, and we have Christ in the midst of us. (Chrys.)

22. ἑβδομηκοντάκις ἑπτά] seventy times seven. The number seven in Holy Scripture is used to signify completeness (Luke xxiii. 56; xxiv. 1); and the multiplication of 70×7 here signifies that there is to be no stint or limit to the spirit of forgiveness.

The number ten times seven is used to express the fulness of retribution for Lamech (Gen. iv. 24). And for bringing in of forgiveness of sins into the world there are ten times seven generations from Adam to Christ. Luke iii. 23—38. (Hilary and Aug.)

But here the number is seventy times seven, the number of years from the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem unto Christ, who brought in the forgiveness of sins (Dan. ix. 24).

28. ἑκατὸν δηνάρια] a hundred pence. About a 1,250,000th part of the 10,000 Talents (v. 24).

In order to show the easiness and necessity of forgiveness, our Lord had introduced His own example, whence it appears that even if we forgive our brother seventy times seven, i. e. an indefinite number of times, our clemency is not so much as a drop of water compared with the Ocean of God's goodness to us, without which we must be condemned hereafter. And now observe the difference between men's trespasses against us and our trespasses against God. The former are to the latter as a hundred pence to ten thousand talents. The difference is infinite; as appears from the difference of the persons, as well as from the frequency and greatness of the sin. Consider also the benefits we have received and do receive, public and private, spiritual and temporal, from God. (Chrys.)

— εἰ τι ὀφείλεις] if thou owest any thing. εἰ τι has been rightly restored by recent editors from the best MSS. for δ τι: you owe, therefore pay. The creditor is ashamed to mention the petty hundred pence. Therefore he does not say δ τι, but εἰ τι.

διδασκῆσαν τῷ κυρίῳ αὐτῶν πάντα τὰ γενόμενα. ³² Τότε προσκαλεσάμενος αὐτὸν ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ λέγει αὐτῷ, Δούλε πονηρέ, πᾶσαν τὴν ὀφειλὴν ἐκείνην ἀφήκᾳ σοι ἐπεὶ παρεκάλεσάς με· ³³ οὐκ ἔδει καὶ σέ ἐλεῆσαι τὸν σύνδουλόν σου, ὡς καὶ ἐγὼ σέ ἡλέησα; ³⁴ καὶ ὀργισθεὶς ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ παρέδωκεν αὐτὸν τοῖς βασανισταῖς, ἕως οὗ ἀποδῶ πᾶν τὸ ὀφειλόμενον αὐτῷ. ³⁵ Οὕτω καὶ ὁ Πατήρ μου ὁ ἐπουράνιος ποιήσει ὑμῖν, ἐὰν μὴ ἀφήτε ἕκαστος τῷ ἀδελφῷ αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν καρδιῶν ὑμῶν τὰ παραπτώματα αὐτῶν.

and executed before a magistrate; in order to give time to the husband to consider what he was doing, and to secure evidence to the wife that she had not left her husband of her own accord. See Vitrina, de Synagog. Jud. c. xl. and above, v. 31.

8. πρὸς τὴν σκληροκαρδίαν] with a view to your hardness of heart. πρὸς = Hebr. ὑπὲρ (propter, contra)—i. e. lest you in your cruelty should rid yourselves of your wives by violent means (see on v. 31, 32); lest you should maltreat your wife. "He permitted divorce, in order to avoid homicide." (Jerome.) Therefore the permission to which you appeal is a proof of your own cruelty; that, which you plead as your excuse, is a proof of your hardness of heart, and of your own degradation; and if you were children of God it would not exist.

—ἐπέτρεψεν] permitted; a correction of ἐνετείλατο, commanded.

9. ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ] whosoever shall divorce. See above, on ch. v. 31. Our Lord admits but one cause of divorcing a wife—fornication. And here we must understand, that if a woman leaves her husband on this single cause, for which divorce is allowed, she ought to remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband, either reformed or to be tolerated, rather than marry another man. And the Apostle adds, "Let not the husband put away his wife" (see 1 Cor. vii. 10—15),—intimating briefly in the case of the husband the same course as he had commanded in the case of the wife. S. Aug. (de divers. quest. 83). See also Hermas Pastor, ii. Mand. iv. Tertullian c. Marcion. iv. 34. Concil. Arelat. can. 10. Concil. Eliber. can. 65. Neocæsar. can. 8. Epiph. Hæret. lix. Lactant. Inst. vi. 23. Asterius, Bishop of Amasea, has a homily on this text in Bibl. Patr. Max. v. p. 818; and see also Greg. Nazianz., Orat. 37, p. 650.

Our Lord says, that he who takes to wife a woman that has been divorced by her husband is the cause of her adultery, for he gives her occasion to sin; and if he did not receive her, she might return to her husband. Clemens Alex. Strom. ii. p. 507.

A wife may be put away for fornication (Hilary on Matt. v. 31); but a man who puts away his wife for fornication may not marry another during her life. And it is said by our Lord, that he who marries an adulteress is guilty of adultery. (Jerome.) By a marriage, which never could have taken place if the adulteress had remained faithful to her husband, he who marries an adulteress makes himself one flesh with her, and so is a partner in adultery.

The sentence of our Lord is, that a wife is not to be put away except for fornication, and that she who is put away is not to be married to another. (Jerome, Epist. xxx. pro libris suis adv. Jovin.) We pronounce that man to be an adulterer who puts away his wife for any cause save fornication; but we do not therefore absolve from the taint of this sin ('non hujus peccati labe defendimus') him who having put away his wife for fornication has married another; and no one can deny that he is an adulterer who has married a woman whom her husband has put away for fornication. Augustine de Conj. Adult. i. 9. 12; ii. 16.

—μοιχᾶται] commits adultery. In Matt. v. 32, our Lord says ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοιχᾶσθαι, makes her to commit adultery. The man who divorces his wife and marries another, commits adultery, inasmuch as he unites himself to another woman while he has a wife living: and he makes her commit adultery,—because he exposes her to the danger of doing so, by tempting her to unite herself to another man while she has a husband living,—and so, as far as in him lies, makes her an adulteress. "Apud Deum adulterii crimine tenetur, qui expulsa præbet adulterii occasionem," says Grotius (in Marc. x. 11).

The result of an examination of the passages of Holy Scripture concerning Divorce, and of ancient authorities, is

1. That a man may not divorce his wife, except for fornication.
2. That if he divorces her for this cause, it is not expedient for him to marry again in the lifetime of the partner whom he has divorced; some Latin Fathers say, it is not lawful.

3. That whosoever marrieth a woman that has been divorced committeth adultery.

See above on v. 31, and the Editor's Occasional Sermons, No. 40 and No. 50.

10. ἡ αἰτία] the case. Hebr. דִּבְרָה (dibrah).

11. χωροῦσι] receive and contain. A metaphor derived from the capacity of a vessel, σκεῦος, to which the human body is compared in N. T. 1 Thess. iv. 4. Cp. 1 Pet. iii. 7. All are not capable of holding, i. e. of observing τοῦτον τὸν λόγον, this precept, viz. celibacy; but some are, οἷς δέδοται, and then He gives certain examples. Cf. 1 Cor. vii. 2. 7. 9. 17.

12. εὐνοῦχοι] εὐνόχος, Hebr. סָרִיס (saris), from סָרַס (saras), 'abscidit' (Gesen.); and thence,—because εὐνοῦχοι were often 'cubicularii,'—it signifies a chamberlain, and in such cases is not to be taken in the literal signification.

The word εὐνόχος had been already used by the LXX for chamberlain, εὐνὴν ἔχων, a lord of the bedchamber, a courtier generally, in numberless places of the O. T. See Gen. xxxix. 1, concerning Potiphar, who was married, and yet is called εὐνόχος Φαραώ; and cp. xl. 2. 7, concerning the chief butler and baker. See also 1 Sam. viii. 15. Esth. i. 10. 12. 15. In Gen. xxxvii. 36, and Isa. xxxix. 7, the LXX use σπᾶδων, and so mark the difference of meaning.

Thus it appears, that the phrase εὐνούχισαν ἑαυτοὺς is not to be taken literally, by amputation (heaven forbid!), but by the extirpation of sensual thoughts. They who act upon this literally, give occasion to those who traduce creation, and encourage the heresy of the Manichæans, and fall into the sin of those among the Gentiles who violate themselves. (Chrys., doubtless with reference to the case of Origen.) See Euseb. vi. 8. Epiph. Hæret. lxiv. 3. Cp. note below on Gal. v. 12.

The phrase (εὐν. ἑαυτοὺς) in this verse signifies also those, both men and women, who abstain from married life and its cares, that they may attend with more assiduity on the service of the Marriage Chamber and Court of the Heavenly Bridegroom and King. Cp. Isa. lvi. 3, to which passage probably our Lord alludes; and Greg. Naz. p. 658, who says, τὸ μέχρι τῶν σωματικῶν εὐνούχων στήσαι τὸν λόγον, μικρὸν καὶ ἀνάξιον λόγον.

13. παῖδια] children. He had vindicated the rights of Marriage (Matrimonium, the state of a Mater), and now defends that of its fruit; and so consecrates both.

—ἵνα τὰς χεῖρας ἐπιθῇ αὐτοῖς] that He might put His hands on them. As Jacob did on Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 14. 15). Cf. Isa. xl. 11, a prophecy concerning the Messiah, here fulfilled by our Lord.

14. Ἄφετε τὰ παῖδια] Suffer children to come unto Me. On this text, as an argument for Baptism of Infants, see S. Aug. Serm. 174, quoted below on Mark x. 14. Cp. Luke xviii. 16.

—τῶν τοιούτων] of such. "Si talium, multo magis ipsorum (i. e. infantum)." (Cp. Beng.)

16. εἰς] one, emphatically; for he was a ruler, ἄρχων (Luke xviii. 18).

17. Τί με ἐρωτᾷς περὶ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ;] Why dost thou ask Me concerning the good? This appears to be the true reading, and is received by G^o., Lachm., Tisch., Alf., Tregelles, from B, D, L, and is found in Syriac Cureton, and in Origen, Euseb., Jerome, Aug., and others, for τί με λέγεις ἀγαθόν; Cp. Mark x. 18. Luke xviii. 19. See next note.

— εἰς ἐστὶν ὁ ἀγαθός] This also appears to be the right reading, and is given by B, D, L, and Syr. Cureton, and received by Tisch. 1856, and Tregelles, for οὐδεὶς ἀγαθός, εἰ μὴ εἰς.

The ὁ ἀγαθός is God. Cp. 1 Pet. iii. 13, τίς ὑμᾶς ὁ κακώων ἐν τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ μνηστὴρ γέννησε; St. Matt. gives our Lord's answer to the question, the other two Evangelists to the address of the young man. The sense is, "Why do you ask me concerning the good that you should do in order to have life? There is One Who is good,—the good—God. He is the sole Source of good, and you need not any other Instructor but Him; and you must comply with His Law, and not rely on yourself, but pray for His grace in order to be enabled to do the least good."

This reply is very fitly followed by that in the other Gospels. Since God alone is good, why do you call Me good? or, if you call Me good, why do you not rise higher in your thoughts of Me, and call Me, not Rabbi, but God? "Commodissimè igitur," says Aug. de Cons. Ev. ii. 63, "intelligitur utrumque dictum Quid dicitis Me bonum? et Cur interrogas Me de bono?" (Cp. Aug. de Trin. i. 13.)

Some blame this young man as a hypocrite; but we read in St. Mark that our Lord looked on him and loved him (Mark x. 21). His fault was that he doted on his possessions, which got the mastery over him. Wealth is a powerful tyrant, and blights many virtues. (Chrys.)

But why did our Lord say "none is good?" Because this young man came to Him merely as a man—as a human teacher; He therefore speaks as a man; for he often replies to the thoughts of His hearers. When He says "None is good," He does not deny Himself to be good; heaven forbid! He did not say, "I am not good," but "None is good." No man is good—much less in comparison with God. He thus elevates his thoughts and detaches him from earthly good, and fixes his mind on God, and teaches him what is the essence and source of good, and to ascribe honour to Him. So when He said, "Call no man father on earth" (Matt. xxiii. 9), He was speaking in comparison with God, and teaching us what is the first principle of all things. The young man showed no small eagerness for good; for when others came for temporal blessings, he came to ask concerning eternal life. His mind was like good and fertile ground, but it was overgrown with thorns which choked the seed. (Chrys.)

18. οὐ φονεύσεις] thou shalt not kill. To show him his imperfection He begins with the Second Table of the Law.

Christ sends the proud to the Law, and invites the humble to the Gospel.

21. Εἰ θέλεις τέλειος εἶναι] If you desire to be perfect; as much as to say that as yet he is not so, although he says τί ἔτι ὑστερῶ; τέλειος, for Hebr. טָמִים (tamim), integer, used by LXX of Noah, Gen. vi. 9; of Job, i. 1. Our Lord commands all His Disciples to be τέλειοι, v. 48; and so St. Paul. Cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 20. Col. i. 28. And the command here given was designed to reveal the young man to himself. The young man's stumbling-block was his wealth, his besetting sin was covetousness; and our Lord touches him to the quick by piercing at once that besetting sin, and He thus shows Himself to be something more than 'Good Master,' and to be no other than God, Who trieth the very hearts and reins. And, like a good Physician, He applies the special remedy adapted to this particular case. (Cp. xvi. 24, 25; xviii. 8.) "Præceptum est particulare, ad idiosyncrasmiam hujus animæ accommodatum." (Beng.)

Thus our Lord teaches Christian Ministers to study the particular needs of each member of their flock, and to deal with them accordingly.

The general inference is, that all Christians are so to hold every thing they have, that they may not be sorry but rejoice to surrender it, if Christ requires the surrender, or if it retards or impedes them in following Him. See further on Luke xii. 33.

Pelagius argued from our Lord's words, that no rich man could be saved unless he sold his possessions and gave them to the poor. But this notion was refuted by Aug., Ep. ad Paulinum. (See à Lapide.) And on the salvability of the rich, see Clem. Alex., "Quis dives salvetur?" ii. p. 935; and see below on Acts ii. 44; iv. 32. 1 Tim. vi. 18, and next note.

24. κάμηλον] a camel. To express an ἀδύνατον, or impossibility, the Rabbis used to say, "It is easier for an Elephant to pass through a needle's eye." See Talmud, Berachot. fol. 55. Bavamezia, fol. 38. Vorst. de Hebr. p. 764. The camel and needle are found in the Koran, Sur. 7. 38. Our Lord uses the word Camel as perhaps better known to the hearers and readers of His Gospel, and on account of the form of the Camel; the hump on its back being an apt emblem of worldly wealth as a heavy load and impediment to entrance through the narrow gate—the needle's eye—of everlasting life.

If a rich man cannot enter the kingdom of God, any more than a camel can pass through the eye of a needle, then no rich man could be saved. But Isaiah says (lx. 6) "that the camels of Midian and Ephah shall come with their gifts and offerings to Zion;" and they who before were crooked and bent and distorted, may enter its gates; so those camels, to which the rich are compared here, when they have cast off the heavy loads, and crooked humps of their worldliness, may by the Divine mercy enter the strait gate which leadeth unto life. (Jerome.) It is not a sin to be rich, for how can a man give largely without means? But it is a sin to covet wealth and to dote upon it. (Hilary.)

— διελθεῖν—εἰσελθεῖν] Such appears to be the true reading. The comparison is between passing through one thing (the needle's eye) and entering into another, the kingdom of heaven. Cp. Mark x. 25. Luke xviii. 25.

26. ἀδύνατον] What is impossible with men, acting by their own unassisted strength, is possible to them with the help of Divine grace, for which they ought therefore to pray. (Chrys.)

28. ἐν τῇ παλιγγενεσίᾳ] in the new birth of the saints at the Resurrection,—in the new Jerusalem. (See 2 Pet. iii. 13. Rev. iii. 12; xxi. 2. 5.) This παλιγγενεσία, or Regeneration, is commenced in, and typified by, the Regeneration or new birth in the Church—Visible on earth in the Holy Sacrament of Baptism (Tit. iii. 5). See Aug. de C. D. xxv. 5, and note below on Rom. viii. 22.

With the phrase ἐν τῇ παλιγ. ὅταν, cp. Mark xii. 23, ἐν τῇ ἀναστάσει, ὅταν.

— καθίσεσθε—ἐπὶ δώδεκα θρόνους, κρίνοντες] ye shall sit on twelve thrones judging. Not that the Apostles are not first to be judged by Christ. See Rom. xiv. 10. 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4. 2 Cor. v. 10. 2 Tim. iv. 8. “Ineunte Judicio stabunt (Luke xxi. 36. 2 Cor. v. 10), tum, absoluti considerabunt.” (Beng.) They will be set to judge, i. e. to reign and abide, on seats of glory and dignity in His Kingdom. See Dan. vii. 9, which speaks of Thrones being set, &c. Cf. Rev. iii. 21, and iv. 4. To judge is equivalent to reigning; see Rev. xx. 4. Wisdom iii. 8, κρινούσιν ἔθνη, καὶ κρατήσουσι λαῶν.

We are not to suppose (says Aug. de Civ. Dei, xx. 5) that only twelve persons are to judge with Christ. But by the perfect number twelve is signified the whole number of those who shall judge. Otherwise, as Matthias was elected into the place of Judas, the Apostle Paul, who laboured more abundantly than they all, would have no place to judge. But St. Paul shows that he, with the rest of the saints, is numbered among the Judges, when he says, Know ye not that we shall judge Angels? 1 Cor. vi. 3. Cp. Aug. Serm. 351.

— δώδεκα θρόνους] twelve thrones. He says δώδεκα, although Judas would forfeit his throne. “Loquitur Christus, ut theologi solent, secundum presentem iustitiam, et non tam de personis, quam de personarum statu; quasi dicat Apostolorum officium hoc habere propositum præmium, ut qui eo bene functus fuerit, in Judicio super sedem sessurus sit.” (Maldonat.)

He tells Peter that they should sit on twelve Thrones. He does not promise him One Throne by himself. Let the Bishop of Rome, who claims to be Peter’s Successor, admit all other Bishops to be σύνθρονοι with himself; or else let him fear that he may forfeit his throne by covetousness,—as Judas did.

— δώδεκα φυλὰς τ. Ἰσραὴλ] ye shall judge the twelve tribes; condemning them for not believing what you believe, i. e. the Gospel. (Jerome.) Cp. Matt. xii. 27.

In a secondary sense, the twelve tribes of Israel may also mean the whole Visible Church. (Aug. de Civ. Dei, xx. 5.) See Rev. vii. 4—9, and xxi. 12. By the word παλιγγενεσία, our Lord had drawn off the minds of the Apostles from earthly hopes to spiritual joys; and He now speaks of the heavenly Jerusalem, the Israel of God, in which the Apostles will reign in glory; and therefore their names are said to be written on the foundation stones of the heavenly City (Rev. xxi. 14).

See further on Luke xxii. 30, and 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3.

29. τὰς] every one, even the poorest of the poor.

— οἰκίας] Some Editors transpose οἰκίας after ἀγροῦς, but against the majority of MSS. and the structure of the sentence, which is one of ascent first, and then of descent.

— γυναῖκα] wife. Some expunge γυναῖκα, as if a wife was never to be left; against the balance of MSS. and the tenor of the sentence; which is, that all must be left if Christ so requires—a condition implied in ἔνεκεν τοῦ ὀνόματος μου. And see Mark x. 29. Luke xiv. 26; xviii. 29, and therefore γυναῖκα has peculiar force.

— ἑκατονταπλασίονα] a hundredfold. For all Christians are brothers and sisters in Christ.

30. πρῶτοι] first; not οἱ πρῶτοι, “the first,” here, as it is in xx. 16. See note there.

CH. XX. 1. ἀμπελῶνα] vineyard. The Visible Church of God had been already compared to an ἀμπελῶν κῆρ (kerem), in the Old Test. Isa. v. 1—7. Cant. viii. 12.

2. Συμφωνήσας—ἐκ δηναρίου τὴν ἡμέραν] Having agreed for a denarius a day. The Lord is described as agreeing with those only who were hired first, for a specific sum, a denarius, or drachma, by the day, the usual rate of wages for a day’s labour. See Tobit v. 14. Rev. vi. 6. Tacit. Ann. i. 17. Akermann, p. 8.

To the others he promises to give whatever may be right (v. 4), and they enter his service in a trustful spirit, on these terms.

The first called, the Jews, were under the covenant of Works; all others, after the coming of Christ, are under the covenant of Grace.

3. Καὶ ἐξελθὼν] and having gone forth. Almighty God has been ever going forth to call men into His Vineyard, that of the Visible Church. On this Parable, 1—16, see Chrys. v. 708. Orat. 101. Greg. M. Homil. i. 19, p. 1510.

In expounding this Parable, S. Chrysostom introduces a remark of general use for the interpretation of Parables. “We must remember that the discourse is a Parable, and we must not be too curious in pressing every particular in it literally, but must consider the general scope of the whole, and comprehend this in our grasp, and not be over-scrupulous with the rest.” A similar remark is made by S. Cyril (on Luke xvi. 1—9), who says that “our Lord’s Parables teach us figuratively much for our edification, provided we interpret their meaning in a summary way; and do not search into all the parts of the Parable in a subtle and inquisitive manner. All the details of the Parable are not serviceable for the explanation of what is meant, but are to be taken together to form a picture of some great matter which sets forth a lesson for the profit of the hearers.” These remarks are specially applicable to the interpretation of the present Parable. We must consider its general scope, and not lay too much stress on its subordinate accessories.

The scope of the Parable is as follows:—

St. Peter had heard our Lord’s answer to the young man, “Sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor, and follow Me, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven” (xix. 21. Mark x. 21. Luke xviii. 22); and St. Peter hence inferred that he himself and his brother Apostles, who had done what Christ commanded the young man to do, i. e. had left all and followed Christ, would have large wages for their work: and he asks, What shall we have therefore? (xix. 27.)

Our Lord tells him in v. 28, and adds, that not only they, but every one who makes sacrifices of worldly advantages for His sake, will have an abundant reward hereafter (v. 29. Mark x. 29—31. Luke xviii. 29, 30).

And yet He warns him that at the Last Day, many who are now first shall be last, and many who are last be first.

For (He adds) the Visible Church on earth is like a Vineyard. And then He recites the Parable (xx. 1—16); at the close of which He says that the first shall be last, and the last first. Observe there the article οἱ with πρῶτοι and with ἔσχατοι, showing that the words refer to two particular classes—i. e. the Jews and

ἐν τῇ ἀγορᾷ ἀργούσ· ⁴ καὶ κείνοις εἶπεν, Ὑπάγετε καὶ ὑμεῖς εἰς τὸν ἀμπελῶνα, καὶ ὁ ἐὰν ᾖ δίκαιον, δώσω ὑμῖν ⁵ οἱ δὲ ἀπηλλθον. Πάλιν ἐξελθὼν περὶ ἕκτην καὶ ἐνάτην ὥραν ἐποίησεν ὡσαύτως. ⁶ Περὶ δὲ τὴν ἑνδεκάτην ὥραν ἐξελθὼν εὗρεν ἄλλους ἐστῶτας ἀργούσ, καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς, Τί ὧδε ἐστήκατε ὅλην τὴν ἡμέραν

the Gentiles—a special case, illustrating the general proposition in xix. 30; and He adds, “for many are called, but few are chosen.”

The one Denarius, given to all, cannot mean eternal Salvation; for eternal life is never represented in Scripture as wages due for work; but as the free gift (χάρις) of God in Christ; and the last, who receive a denarius and murmur, are not represented as saved. There will be no murmuring in heaven (v. 11). The very fact of having a murmuring spirit is itself a punishment. Envy disqualifies for heaven,

“Invidius alterius macrescit rebus opimis,
Invidiâ Siculi non invenere tyranni
Majus tormentum.”

It is an inward hell. And so the Jews, and all who murmur against God, and envy others, are lost, self-degraded, self-condemned, self-exiled from heaven; and they are condemned by the Almighty Judge, Who says, take thine own (τὸ σὸν)—thine own due—and go thy way (v. 14), depart from Me.

The one Denarius, given to all, represents, that as to works, all that any can claim as a right is an earthly coin, a miserable denarius, the wages of a day-labourer on earth. And the award of this one sum to all is a proof of the equal impotency of all human works, to merit heaven as wages due.

But we ought not to lay too much stress on the Denarius, or penny, or to speculate too inquisitively upon its meaning. It is only one of the accessories of the Parable. Here the cautions above cited of S. Chrysostom and S. Cyril are applicable. We ought to fix our eyes on the main scope of the Parable, and not to pry curiously into its minor accidents and details.

The design of the Parable is to teach, that the Vineyard of the Visible Church on earth is the Lord's; that it is He Who calls labourers into it; that He made a special covenant—that of works—with some, viz. the Jews whom He called first, on special terms; that He did not specify these terms to others whom He afterwards called, and is ever calling in succession into the same Vineyard; but that He tells them that He will give them whatever is right. Observe, that the remuneration for work—for all must work—is represented now as a gift.

In the evening, the labourers are called to receive their hire. They who have laboured for one hour only are first paid, and receive the sum which was promised as wages to the first. They are put into the same condition of reward as had been assured to the first for the performance of the whole day's work.

They who had been first hired receive the same sum; they are disappointed, and murmur against the householder, and utter invidious words against their fellow-labourers who had been called last. “These last worked one hour and Thou madest them equal to us who bore the burden and heat of the day.” But the Householder answered and said to one of them, “Friend, I wrong thee not; didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Take thine own and go thy way. Is it not lawful for Me to do what I will with Mine own? Is thine eye evil because I am good?”

Thus it is clearly stated, that, in the kingdom of heaven, salvation is offered to all on equal terms. It is My will (θέλω) to give to this last even as unto thee. May I not do what I will (θέλω) with Mine own? I am debtor to no man; I am responsible to no man. The Vineyard is Mine. The call is from Me. All the power to work is from Me; all the power to bear the burden and heat of the day is from Me. In envying others, to whom I am good, thou showest an evil eye. Thou makest My goodness to be an occasion of thy malice and wickedness, both toward Me and toward thine own comrades in the Vineyard.

The discontented, envious, and ungrateful spirit of the Jews, murmuring against Almighty God, the sole Proprietor of all, and the great Judge of all, Who had shown His special favour to the Jews by calling them first, and Whose goodness was manifested in placing the whole Gentile world in Christ on the same footing as the Jews, and ought to have been magnified by the Jews (as it was by the Angels) in a spirit of dutiful love and reverence to their heavenly Father, and of filial acquiescence, thankfulness, and joy, in all His dispensations, and of affectionate exultation for the recovery and salvation of their lost brethren of the Gentile World, is made awfully striking in the Parable, by being represented as inveterate and incurable; and as giving vent to its sullen, undutiful, and cruel temper, in malignant and impious words at the Last Day, even before the Judgment-seat of God. Their doom is pronounced by Christ. “So” (that is, in this way, and on this account, and not by any fault of the Householder), “So, the last shall be first, and the first shall be last; for many are called, but few are chosen.”

Those of the Jews who continue to cherish this evil temper even to the end, even to the hour of final reckoning, will forfeit their place in God's favour, and will be reduced to the lowest degree of degradation. They will thus reduce themselves from the first place to the last; they who were God's chosen people, and were first called by Him, will be the cause of their own rejection by God. And, on the other hand, they against whom they harbour envy and malice unto the end will be raised by Him to the first place forfeited by the Jews.

This is the primary scope of the Parable.

It is introduced naturally as a salutary warning to St. Peter, who had asked Christ, “What shall we have therefore?” That is, What shall we receive, who have forsaken all to follow Thee? (See xix. 27.) What will be the reward given to us for our self-sacrifice, and for our self-devotion to Thee, and for our labours and sufferings in Thy service?

This question betrayed an erroneous notion concerning future reward. It indicated a belief that it is due as wages to human work. It was the language of one who would make a bargain with the Householder for working in His Vineyard. “What shall we have therefore?” It was a falling back from the Christian doctrine of Justification by Faith in Christ, represented by the trustful spirit of those labourers who went into the Vineyard on an assurance from the Householder that they would receive what was right (v. 4, 7), and it was a recurrence to the Jewish notions of establishing their own righteousness (Rom. x. 3), and of claiming the joy of heaven, not as a free gift of grace, but as a debt due to their own works. (See Rom. iv. 4, 5; xi. 5, 6.)

Peter was first of the Apostles (Matt. x. 2). The words of Christ were therefore very applicable to him. Thou hast done well in following Me. Great will be thy reward, if thou followest Me aright, i. e. for My Name's sake (xix. 29), not for the sake of thyself; then great will be thy reward. But (δε) take heed. Many that are first shall be last; and many that are last shall be first. For the kingdom of heaven is like to a condition of things, in which this truth will be exemplified at the great Day of Reckoning in a signal manner; then the first will be last, and the last will be first. Therefore, Peter, take heed; thou art now first among the Apostles; but if thou hast this spirit, which appears in thy question, thou wilt forfeit all thy prerogatives, and be last in the kingdom of heaven.

In this warning of Christ to St. Peter, we may recognize a divine preparation for the heavenly Vision which was afterwards vouchsafed to that Apostle at Cæsarea (Acts x. 10—16; xi. 1—17), and to his own comment upon it at Jerusalem. If then God gave an equal gift to them (the Gentiles) as to us, who was I that I should be able to resist God? Then they who heard this held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then to the Gentiles also has God given repentance unto life (Acts xi. 18).

Thus the Parable was prophetic of an important fact in the history of the Church; viz. that those who were the first called (viz. the Jews), would be the last; and that the last called (viz. the Gentiles), would be the first.

It also contains a solemn warning, especially against all self-righteousness,—“Many are called, but few are chosen.”

Thus also our Lord prepares His disciples for what He is about to reveal to them more fully, viz. that their Master Himself would suffer much from the Jews (see xx. 18). He cheers them by what He has just said, and exhorts them not to be staggered, and cast down, though they themselves, who had left all to follow Him, should suffer, as He was about to suffer. For in due time, they who suffered with Him should be rewarded, and all His enemies, who might now seem triumphant for a time, be punished; and so the first be last, and the last first.

This is the main scope of the Parable.

Subordinately, it may be applied to represent God's gracious dealings with each individual soul, in the successive stages of human life (see Greg. Hom. in Evang. 19).

—τρίτην ὥραν] the third hour, nine o'clock. On the division of the Roman day, see Marshall, iv. 8. They had gone to the ἀγορὰ, and waited there, in order to be hired.

4. δώσω] I will give: of free grace. Observe the contrast between this offer to the Gentiles as contrasted with the covenant for wages with the first called—the Jews.

7. Λέγουσιν αὐτῷ, Ὅτι οὐδεὶς] They say to him, because no one hired us. Therefore, they would have gone into the Vineyard with the first, if they had been hired. God not only knows how men act, but how they would have acted, under circumstances which do not occur.

The readiness with which many of the Gentiles embraced the Gospel, when it was offered, is a very favourable circumstance for the case of those to whom it was not offered. The case of Cornelius (Acts x.) shows what the great men, e. g. the soldiers of the Cornelia gens, the Scipios, &c. would have done, if the Gospel had been offered them. May we not say the same of Cicero, Virgil, Horace, and many others? From what they said and wrote, and from what others whom they resembled, did, may we not charitably believe that they would have been Christians, if the Gospel had been made known to them? And God not only knows what every one says, writes, and does, but He also knows what every one would have said, written, and done, under every possible contingency, and He judges accordingly. Hence may we not therefore hope, that Christ's merits may extend to them?

10. πλείονα] Tischendorf and others read not πλείον, but πλείονα, which has the best authority, and is more suitable than πλείον, as signifying an indefinite expectation of more, without any right to, or even anticipation of, any one particular greater sum.

11. ἐγόγγυζον] they were murmuring. A word already used by the LXX for Hebr. רָגַז (raghan), to murmur from discontent and in rebellion. Ps. cvi. 25. Isa. xxix. 24. γογγύζω is from the Ionic dialect, as σκορπίζω. See Lobeck, Phryn. p. 358. Winer, p. 21.

"They that were called of old," says Jerome, i. e. the Jews, "envy the Gentiles, and are grieved at the grace of the Gospel;" as if the prize was impaired by its being imparted to others.

This incident in the Parable is prophetic of the jealous spirit of the Jews toward the Gentiles. See Acts xiii. 45, 46, and particularly 1 Thess. ii. 16, "forbidding us to preach to the Gentiles, that they might be saved."

The first-hired labourers boast of their own works, "We have borne the burden and heat of the day." Compare the language of the elder brother in the Parable, Luke xv. 29. And so the Jews, going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God (Rom. x. 3), and have not attained to the law of righteousness (Rom. ix.

31); but the Gentiles, who have trusted in God, have attained to the righteousness of faith (ix. 30). And so the first are last, and the last first; and many are called, but few chosen.

15. ὀφθαλμός—πονηρός] evil eye. βάσκανος, invidus, see Deut. xxviii. 54. Prov. xxiii. 6. The Jews had an evil eye, being grieved at the call of the Gentiles to salvation. Therefore the Jews are rejected, as the Parable declares, The first shall be last, and the last first. The Jews, from being the head, are become the tail; and we Gentiles, from being the tail, are the head. Deut. xxviii. 13. 44. (Jerome.)

16. οἱ ἔσχατοι] the last, they who were the last, viz. the Gentiles, shall be the first; and they who were the first, the Jews, shall be the last. See on v. 11, and on v. 15.

— πολλοὶ γάρ] for many are called, but few are chosen. All the Jews in all the world are called by Me, and by My Apostles: but out of that vast multitude there is only a small remnant, the election of grace, which will receive the Gospel. See below, Rom. xi. 7, 28, and the Introduction to that Epistle, p. 193.

This saying is also applied to the world generally, below, xxii. 14.

17. παρέλαβε] He took them aside.

19. σταυρῶσαι] to crucify. Our Lord reveals the future by degrees, as His Apostles were able to bear it; i. e. in proportion as they were more and more schooled by His miracles in the doctrine of His Divinity, and in proportion as He drew nearer to His Passion.

He had before told them that the Son of Man should be killed (xvi. 21, where see note), and He had said that His Disciples must take up the cross and follow Him (x. 38; xvi. 24); and thus He had prepared them gradually for the revelation which He now makes to them at almost the close of His Ministry, that He Himself should be delivered to the Gentiles (Romans) to be mocked and scourged and crucified. How natural is all this! Here is one of the many silent proofs of the Truth of the Gospel History, as well as of the long-suffering, wisdom, and tenderness of Christ.

20. ἡ μήτηρ] the mother. For their father, Zebedee (as appears from Mark i. 20), had been left with the hired servants.

— προσκυνούσα] The request is attributed by St. Mark (x. 35) to the two Disciples; and St. Matthew implies that they took part in the request (vv. 22, 23).

21. ἐκ δεξιῶν] See 2 Sam. xvi. 6. 1 Kings ii. 19; xxii. 19. 2 Chron. xviii. 18.

εἶπεν, Οὐκ οἶδατε τί αἰτεῖσθε. Δύνασθε πιεῖν τὸ ποτήριον ὃ ἐγὼ μέλλω πίνειν, καὶ τὸ βάπτισμα, ὃ ἐγὼ βαπτίζομαι, βαπτισθῆναι; λέγουσιν αὐτῷ, Δυνάμεθα.

22. ποτήριον] cup. See xxvi. 39. 42. John xviii. 11. Rev. xiv. 10, used by the LXX for σῖα (cos), a cup of suffering or wrath (Ps. lxxv. 8).

— βάπτισμα] baptism. Luke xii. 50. The Cup is the bitter water to be drunk; the Baptism is the Red Sea of His own Blood to be passed through. Cf. 1 Cor. x. 2; see Luke xii. 50.

The prophecy was fulfilled in the case of James, Acts xii. 2; in that of John, Rev. i. 9. Cp. Bede in Caten. Aur. here. On the genuineness of this clause in this place see Scrivener, and cp. Tregelles, p. 140.

23. Τὸ μὲν ποτήριόν μου πίεσθε] Ye shall drink of My cup. How beautifully this harmonizes with His own language afterwards in His Agony, xxvi. 39—42!

The one, St. James, was the first of the Apostles to drink the cup of suffering; the other, St. John, who survived the rest, drank the largest and deepest draught of it.

Our Lord here describes the two kinds of Christian Martyrdom; and all Christians must be prepared for one or the other of them. Every one must be a James or a John. Cp. S. Greg. in Luc. xxi. 9: "Si virtutem patientiæ servare contendimus, et in pace Ecclesiæ vivimus, martyrii palmam tenemus. Duo quippe sunt martyrii genera, unum in mente, aliud in mente simul et actione. Itaque esse martyres possumus, etiamsi nullo percutientium ferro trucidemur. Mori quippe à persequente, martyrium in aperto opere est; ferre verò contumelias, odientem diligere, martyrium est in occultâ cogitatione. Nam quia duo sunt martyrii genera, unum in occulto opere, aliud in publico testatur Veritas, quæ Zebedæi filios requirit, dicens: Potestis bibere calicem, quem ego bibiturus sum? Cui cùm protinus responderent (Matt. xx. 22), Possumus, illico Dominus respondet, dicens: Calicem quidem meum bibetis. Quid enim per calicem, nisi dolore passionis accipimus? De quo aliàs dicit: Pater, si fieri potest, transeat à me calix iste (ib. xxvi. 39. Marc. xiv. 36). Et Zebedæi filii, id est Jacobus et Johannes, non uterque per martyrium occubuit, et tamen quòd uterque calicem biberet, audivit. Johannes namque nequaquam per martyrium vitam finivit, sed tamen martyr extitit; quia passionem, quam non suscepit in corpore, servavit in mente. Et nos ergo hoc exemplo sine ferro esse possumus martyres, si patientiam veraciter in animo custodimus."

— οὐκ ἔστιν ἐμὸν δοῦναι ἀλλ'—] it is not mine to give, except to those for whom it has been prepared. There is a double emphasis here; first on δοῦναι, to give, and next on ἡτοίμασαι. It is not Mine to give to any as a mere boon or favour, to be gained by solicitation; but it will be assigned to those for whom it has been prepared, according to certain laws prescribed by God. Cp. Basil. Seleuc. Orat. xxiv. p. 134, who says καμάτων ἄθλον ὁ θρόνος, οὐ φιλοτιμίας χάρισμα· ἐκ κατορθωμάτων, οὐκ ἐξ αἰτήσεως ἢ δόξου. For there is no respect of persons with God, but he who is most worthy, not in person, but in practice, will receive it from Him. (Jerome.)

Besides, it is to be observed, that ἀλλά means except here. Cp. this use of ἀλλά xix. 11. It is for me to give to them and them only. We are not to imagine that Christ will not be the giver of future rewards, even the highest, for St. Paul says, "there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day" (2 Tim. iv. 8). And that no one will have a higher place than St. Paul, is, I suppose, manifest to all. (Chrys.)

But the eternal reward will not be given to any except to those for whom it has been prepared (see xxv. 34), and who have been prepared for it.

24. οἱ δέκα] the ten. Observe St. Matthew's ingenuousness, Vol. I.

recording his own failings and those of his brethren,—a proof of truth. See xv. 23; xvii. 16.

27. ὃς ἐὰν θέλῃ] Christ teaches (v. 25) that it is a heathen passion to seek pre-eminence; and He proposes His own practice as a pattern. The Son of Man was King of heaven, and condescended to become Man, and to be rejected, and suffer death for His enemies. Suffering was His road to glory. Humility is the door of heaven. By desiring great things we lose them; by not seeking them we gain them. What is lower than the Devil? And how did he become so? By self-exaltation. And how are we enabled to tread him under foot? By humility. (Chrys.)

28. λύτρον ἀντὶ] a ransom in the stead of many. λύτρον is the word used by the LXX for רִיפָה (pidhyon), a ransom (Exod. xxi. 30), from root רִפָּה (padhak), to pay a ransom, for which λυτροῦν is used in numerous passages by the LXX: Exod. xiii. 13. 15; xxxiv. 20. Lev. xix. 20; xxvii. 29. Numb. xviii. 15. 17. Deut. vii. 8; ix. 26. Ps. xxv. 22; xxvi. 11; xxxi. 5. Isa. li. 11. Jer. xv. 21. Cp. 1 Pet. i. 18, 19, which supplies the best comment on this passage, οὐ φθαρτοῖς, ἀργυρίῳ ἢ χρυσῷ, ἐλυτρώθητε, ἀλλὰ τιμῇ αἵματι, ὡς ἁμοῦ ἀμώμου καὶ ἀσίτλου, Χριστοῦ. λύτρον is also something more; it is purchase money for some great benefit. See Grotius, de Satisfactione Christi, p. 162.

Here then is a divine assertion of the doctrine of the Atonement; the life of Christ was given by Him as a price by which mankind is ransomed from the captivity and slavery of sin and death, and for the purchase of a glorious liberty and of life everlasting. See below on Eph. i. 6, 7. 14. Rom. iii. 21—26.

It must be remembered, that λύτρον is not a price paid for a thing, but for a person; a ransom paid for his liberty.

The LXX use also the word κόφρα (copher) for λύτρον, in the sense of ransom. (See Exod. xxi. 30; xxx. 10. 16.) And the Mercy-seat, as covering the Ark (the figure of the Church), and as that on which God reposes in mercy between the Cherubim, is called κόφρα (cappporeth), Exod. xxv. 17—22, or covering, and also ἱλαστήριον (Heb. ix. 5), and is a fit type of the propitiation made by Christ. Christ says that He gives His life, that is, willingly. A refutation of the Socinian objection to the Atonement as inconsistent with the Father's love to the Son. Cp. on Matt. xvii. 5. John x. 17.

— ἀντὶ πολλῶν] instead of many. Why does He not say πάντων, all? That would be true; see Heb. ii. 9. Rom. viii. 32. 1 Tim. ii. 6, ὁ δὸς ἑαυτὸν ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων, where see note.

But the Sacrifice was not yet offered; when it had been, it would declare its own nature; and the Apostles would proclaim it. He makes His gracious revelations to them by degrees. See xvi. 21 and xxvi. 2. Cp. on xxvi. 28. περὶ πολλῶν ἐκχυνόμενον, and see how in this case οἱ πολλοὶ and πάντες are equivalent, Rom v. 12—19.

29. ἐκπορευομένων αὐτῶν] as they were going out. At first sight there seems to be a difficulty in reconciling this narrative with that in St. Luke (xviii. 35—43) and St. Mark (x. 46—52), which see.

The solution seems to be as follows:

Our Lord on entering Jericho sees a blind man by the way-side begging (Luke xviii. 35—43). St. Luke says that our Lord paused after a time and healed him. St. Luke then goes back to give an account of Zachæus, who was anxious to see Jesus as He was entering Jericho (Luke ix. 1). And he then recounts how our Lord spends the night in the house of Zachæus, probably at Jericho, and leaves the city for Jerusalem.

b Isa. 62. 11.
Zech. 9. 9.
John 12. 13.

St. Luke describes and puts together the whole history of the blind man's cure, and so anticipates the result by a prolepsis common in Scripture.

It appears from the other Evangelists, that the blind man was not healed immediately; but that our Lord tried his faith by postponing his cure till the morrow; and that when our Lord, after His sojourn with Zacchæus, was going out the next day from Jericho, the same blind man, now attended by another blind man who had heard of our Lord's intention to go that way, and who had perhaps been invited by the other blind man to join him, was sitting near the gate which led out of Jericho toward Jerusalem (see Matt. xx. 29. 34), and that both were then healed.

See further on this subject the note on Mark x. 46.

In confirmation of the above remarks, it may be observed that nothing is more striking in sacred history (compared with human annals) than the practice of Anticipation and Recapitulation (see xxvi. 6). It belongs to the nature of the Divine Author of Scripture (ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος, Rev. i. 4), to whom all time is present at once. Holy Scripture, to be rightly understood, must be read and interpreted accordingly. One of the Rabbis says well, "Non est prius, aut posterius, in Scripturâ." (R. Jarchi, in Gen. vi.)

A similar instance of finishing-off a subject may be seen in St. Matthew's narrative of the withering of the fig-tree (xxi. 20), which he connects with the remarks of the Disciples upon it, although those remarks were not made till the next day. (Mark xi. 20.)

See also a remarkable instance of Anticipation in St. Luke, iii. 19, and another xix. 45. By a similar prolepsis Mary is said, in John xi. 2, to have anointed Jesus, though the anointing did not take place till afterwards (xii. 3). See also Matt. xxvii. 52, 53.

— Ἱερικώ] Jericho. For a description of this place see below on Luke xviii. 35.

31. οἱ δὲ μείζον ἐκραζον] but they were crying the more. A proof of faith. The blind men saw Jesus with the eye of faith, and prayed to Him as their Saviour,—while the world, who could see His person, saw Him not. And yet the blind world, which did not see Jesus, rebuked the blind men who saw and worshipped Him; but they were nothing daunted by the rebuke, but cried to Him the more earnestly. Thus the blind recovered sight; and they who saw were blind. John ix. 39.

Comp. the case of the faithful woman, who alone touched Him (though it was but by the hem of His garment), while the profane crowd which pressed on Him touched Him not (ix. 20).

34. ἥψατο] He touched them as Man, and healed them as God.

CH. XXI. 1. ὅτε ἤγγισαν εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα] when they drew near to Jerusalem. This day seems to have been the tenth day of the month Abib or Nisan, on which the paschal lamb was to be taken up (Exod. xii. 1—5).

The true Paschal Lamb therefore now goes up to Jerusalem to those who would slay Him; He goes to that City, where alone the Passover could be sacrificed. He thus shows that He is the true Passover, and that He laid down His life willingly (John xviii. 1).

For Homilies on Palm Sunday (εἰς τὰ βαθα), see S. Epiphanius ii. p. 251 and 301, and S. Methodius, p. 430. Cf. note on v. 9.

— Βηθθαγῇ] בֵּת-פֶּגֶז (beth-phage), "locus grossorum," the place of Figs, at the foot of the Mount of Olives, to the west of Bethany. Among the Rabbinical Writers the term Bethphage is applied to a District stretching from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives. (Lightfoot.) See further on xxvi. 6, and note below on Acts i. 12.

— ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν] the Mount of Olives, Zech. xiv. 4, five furlongs east of Jerusalem (Acts i. 12. Joseph. Ant. xx. 8), and separated from it by the brook Kedron (Joseph. B. J. v. 2).

2. μοι] to me. On this dative see Acts ii. 33.

4. τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ τοῦ προφήτου] that which was spoken through the prophet. Isa. lxii. 11. Zech. ix. 9. "Solent Scriptores N. T. ex duobus vel pluribus locis allegatis unum contexere." (Glass. Philol. Sac. p. 960.) "Prophetam autem in singulari vocat, ut pulcherrimam vaticiniorum harmoniam insinuet, et omnes prophetas uno Spiritu locutos fuisse ostendat." See on ii. 23, and below on xxi. 13, and xxvii. 9, and on Mark i. 2.

5. τῇ θυγατρὶ Σιών] Jerusalem. Ps. cxxxvii. 8. Cp. Isa. xlvii.

1. Jer. xlvii. 24. Vorst. de Hebr. 499.

— πραῦς] Zech. has רַךְ (an), poor, rendered πραῦς by LXX.

— ὄνον] The riding on an Ass was a sign of peacefulness; as opposed to the use of the Horse, the emblem of War; and a rebuke to the Jewish spirit, which in defiance of the Divine command not to multiply horses, put their trust in chariots and in horses (Ps. xx. 7), i. e. in worldly strength, and not in the Name of the Lord. See Bp. Sherlock on the Prophecies, Diss. iv.

Contrast this peaceful entry of our Lord, riding on the foal of an ass, with His majestic appearance (as described in Ps. xlv. 3—6) as Conqueror, King, and God; and also as displayed in the Apocalypse, riding on the White Horse—conquering and to conquer (Rev. vi. 2; xix. 11), as King of kings and Lord of lords.

— ὄνον, καὶ πῶλον] an ass and even on a foal of an ass. The conjunction καὶ, and, does not express addition here, but explanation (Vorst. Hebr. 382): Our Lord did not ride on the mother and the foal, but on the foal only. See below on v. 7, and Mark xi. 2. Luke xix. 35. John xii. 14. The phrase may be rendered thus:—"He is thy King, but He does not come to thee riding on a horse, but on an ass; and not on an ass of full age and size, which might be a noble creature, but even on the foal of an ass." Such is thy Messiah—in His meekness and humility!

This act of riding on the foal, followed by its mother, was typical and prophetic; see Justin Martyr c. Tryphon. 53. Our Blessed Lord thus prophesied that the Gentiles would come to Him; for the Colt symbolized the Gentile Church, which was unclean before it received Christ, Who sat upon it and sanctified it. (Chrys.) The Mother, which had been tamed, was a figure of the Jewish people, which had received the yoke of the law; the foal of the ass on which none had ever sat, was the Gentile world. Christ sent His Apostles to both,—to one the Apostle of the circumcision, to the other the Apostle of the Gentiles. (Jerome.) St. Matthew, who wrote for the Jews, is the only one of the Evangelists who mentions the Ass. The Hebrew nation, if it repents, will be saved by faith; and, as the Ass followed the colt, so will the Jewish Nation be converted to Christ, when the fulness of the Gentiles is come into the spiritual Sion. (Rom. xi. 25.) The Lord hath need of both. See on Mark x. 46; xi. 2. Luke xix. 30. John xii. 14.

7. ἐπέθηκαν—τὰ ἱμάτια] For illustration of this usage, see 2 Kings ix. 13. Grinf. p. 128. Lightfoot, i. p. 977.

— ἐπεκάθισεν ἐπάνω αὐτῶν] they set him on them, i. e. on the garments (Theophyl., Euthym.), not (as some have imagined) on the ass and its colt; for He rode only on the foal. See on v. 5.

8. ἔκοπτον κλάδους] they were cutting branches. They imitate the holy offices prescribed for the feast of Tabernacles. Levit. xxiii. 40. Cp. 1 Macc. xiii. 51. 2 Macc. x. 7; and on John xii. 13.

9. Ὡσαννὰ] ἡσσανά (Hoshian-na), save now; from Ps. cxviii. 25, 26, which formed part of the great Hallel (i. e. Ps. cxiii.—cxviii.), or song of praise then sung. They acknowledge Him as Jesus (Jehoshua, Jeshua) or Saviour, and as Son of David and King; and as coming in the Name, i. e. with the power of, the Lord, Jehovah. Palm Sunday,—the day of this triumphal entry,—was called the Day of Hosannas by the ancient Church. Cyrl on Luke, p. 601, ed. Smith.

Perhaps the use of the solemnities of the Feast of Tabernacles on this occasion may have been providentially ordered as an intimation that their God and King was now manifest in the Tabernacle of Human Flesh. (John i. 14. Rev. vii. 15; xxi. 3.) See John xii. 13.

It is observable that our Lord made His triumphal entry into Jerusalem on a Sunday, the Sunday before His Passion. He then showed Himself as King, Saviour, and Conqueror, and rode on the foal of the ass (the type of the Gentile world; see on Mark xi. 2. John xii. 14) into Jerusalem, the Holy City of God. Well might the Psalmist in the Spirit, hearing with the prophetic ear the future Hosannas of his own city at the triumphal entry of his own Son and King (see Ps. cxviii. 24. 26), exclaim, “This is the Day which the Lord hath made (the Lord's Day), we will rejoice, and be glad in it.” And may not this event be among those that were prophetic of the sanctity, dignity, beauty, and glory of the Christian Sunday?

On the events of the Holy Week, beginning with Palm Sunday, see Dean Stanhope's Holy Week, and Williams' Holy Week, p. 24, &c.; and Adams, Rev. W., Warnings of Holy Week. See on v. 1.

12. εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν] into the Temple. St. Matthew appropriately proceeds from the triumphant entry to speak of our Lord's visit to the Temple—His own Palace—in His own Capital—and thus brings out more clearly the meaning of the withering of the Fig-tree, typical of the destruction of Jerusalem,—flourishing with the luxuriant foliage of a hypocritical show of Religion in the Services of the Temple, but barren of religious fruit.

— ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ] In the outer court of the Temple (not the vaults or sanctuary) in which the money-changers had erected their booths. Christ, Who was so zealous for the sanctification of the outer court of the Jewish Temple, requires all to treat with reverence the Christian sanctuary—where He is present in His Holy Word and Sacraments, and where Angels wait upon Him. 1 Cor. xi. 10.

— κολλυβιστῶν] the κερματισταί, ‘nummularii,’ those who exchanged larger sums into smaller (κόλλυβοι or κέρματα), for the convenience of those who had to pay the half-shekel or Temple-rate (see above, xvii. 24, and Mishna de Siclis, cap. i. col. 7), or to buy doves (see Luke ii. 24. Levit. i. 14; v. 7), or other victims. “Auxerat emporium appropinquans Pascha.” (Rosenm.) See further on John ii. 14—16.

— τὰς περιστερὰς] the doves; for oblations. The Priests sold doves and victims to the people who came to the Temple for sacrifice; and they acted also as money-changers, to change money, in order that the people might buy, and to lend money to those who had none.

Our Lord overturned the seats (cathedras or chairs) of those who sold doves. The Dove is an emblem of the Holy Spirit. The seat is a place of teaching. He overturns the seats of all who sell the gifts of the Spirit, and who make a simoniacal traffic of their ministry. He reproveth and punishes simony,—that is, the selling of spiritual grace for money. He is ever entering into the Temple of His Father, the Church, and He casts out from it those Bishops, Priests, Deacons, and laymen,—both sellers and buyers, who trade in spiritual things; for it is written, Freely ye have received, freely give. Matt. x. 8. (Hilary. Jerome.) Cp. Acts viii. 18—20.

Deacons who do not well dispense the funds of the Church, but grow rich from the poor man's portion, are the money-changers in Christ's Temple whose tables Christ overthrows. Bishops, who intrust Churches to unfit persons, are they who sell doves,—that is, spiritual grace,—whose seats Christ overthrows. (Origen.)

13. σπήλαιον ληστῶν] a den of thieves. The term ληστῆς, Hebr. γַנָּב (parits), is a general term for a factious and lawless person in word and act.

These words are not only descriptive of the then state of the Temple, but are prophetic of its future desecration by the bands of factious robbers and assassins (λησται, σικάρται), who would occupy the Temple during the siege. It is remarkable that Josephus (Ant. v. 12) uses the same word λησται when speaking of them. Cp. Surenhus. p. 263.

Your holy House is deserted by Me; it is left for desolation. Comp. the remarkable words of Tacitus, Hist. v. 13, concerning the Temple of Jerusalem at the siege: “Expassa repente delubri fores, et audita major humanâ Vox, Excedere Deos.”

14. προσῆλθον—τυφλοὶ] the blind, &c., came to Him in the Temple. He first as a King purifies His Palace, and then dispenses royal gifts to His people. (Luc. Brug.)

16. οὐδέποτε ἀνέγνωτε—αἶνον] For κατηρίσω αἶνον, the original (Ps. viii. 2) has ἡ ἡγή (yisadta oz), i. e. ‘Thou hast found, established, strength.’ Our Lord adopts the sense already given by the Jewish Translators, the LXX, as the correct one, as showing that the strength of the weak is in praise; and that worship of Himself is strength. Cp. Mede, pp. 37—39. 266.

— ἐκ στόματος] From the mouth; for it was not done by their mind; but by divine power giving articulate sounds to lisping tongues; a figure of the Gentile world then stammering in infancy, but soon about to sing with faith. Here was also a cheering encouragement to the Apostles. God gives eloquence to babes, in order that the Apostles, being illiterate men, might not doubt that they themselves would be enabled to preach. Remark the contrast. Infants sing praise to Christ, like the Angels in heaven; and men reject Him. Christ is the Author of nature. He makes children speak wisdom in harmony with prophecy, while wise men become fools. (Chrys.)

Holiness makes babes into men; and sin makes men into babes. Some reckon the Raising of Lazarus, or the giving of sight to one born blind, or the Transfiguration, as the greatest of our Lord's Miracles. But it seems to me that nothing was more marvellous than this. One man, Jesus, then so despised in their eyes, that He was afterwards delivered to be crucified, did what He now does, while the Rulers rage against Him and see their gains destroyed. He ejects a multitude, and overturns their tables and their seats, and does what a large force could hardly have done. Certainly a flame of fire and starry brightness flashed from His eyes, and the Majesty of the Godhead shone in His face. (Jerome.)

17. ἐξῆλθεν—Βηθανίαν] He went out of the city to Bethany, and lodged there.

“Ex urbe autem Jesus discessit, ut omnem affectati regni terreni suspicionem à se amoveret. Præclare ad h. l. notavit Michaelis, templum munissimum, et coacervatum fuisse in eo infinitam pecuniæ atque frumenti copiam, adeo ut qui templum, arcem urbis, occupasset, in ipsâ quoque urbe dominaretur. Jesum ergo, quem tam insignis multitudo hominum rerum novarum cupidissimorum, eumque Messiam agnoscentium, in templum comitata esset, si voluisset regnum terrenum affectare, opportunissimam tunc temporis occasionem nactum fuisse seditionem movendi, præsertim cum plus quàm decies centena millia, tempore festi Paschatos, Hierosolymis commorarentur; eum vero hæc occasio non usum esse, sed è templo, et ipsâ urbe, discessisse.” (Kuin.) He went out to Bethany. In the great city of Jerusalem—His own Metropolis—the King of the Jews and of heaven itself has not where to lay His head; but He goes out to a small village in the suburbs for a lodging. See on xxvi. 6.

18. ἐπείνασεν] He was an hungered—showing His humanity, as He ever was wont to do when about to exert His divine power.

He was an hungered also spiritually. He yearned for the salvation of believers, and was grieved for the unbelief of Jerusalem. In the Fig-tree we see the Jewish Nation, standing near the Way—for it was planted by the Wayside of God's Law—and He came to it and found on it nothing but leaves, the rustling leaves of religious profession, the barren traditions of the Pharisees, the ostentatious display of the Law, and vain exuberance of words without the good fruit of works. He says to it, ‘Let no man eat fruit of thee for ever.’ And it was withered, because it had not the fruit for which Christ hungered. Our Lord was going to His crucifixion, and He therefore confirmed the minds of His disciples by this assurance of His power. If He had so willed, He could have withered His enemies, who were about to crucify Him, but He waited for their salvation by Repentance. See further below on Mark xi. 13.

19. μίαν] one. And so more conspicuous; and there was but one Jerusalem (of which the tree was a type) in the whole world. Single it was in favour,—and in sin.

— εἰ μὴ φύλλα μόνον] save leaves only. The leaves proved that it had received the sap of divine grace, enabling it, morally speaking, to bear fruit also; and so its own foliage condemned it for barrenness of fruit.

— Μηκέτι] He hungers as Man, and withers the tree as God. He gives proof of His Divine Power, for He is about to suffer death in the weakness of Humanity.

20. ἐξηράνθη] it was withered. The withering of the fig-tree was a Parable and Prophecy in action;

Our Lord withers a fig-tree, the most succulent of trees, in its full luxuriance of leaf, and near the public road, and thus the miracle was more striking. He here manifests His punitive power in order that the disciples may learn that He is able to wither the Jews who crucify Him. But He would not show this punitive power on any rational creature. The Evangelist St. Mark (xi. 13) says it was not yet the season for figs. But the Jewish people was here represented, and it was the season for the fruit of faith there. (Cp. Chrys.)

We here see a proof of our Lord's goodness. When He exercised His Mercy in His Miracles, He did it on the bodies of men, but when He displayed the severity of His future judgment, it was done upon a Tree, in order that the danger of unbelief might be shown without damage to those whom He had come to redeem. (Hilary.) Trees were made for men; they have no volition, and therefore cannot sin, and have no feeling of punishment. And this barren fig-tree, withered by Christ's word, bears fruit for ever in the garden of Holy Scripture by the warning it gives against hypocritical ostentation and luxuriant unfruitfulness.

21. ἐὰν ἔχητε πίστιν] if ye have faith. The leafy and barren fig-tree, which looked so fair and flourishing, was withered by the breath of Christ, in order to teach the Apostles to have faith in Him; and to assure them, that, although He Himself was now about, as it were, to be withered by the blighting scorn and scorching rage of the Jewish Nation, now seeming to flourish in prosperity and power, yet He could blast it in a moment, and would wither it, if it did not bring forth fruits of Repentance. Let not therefore the Disciples of Christ ever faint; let them not be cast down by the temporary triumph of evil over good, but,—let them have faith in God. See further on Mark xi. 22.

— τῷ ὄρει τοῦτῳ] to this Mountain of Olives, far from the Sea. Cp. Zech. xiv. 4. Rev. vi. 14; viii. 8.

The moving of mountains, i. e. of impediments and difficulties, is characteristic of Faith. See 1 Cor. xii. 2. Job ix. 5.

24. ἕνα] one; not more—one will suffice—though you have assailed Me often.

30. τῷ ἐτέρῳ] So Tisch. and others on good MS. authority for δευτέρῳ.

31. Ὁ πρῶτος] This is the reading of most MSS. and Versions, among which the old Syriac Cureton. And notwithstanding the ingenious observations of Tregelles (pp. 106—108) and the evidence given in his valuable edition of this Gospel, this reading cannot, it seems, be set aside for ὁ ὕστερος, or ὁ δεύτερος, or ὁ ἔσχατος, which probably arose from a transposition of the paragraphs (v. 29) ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς—μεταμεληθεὶς ἀπήλθεν, and (v. 30) ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς—οὐκ ἀπήλθεν, a transposition which was very likely to occur, because both clauses begin and end with the same words. Besides, it might be thought reasonable by some that the invitation should be made first to those who represented the Pharisees. Hence another occasion for transposition.

— προάγουσιν ὑμᾶς] they go before and show you the way.
32. ὁδῷ] $\pi\eta\gamma\eta$ (dherech), way, track, doctrine. Hence ἡ ὁδὸς, the way κατ' ἐξοχὴν, the Gospel (Acts ix. 2; xix. 23).

33. ἀμπελῶνα] vineyard. See above, xx. 1. Cp. Isa. v. 1—7. Ps. lxxx. 8—15.

34. τοὺς δούλους] his servants. The Prophets. (See Luke xiii. 34.) Servants—whom they beat as Jeremiah, or killed as Isaiah, or stoned as Naboth and Zechariah, whom they killed between the porch and the altar. Read the Epistle of St. Paul to the Hebrews and see what the servants suffered (Heb. xi.). (Jerome.)

— καρποὺς] fruit, as rent. See Luke xvi. 5.
39. ἔξω τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος] out of the vineyard. A prophecy that He would suffer without the gate (Heb. xiii. 12).

42. Λίθον] The Stone. This quotation finds a very appropriate place here, being from the same Psalm (cxviii. 22) as the language of Hosanna, which had just been addressed to Christ. (See above, v. 9.) He then passes to another prophetic image concerning Himself represented as a Stone.

— εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας] to the head of the corner. This expression is synonymous with ἀκρογωνιαίος, scil. λίθος, in Eph. ii. 20, and 1 Pet. ii. 6 (occurring also in Barnab. Epist. c. vi.), where quoted from Isa. cxviii. 16, where the Hebr. is כֶּןֶן זָנָה, to which the Hebr. כֶּןֶן זָנָה, corresponding to κεφαλὴ γωνίας is tantamount, since כֶּןֶן there refers to the headpoint, or angle, where two walls meet. Now a stone so placed may serve to bind the two walls, with which it is united, together; and hence the metaphor is highly suitable, since Christ is here represented as uniting Jews and Gentiles in Himself, so as to form one Body,—the Church of the faithful,—ἐν ᾧ πάσα ἡ οἰκοδομὴ συναρμολογουμένη αὐτῷ εἰς ναὸν ἁγίον ἐν Κυρίῳ, Eph. ii. 21. This view is confirmed by Euthym., who (after Chrys. and other ancient Fathers) explains: καθάπερ ἐκεῖνος (ὁ λίθος) ἐφ' ἑαυτῷ συνδεῖ τοίχους δύο, τὸν αὐτὸν τῆρον καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς ἐφ' ἑαυτῷ συνδεσμεῖ τοὺς δύο λαοὺς (Jews and Gentiles) καὶ συνενεὶ διὰ τῆς εἰς αὐτὸν πίστεως. The same view is expressed in nearly the same words by Theophylact. So also Origen ap. Catenam in Matt., Oxon., p. 176 (ed. Cramer): γωνία ἐστὶ συγκρότησις δύο τοίχων τὸ ἐξ Ἰσραὴλ λῆμμα (read λείμμα, and comp. Rom. xi. 5) καὶ τῶν ἐθνῶν πλήρωμα, εἰς ἓν συγκροτῶν ὁ λίθος Χριστὸς τὴν γωνίαν ποιήσας. (Bloomf.) Christ is become the Corner-stone, that He may join the two Walls of the two Peoples (Jews and Gentiles) in Himself. (Jerome.)

— αὕτη] A Hebraism, זֹאת (zoth), hæc, derived through the LXX (Ps. cxviii. 22). The feminine refers to the whole subject, not to γωνία or κεφαλὴ. Cp. John xvii. 3; and see Vorst. de Hebr. pp. 282—287; and Kuin.: “Hebræi femininum sæpius

— τὸν λίθον τοῦτον] this Stone, i. e. Myself. See above on xvi. 18. He refers here also to the same prophecy of Daniel, as in that passage, ταύτη τῇ πέτρᾳ; and it is observable that in the translation of Dan. ii. 44 by Theodotion, the same word is used as here—λικμήσει—will become like a fan and winnow him away like chaff. The λίθος or stone cut out without hands, λεπτονεῖ καὶ λικμήσει πάσας τὰς βασιλείας. (Dan. ii. 34—44). Cp. v. 35 in LXX, where the other kingdoms are described as so pulverized by the Stone, that they become λεπτότερα ἀχύρου ἐν ἄλῳι, i. e. λικμώμενα.

Almighty God has made a Marriage Feast for our Lord Jesus Christ and His Church, which is gathered from the Jews and Gentiles; and He has sent His servants, Moses and the Prophets, and other servants, the Apostles. His armies are the angels; or the Roman armies, under Vespasian and Titus, sent to destroy Jerusalem. (Jerome.)

On this Parable see Greg. M. Hom. in Ev. xxxviii.

10. πονηροὺς καὶ ἀγαθοὺς] bad and good. Such is the state of the Visible Church on earth, a mixed company, containing good and bad (see xiii. 3. 30). “Arca in undis diluvii Ecclesie typum gessit; in hac Ecclesia nec mali sine bonis, nec boni sine malis.” (Greg. M.) See above on xiii. 30—48.

11. ἔνδυμα γάμου] a wedding garment. Literally, a garment of a wedding: a garment of which the peculiar characteristic and quality, present to the speaker's mind, is, that it is worn at a wedding.

On this very expressive use of the Genitive—which may be called the characterizing Genitive—a use derived from, or at least very common in, the Hebrew, and much more convenient than that of an Adjective, because it brings out more clearly the point to which the attention is directed, see Luke xvi. 9, μαμωνᾶς ἀδικίας. James i. 25, ἀκρατῆς ἐπιλησμονῆς. 2 Thess. ii. 3, ἀνθρώπος ἁμαρτίας. Heb. i. 8, ράβδος εὐθύτητος. 2 Pet. ii. 1, αἰρέσεις ἀπωλείας. 2 Thess. ii. 9, τέρατα ψεύδους. Hebr.* p. 227. Winer, § 34, p. 210. Exod. xxix. 29. 1 Sam. i. 11. Jerem. xii. 10.

The ἔνδυμα γάμου is a Marriage Robe, which the King had provided for his guests, as was customary at Eastern audiences and entertainments. (Cp. Zeph. i. 8.) See Rossmüller here, and the passages in Trench on the Parables, pp. 227, 228.

12. πῶς εἰσήλθες ὧδε μὴ ἔχων ἔνδυμα γάμου:] how camest thou in hither, not having on a wedding garment?

What is represented by the Wedding garment? Many eminent Expositors say it is some inward affection, faith, or charity. Cp. Aug. Serm. xc. vol. v. pp. 702—706. But this does not seem to be an adequate reply to the question.

The Parable represents the Visible Church on Earth, in which are bad mingled with good (see v. 10). No doubt, all the good will be severed from the bad, when the King comes in to see the guests, i. e. at the Last Day. And this process of severance had been already described by our Lord in many other Parables, viz. the Wheat and the Tares, the bad fish and the good fish (see Matt. xiii. 30—48).

But the aim of the present Parable is to represent a particular form of badness, viz., the refusal to wear the wedding garment, provided and appointed by the King for the guests. It is expressly said above, v. 10, that there were bad and good in the Guest-chamber; and bad as well as good had on the Wedding garment. Therefore the Wedding garment cannot represent internal goodness.

A garment is a visible thing; and this garment was provided for all: it was one which all might and must wear, and by which they would be distinguished from all others, as wearing the livery of the King; but which did not of itself make the bad to be good,—for there were some bad who had it on,—and yet he who did not wear it was condemned as bad for not wearing it.

It must therefore be some outward mark, something which bad men may have as well as good, but without which, if wantonly and wilfully refused, when proffered by the King, none can hope to be saved.

We may conclude, therefore, that the Wedding Garment

εἶπεν ὁ βασιλεὺς τοῖς διακόνοις, Δήσαντες αὐτοῦ πόδας καὶ χεῖρας ἄρατε αὐτὸν καὶ ἐκβάλετε εἰς τὸ σκότος τὸ ἐξώτερον· ἐκεῖ ἔσται ὁ κλαυθμὸς καὶ ὁ βρυγμὸς τῶν ὀδόντων. ¹⁴ πολλοὶ γάρ εἰσι κλητοί, ὀλίγοι δὲ ἐκλεκτοί.

means external tokens of the Christian faith publicly professed, and the Christian Sacraments openly received. Particularly it means Baptism, as the germ of all the means of spiritual grace. Hence S. Cyril, in his Catechetical Lecture on Baptism, p. 39, compares Baptism, in which the soul is espoused to Christ, to a wedding.

The question, therefore, "Friend, how camest thou in hither not having a wedding garment?" may be understood as specially addressed to those who bear the Christian Name, and who, by virtue of certain articles of Christian Belief that they hold, are, so far, members of the Visible Church; but who reject the visible signs and means of spiritual grace, which are provided for, and prescribed to, all by the Great King, viz. the Holy Sacraments.

This interrogation, uttered by the King and Judge of all, has a solemn and awful sense in reference to the Quakers, and others who slight the sacramental symbols ordained by Christ Himself,—"Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having a wedding garment?"

The white garment provided in the ancient Christian Church (especially on Whit Sunday) to be worn in Baptism, when the soul is espoused to Christ, may be referred to as illustrative of this interpretation. See Bingham XII. iv. Cp. the Chrysom in our own Church, mentioned in K. Edward VI.'s Prayer Books. Bp. Gibson's Codex, Tit. xviii. c. vii. Hence the Wedding Garment in this parable is applied to the Baptismal Robe kept pure and unsullied, or if sullied by sin, washed by penitential tears and in the Blood of Christ, by Clemens R. ii. 6, ἐὰν μὴ τηρήσωμεν τὸ βάπτισμα ἁγνὸν καὶ ἄμωμον ποῖα πεποιθήμεν εἰσελευσόμεθα εἰς τὸ βασιλεῖον τοῦ Θεοῦ; and S. Cyril Hieros. p. 3 and p. 39, and p. 12, who calls Baptism ἔνδυμα φωτεινόν. Cp. St. Paul's words, Gal. iii. 27. — ἐφωδῶν was speechless; properly, as one gagged by a muzzle. See v. 34, and on Luke iv. 35.

¹⁴. πολλοὶ γάρ εἰσι κλητοί for many are called, but few chosen. Christ commands to baptize all Nations (Matt. xxvii. 19). And He says, "Drink ye all of this" (Matt. xxvi. 27). He proffers the Marriage garment to all, and yet how many refuse it, and prefer their own clothes!

Besides, even of those who have the Wedding garment, some are described as bad, v. 10. Therefore, few are chosen. The called, or Ecclesia visibilis, is numerous, but how few are the chosen! Compare what He has said concerning the narrow gate, vii. 13, 14, and His description of the character of the last days, xxiv. 37—39. Luke xvii. 26; xviii. 8.

He had used this saying also above, xx. 16, where see note.

¹⁵, 16. Φαρισαῖοι—μετὰ τῶν Ἑρωδιανῶν They hated one another: the Pharisees, under pretence of zeal for Jehovah, being eager to rebel against Rome; the Herodians profaning the things of God, under plea of loyalty to Herod and to Rome; but they conspired together against Christ, who confounded them both by the force of Truth.

Observe Herodiani, a Latin termination, showing connexion with the Gentile world. So Christiani, a word first heard in a Gentile city (Acts xi. 26).

¹⁷. ἔξεστι is it lawful? A dilemma. If He answer No, it is not lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, then the Herodians will accuse Him as a rebel against Cæsar. If Yes, the Pharisees will condemn Him as a traitor to God, whose Prophet and Son He professes to be. But see how He turns the horns of the dilemma against them both!

— κῆνσον] 'censum'; ἐπιτεφάλειον, a poll-tax. (Hesych.)

— Καίσαρι] to Cæsar—at that time Tiberius. Compare St. Paul's precepts to those who lived under Nero, Rom. xiii. 1—3.

²¹. Ἀπόδοτε] Render ye. They had talked of giving tribute to Cæsar, as if tribute was a boon! He corrects them by prefixing a preposition, ἀπό,—He does not say, δότε, but ἀπό-δότε,—not date, but reddite. Tribute is not a gift, but a due. Render, therefore, tribute of your coin to Cæsar; and tribute of yourselves, coined in the Divine Mint, and stamped with the Divine Image and Superscription (Gen. i. 26, 27; ix. 6. 1 Cor. xi. 7), to Cæsar's God. Tertullian says (de Idol. xv.), "Reddite imaginem Cæsari quæ in nummo est, et imaginem Dei Deo quæ in homine est, ut Cæsari quidem pecuniam reddas, Deo temetipsum." Cp. Aug. in Joann. Tract. xl. 9, and xli. 2; and Bp. Andrewes, "On giving Cæsar his Due," v. p. 127—140.

The Pharisees had sent their disciples with the Herodians, preparing for Him a double snare, that, if He answered according to the opinion of the Herodians, the disciples of the Pharisees might accuse Him; but if He replied in their favour, then the Herodians might arraign Him. But He, as God, knew their thoughts, and, as His custom was, replied to them out of their own mouths. He does not say, "Give to Cæsar, but render, as a due." And lest they should allege that He subjected them to man, He adds, "And render the things of God to God." So St. Paul (Rom. xiii. 7), "Render unto all their dues."—And when you hear that you are to render the things of Cæsar to Cæsar, you are to understand that our Lord means you are to render those things which are not prejudicial to holiness; for the surrender of any thing that is sacred is not Cæsar's tribute, but Satan's. (Chrys.)

Render to Cæsar; Tiberius, under whom our Blessed Lord was crucified.—Render to Cæsar his due, tribute, custom; and to God His own,—namely, tithes and offerings. (Jerome.)

²². ἀπῆλθον] they departed. And yet they could afterwards accuse Him of forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar! See Luke xxiii. 2.

²⁴. Μωϋσῆς εἶπεν] Moses said. The reference is to Deut. xxv. 5, of which the substance is here given, not the exact words.

This method of quoting, common among the Jews, deserves attention, as showing that our Blessed Lord, and His Apostles and Evangelists, followed the practice usual among the Jews in citing Holy Scripture, and in giving the sense sometimes in an enlarged, sometimes in a compendious form, rather than the exact words. See Surenhus., and above on Matt. ii. 23.

29—32. μὴ εἰδότες τὰς γραφὰς] because ye know not the Scriptures. See Iren. iv. 5. 2, who thence argues against the Gnostics, that the God of the Old Testament is the same as He Whom Christ reveals as His Father in the New. Cp. Beveridge and Browne on Art. VII.

32. Ἐγὼ εἰμι] I am the God of Abraham, who is dead; but since I am His God, and since I am the everliving Jehovah, and all live in Me, therefore He will rise again.

God calls Himself the God of Abraham; and Abraham consists of body and soul; so that Abraham's body must rise again in order that God's promise may be true. (Theophyl. in Marc. xii.)

He proves also that Abraham's soul is still alive; for God calls Himself his God, and He is the God of the living, and so is inferred the resurrection of the body, which, together with the soul, had done good or evil. (Jerome.)

The Eternal "I AM" calls Himself their God, therefore they will exist for ever. (Cp. Hilary, Origen.)

God after their death desiring still to be called their God thereby acknowledgeth that He hath a blessing and reward for them still, and consequently that He will raise them to another life in which they may receive it. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. xi. p. 702—712. "Nam non existentī beneficia tribui non possunt." (Rosenm.)

In this question the Sadducees were not content with putting a case of three or four husbands, they speak of seven, in order to throw ridicule on the doctrine of the Resurrection. Since they plead Moses and the Law, He shows that their question proceeds from ignorance of Scripture. It is not wonderful that through ignorance of Me you should tempt Me, since your question proves that you know not God's power nor Word. If you knew God, you would know that nothing is impossible with Him. And then He shows them from Scripture that they who are departed are still alive; for God says, I am (not I was) the God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Jacob; I am the God of them yet living. And He describes the manner of the Resurrection,—they do not marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven. Being as the angels they do not marry. The fashion of this world passeth away. 1 Cor. vii. 31. (Chrys.)

Our Lord chose this testimony from the Pentateuch, in order to refute the Sadducees, who received only the five books of Moses. (Jerome.)

35. νομικός] a lawyer. This is the only passage in St. Matthew where this word occurs. He is called γραμματεὺς by St. Mark, xii. 28. The word νομικός is never used by St. Mark or St. John; but six times by St. Luke. Perhaps St. Luke uses the word νομικός to distinguish the γραμματεῖς from the persons known by that name in Greek cities.

36. ποία ἐντολὴ μεγάλη] what command is great, above the rest? (Heb. x. 21; xiii. 20.) Glass. Phil. Sacr., p. 274. Hence Mark xii. 28 has πρώτη. The question of the Lawyer is conceived in the spirit of those Jewish Doctors who taught that if a man was careful to keep some "one great precept," he might disregard the rest. With a view to this dangerous notion the Apostle St. James (ii. 10) teaches that if a man wilfully and habitually allows himself in the breach of any one commandment, he is guilty of all.

The offering of sacrifice was by many regarded as the paramount duty, as being placed first in Leviticus. (See Bede on Mark xii.) On this was founded the Gloss of the Corban (see above, xv. 5); and to this our Lord replies, v. 37. 39, from Deut. vi. 5, and approves the opinion of the scribe. Mark xii. 33, τὸ ἀγαπᾶν κ.τ.λ. πλεόν ἐστι πάντων τῶν δλοκανωμάτων καὶ τῶν θυσιῶν,—more than all the burnt-offerings and the sacrifices prescribed, as I well know, in the Law.

37. Ἐφῆ αὐτῷ Ἰησοῦς] So E, F, G, H, K, M, S, V, and others, not δ δὲ Ἰ. εἶπεν αὐτῷ.

38. Αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ μεγ. κ. πρώτη] So B, D, L, Z, and other MSS. and ancient Versions, among which the Syriac Cureton; and this appears to be preferable to the reading αὕτη ἐστὶ πρώτη καὶ μεγάλη.

39. ὁμοία] Like unto it in amplitude and largeness, inasmuch as it is the root out of which all Laws of duty to men-ward have grown, as out of the former all Offices of Religion toward God. Hooker, I. viii. 8.

40. ὅλος ὁ νόμος κρέμαται κ. οἱ προφῆται] All the Scripture hangs. On νόμ. κ. πρ., as equivalent to the whole Scripture, see vii. 12; xi. 13. κρέμαται in sing. and after νόμος, the reading of B, D, L, Z, Vulg., Syr. Cureton, &c., seems preferable to the other reading κρέμονται at the end of the sentence. The Lawyer had asked what was the great commandment in the Law. Our Lord recites the commandment on which hangs all the Law, and the Prophets besides.

44. Εἶπεν ὁ Κύριος] i. e. Jehovah said to Adonai. (Ps. cx. 1.)

ἀν θῶ τοὺς ἐχθρούς σου ὑποπόδιον τῶν ποδῶν σου; ⁴⁵ Εἰ οὖν Δαυὶδ καλεῖ αὐτὸν Κύριον, πῶς υἱὸς αὐτοῦ ἐστι; (²²⁶/_{II}) ⁴⁶ Καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐδύνατο αὐτῷ ἀποκριθῆναι λόγον· οὐδὲ ἐτόλμησέ τις ἀπ' ἐκείνης τῆς ἡμέρας ἐπερωτῆσαι αὐτὸν οὐκέτι.

Cp. Ps. ii. 4, where for Adonai the Chaldee Paraphrase has מֵימְרָא (meyimra), the Eternal λόγος, or WORD of God; from root מִרַר (amar), dixit. Cp. Acts ii. 34, where St. Peter applies the same prophecy to Christ; and see on John i. 1.

CH. XXIII. 2. Ἐπὶ τῆς Μωϋσέως καθέδρας ἐκάθισαν] they sat (i. e. were placed by authority), and continue to sit on Moses' seat, Μωϋσέως καθέδρας. Observe the alliteration מֹשֶׁה מֹשֶׁבֶת (moshab mosheh); ἐκάθισαν, the aorist, denoting continuance; comp. εὐδόκησα, iii. 17, they were installed and now sit, i. e. they are invested with official authority, as Teachers (Luke iv. 20. John viii. 2. Matt. xxvi. 55) and as Judges. Cp. Exod. xviii. 13. Matt. xxvii. 19.

And as far as they speak in the name of Moses, and in conformity with his doctrine, they are to be revered and obeyed. See above, xvi. 6—12, and S. Aug. (in S. Joann. Evang. Tract. xlv. 6): Multi quippe in Ecclesiâ commoda terrena sectantes Christum tamen prædicant, et per eos vox Christi auditur: et sequuntur oves, non mercenarium, sed vocem PASTORIS per mercenarium. Audite mercenarios ab Ipso Domino demonstratos: Scribæ, inquit, et Pharisæi cathedram Moysi sedent: quæ igitur dicunt, facite; quæ autem faciunt, facere nolite. Quid aliud dixit, nisi, per mercenarios vocem Pastoris audite? Sedendo enim cathedram Moysi legem Dei docent: ergo per illos Deus docet. Sua verò illi si velint docere, nolite audire, nolite facere. Quod enim facit facit, non prædicat de cathedrâ Christi: inde lædit unde mala facit, non unde bona dicit.

Hence also an argument may be derived for the Integrity of the Hebrew Text of the Old Testament. Our Lord refers His disciples to the Scribes as the Guardians of the Sacred Volume. He recognizes it as existing in their hands. Cf. Lud. Viv. in Aug. De Civ. Dei, viii. 39: "Scribæ erant, qui sacrorum librorum literam docebant, nec ab eâ recedebant latum culmum." If the Scribes and Pharisees had tampered with the Sacred Text, such a sin on their part would never have passed unrebuked by Christ. He does censure them for making it of none effect by their Traditions (xv. 3). But He never utters a syllable of remonstrance against them as if they had corrupted the Text itself. Hence we may safely infer that it was faithfully guarded by them. Indeed, from the vast number of Synagogues, and of copies of the Old Testament read every Sabbath, in every part of the civilized world, it was impossible for any one, even if he had desired it, to introduce any alteration into the Sacred Text of the Old Testament.

The Pharisees had conspired with their enemies the Sadducees against Christ, as Herod and Pontius Pilate were made friends at the crucifixion. But what more meek and benign than Christ! He had been tempted by the Pharisees; and yet to maintain the honour of the Priesthood and the dignity of its name He exhorts the people to submit to them, not in regard of their works, but their doctrine (as far as it was taught from the chair of Moses, i. e. consistently with the Law of God). (Jerome.)

δ. πλατύνουσι—φυλακτήρια] they make broad their Phylacteries. The texts of Scripture embroidered on the Phylacteries, called Tephillim, from Tephillah, prayers; amulets of parchment which were braced with leather thongs over the arms, the heart, and the eyes (Exod. xiii. 9. 16. Deut. vi. 4—10; xi. 18—20). Cp. Joseph. Ant. iv. 8. Hieron. in Ezek. xxiv. 17. Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. p. 1743. Goodwin, Moses and Aaron, i. 101. Lightfoot, i. 944. Jahn, Archæol. § 319.

— μεγαλύνουσι τὰ κράσπεδα] they enlarge the Fringes of their garments. The κράσπεδα (tsitsith) differ from the φυλακτήρια, being attached as fringes, of purple, to the garment (Numb. xv. 38. Deut. xxii. 12); whereas the φυλακτήρια were parchment-strips bound over the arm, &c. with strings. See Jahn, Arch. § 122.

γ. ῥαββί] רַבִּי, My Master. Rabbi, from root רַב, rab = great; as Magister from magnus, μέγας.

δ. μὴ κληθῆτε] Let not this be your ambition to be so called. — εἰς—ὁ διδάσκαλος] So Tischendorf and Alford for εἰς ὁ καθηγητὴς, and, it seems, rightly. There is but one, the only Magister or Teacher, who inspires all true Wisdom and enables you to receive it. He Who is the Wisdom of God. Cp. S. Augustine's Treatise de Magistro (i. 187), in which this argument is handled.

ε. καὶ πατέρα μὴ καλέσητε] and call not any one father upon earth. These prohibitions are to be understood from the practice of the Pharisees, who did not teach the people to look up to God, the sole Author of all good, but, in their ambitious desire of human glory and worldly titles, drew off the homage of the people from God to themselves, and usurped His place in the popular mind. Cp. 2 Cor. i. 24. James iii. 1. 1 Pet. v. 3.

That man may be said to call no man father upon earth, who does all his actions as in God's sight, and the language of whose life is, "Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy Name!" (Cp. Origen.)

ιθ. καθηγητὴς] guide. The Pharisees claimed to be guides, (Rom. ii. 19), and are called ὀδηγοὶ τυφλοῖ, blind guides, by Christ (xv. 14; xxiii. 16 24), a warning to those who encroach upon the province of others in exercising spiritual direction—ἀλλοτροποῖσκοποι (1 Pet. iv. 15), and particularly to those who usurp dominion over the Conscience of others, or submit their own Conscience unreservedly to the will of others. See Bp. Sanderson, vol. iv. 62; de Conscient. Prel. iii. § 67.

— ὁ Χριστός] the Christ. Our Lord now began to use the word Χριστός in speaking of Himself. (See xvi. 20. Mark ix. 41.) In the Gospels, when the word stands alone or with Ἰησοῖς, except in such cases as Matt. i. 1, Mark i. 1, John i. 17; xvii. 3, it generally has the article, but in the Epistles it is generally without the article.

The declaration that Christ alone is their Master and Guide is a plain declaration of the Divinity of Christ. St. Paul says, "Who is Paul, who is Apollon, who is Cephas? are they not Ministers or Servants, not Masters?" (1 Cor. iii. 5.) He means that we ought to know Him Whom we call Father, above all; God, the great cause of all Teachers and Fathers. And by adding

11. Ὁ μείζων] The greater: perhaps with reference to the meaning of the word Rabbi, see on v. 7. If a man is greater than the rest, let him prove himself to be really so, by making himself less.

13. Οὐαὶ] Woe! Used by the LXX for the Hebrew וָאִי or וָאִי. Our Lord had begun with Eight Beatitudes (Matt. v. 3—11). He now concludes with Eight Woes.

These dreadful denunciations, pronounced by the meek and lowly Jesus, the "Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," with stern severity and awful solemnity, as from a judicial tribunal, on those very persons, the chief powers of Jerusalem, who were about to bring Him as a lamb to the slaughter, and to arraign Him before the judgment-seat of the heathen Governor of Judæa, display in majestic grandeur the fearful transactions of the day of Universal Reckoning, when He who was crucified on Calvary will appear as supreme Lord and Judge of all on His great white Throne, and be seen face to face by all who have pierced Him with their sins, and will pronounce sentence of eternal weal or woe on every man.

— ὑποκριταί] hypocrites. He repeats this word seven times here (vv. 13, 14, 15, 23, 25, 27, 29). On the term Hypocrisy applied to the Pharisees, not only as deceiving others, but as deluding themselves, being blinded by their evil passions; whence they are called blind guides (v. 16; see also vv. 24, 26), see Bp. Butler's Sermon, on Jan. 30, and note in Christian Institutes, iii. pp. 48, 49, and see notes below on 1 Tim. iv. 2.

— καὶ προφάσει] And this ye do,—making long prayers for a pretext (Phil. i. 18) of religion; that is, ye add hypocrisy to rapacity, and therefore will receive greater damnation.

— περισσώτερον] "Qui bono abutitur ad malum ornandum magis judicatur." (Beng.)

15. προσήλυτον] a proselyte. The word used by LXX for Hebrew גֵּר (ger), from גָּר (gur), commorari (Exod. xii. 48, 49; xx. 10, and passim), and applied specially in our Saviour's time to the two classes of converts to Judaism, i. e. (1) the Proselytes of the Gate, גֵּרֵי תַּרְמִי, who were not circumcised; and (2) the Proselytes of Righteousness, גֵּרֵי צְדָקָה, who were circumcised and also baptized. Cf. Jahn, Archæol. § 325.

On the uses of Proselytes in the propagation of the Gospel, see below, Introduction to the Acts of the Apostles, p. xvii.

— υἱὸν γεέννης] son of gehenna, or hell. Cp. υἱὸν ἀπωλείας [John xvii. 12. 2 Thess. ii. 3]. So ἡνὲν γᾶ (hen maveth), "son of death," i. e. "spiritu inferni commotum et alios ad infernum secum trahentem, et dignum poenis inferni, iisque afficiendum." Cp. above on ix. 15, and on John xvii. 12.

— διπλότερον ὑμῶν] twice as much a child of Hell. Hence we may infer degrees of punishment hereafter proportioned to degrees of sin. (Origen.) So Aug. Sermon 161, 4: "Duse habitationes sunt, una in igne eterno, alia in regno eterno: ibi omnes cruciabuntur, minus ille, plus ille." He then cites x. 15 and this text, and adds, "alii duplo alii simplio." See above on x. 15.

The Pharisees made proselytes for their own advantage; and these proselytes, seeing the vices of those who converted them under a semblance of piety, became worse than before, and even than their masters (cp. Jerome). Or because, having seen your sins, they relapse into heathenism, and become worse than before.

18. τῷ δώρῳ] their own gift, counted by them in their own self-righteousness of more worth than the divine honour.

23. ἀποδεκατοῦτε] ye tithe, i. e. pay tithe of—see Luke xviii. 12. "ἀποδεκατοῦν, verbum Alexandrinæ dialecto proprium, respondet Hebr. תְּעָדָה, significat hoc loco decimas dare, Gen. xviii. 22, τὴν δεκάτην τελείν, ut dixit Joseph. Ant. iv. 4. Judæi sacerdotibus dare debebant decimas omnium frugum, vid. Lev. xxvii. 30. Num. xviii. 21. Deut. xiv. 22. Phariseorum ii, qui non ex sacerdotum ordine erant, ut inprimis sancti et pii adversus Deum viderentur, hanc legem diligentissimè observabant, ita ut etiam decimas minutissimorum olerum, quæ vulgo decimarum non solebant, religiosisimè persolverent. Neque Jesus hanc eorum religionem vituperat, sed perstringit eorum simulationem, quòd negligerent virtutes, quarum studium et exercitatio longè majoris momenti esset." (Kuin.)

Mint, anise, and cummin are the seasoning of food, and not the substance. Our Lord approves the observance of what is least, but commands to keep what is chief, that is, "judgment, mercy, and faith."

24. διῦλίζοντες] The Vulgate rightly renders it excolantes, straining out, straining off. In Amos vi. 6, the LXX have πίνοντες διῦλισμένον οἶνον, i. e. drinking wine so carefully strained and filtered that no unclean animalcula could find their way into it so as to be swallowed by them. Buxtorf, *Lex. ^{27.} κεκονισμένοις] whitewashed. κοιλία, "calce dealbatis." So τοῖς κεκονισμένοις (Acts xxiii. 3). Cp. Demosth. 36, 16; 689, 24. Pococke, i. 154, and Weststein here. Graves were usually whitewashed at that season, i. e. in the month Adar (March), (cp. Lightf. and Schoettgen,) in order to guard persons from contracting pollution by proximity to the dead, see Numbers xix. 16.

The ceremonial ordinances of the Law were instituted for the sake of the moral law, i. e. for mercy and judgment; so that the former were of no use without the latter. He speaks thus to show, that even before the Gospel, these ceremonial ordinances were not the main requisite, but were subordinate to moral duties. And this is what the ancient Prophets often teach, e. g. Hos. vi. 6. Micah vi. 8. We ought to be Temples;—how often are we but Tombs! (Chrys.)

^{29.} τάφους—μνημεῖα] Ye build their tombs and adorn their monuments, but ye do not imitate their example; ye disobey their precepts, and slight their warnings, and rebel against their God, Who has sent to you His Son, to Whom all the Prophets bear witness. And thus ye show yourselves the children of those who killed the Prophets, and are even worse than your fathers, because ye add hypocrisy to impiety. Woe, therefore, to you Hypocrites!

^{30.} ἡμεθα] "Pro ἡμεν in pluribus et optimis codd. h. l. et paulo post legitur ἡμεθα, quam Imperfecti formam recte in textum receperunt Griesbachius et Matthæi. Attici enim veteres raro dixerunt ἡμεν pro ἡν, sed Alexandrina et communis dialectica hanc Imperfecti formam sibi tanquam propriam vindicavit. vid. Jos. v. 1. Neh. i. 4. ii. 11. Matt. xxv. 35 al. Moeris: ἡν, ἀντὶ τοῦ ἡμεν, Ἀττικῶς ἡμεν, Ἑλληνικῶς." (Kuin.) Cp. Winer, p. 74, and below on xxv. 35.

^{31.} ὥστε μαρτυρεῖτε] ye bear witness against yourselves that ye are the children of those who killed the Prophets. Them, who killed the Prophets, ye call your Fathers; and rightly, because ye imitate their acts; and are therefore their children. Cp. v. 45. Rom. iv. 11, 12.

He therefore identifies them with their fathers, and charges them with their fathers' sins. See v. 35, ὃν ἐφονεύσατε, ye killed even Zacharias. Cp. John vi. 32, "Moses gave you not," &c.

^{34.} Διὰ τοῦτο] There is a remarkable similitude between this passage and 2 Esdras i. 28—33. (Beng.) (Cp. Luke xi. 49.)

—μαστιγώσετε ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς] See on Acts xxvi. 11.

^{35.} Ζαχαρίου υἱοῦ Βαραχίου] Zacharias son of Barachias. Cf. Luke xi. 51.

Among the various opinions that have been adduced concerning this Zacharias, the most probable is, that our Lord refers to the Zacharias who was the son of Jehoiada the Priest, and was slain by command of King Joash, whom he had rebuked for his sins, and for those of his subjects. That Zacharias was slain in the court of the House of the Lord, or as our Lord describes it "between the Temple and the Altar," that is, in the Court of the Priests, between the Porch of the veds and the brazen Altar of burnt-offering; and when he died he said, "The Lord look upon it and require it." (2 Chron. xxiv. 20—22.)

The books of the Chronicles being regarded as the conclusion of the Historical Canon of the Old Testament, and the sum and colophon of all Jewish History ("Instrumenti Veteris Epitome," says S. Jerome ad Paulin.), our Lord in citing the history of the Martyrdom of Zacharias from that Book, and in going backward from it to the Martyrdom of Abel, as recorded in the Book of Genesis, comprises all Jewish History as narrated in the Inspired Canon of the Old Testament (cp. Bp. Cosin on the Canon, p. 13), and therefore combines the "Acts and Sufferings of all the Martyrs," whose blood "crieth from the ground" to God, as did that of Abel and Zachariah. (Gen. iv. 10. 2 Chron. xxiv. 22.)

The dying words of Zachariah were זָכַרְתִּי אֶת־יְהוָה and זָכַרְתִּי (darash) = ζητέω, Lev. x. 16. Deut. xii. 5. 1 Chron. x. 13. Those words therefore of the martyr seem to be prophetic of our Lord's allusion to his Martyrdom; and our Lord (in Luke xi. 51) appears to refer to those dying words, ναὶ, λέγω ὑμῖν, ἐκζητηθήσεται.

The words of Zachariah were spoken in the Temple where his blood was shed. Our Lord is the true Zacharias (from זָכַר, zachar, recordatus fuit, and יְהוָה, Jehovah), or Remembrancer of God, and He is the true Son of Barachiah (from בָּרַךְ, barak), benedixit, and יָה (jah), or son of the Blessed (see Mark xiv. 61), and He takes up those words of Zacharias in the Temple, and predicts its doom.

Kuin. well says, "Jesus igitur, ut significaret omnes cædes hominum sanctissimorum, easdemque crudelissimas, ut Lucæ verbis utamur, ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου, a Judæorum majoribus commissas, nominavit primam, maxime memorabilem, cædem in literis sacris commemoratam (sc. Abelis), et ultimam cædem, ad aras perpetratam, nempe Zachariæ. Altare etiam nocentibus, nisi atrocissimè deliquissent, asylum et tutela erat. vid. Exod. xxi. 14. 1 Regg. i. 51. ii. 28 sqq. Sic neque nos tangunt ea, quæ observant alii, Zachariam nimirum non fuisse ultimum prophetarum a Judæis interfectorum, Uriam quoque prophetam jussu Joiakimi trucidatum esse, coll. Jer. xxvi. 21 ss. 2 Paral. xxxvi. 4 ss. sed, quod probè notandum, non interfectus est ut Zacharias μεταξύ τοῦ ναοῦ καὶ τοῦ θυσιαστηρίου."

But it may be asked, why does our Lord not call Zachariah Son of Jehoiada? Why does He call him the Son of Barachiah?

Because probably Jehoiada was also called Barachiah. For numerous instances of persons with two names among the Jews, see Grotius here. Surenhus. p. 92. Glass. Philol. Patrii. de Evang. ii. p. 43.

And because, as Abel 'the righteous,' the good shepherd, slain by his brother Cain, was a type of Christ (Heb. xii. 24), so Zacharias, in his name, his priestly office, his preaching, and in his death, was a type of Christ Himself. The words, 'Son of Barachiah,' mean 'Son of the Blessed,' and this was a name of Christ Himself (see Mark xiv. 61). Barachias (says Jerome) signifies 'Blessed of the Lord,' and the righteousness of Jehoiada the Priest is expressed by this Hebrew word. And in the Gospel used by the Nazarenes we find 'Son of Jehoiada,' instead of 'Son of Barachias.'

Our Lord has just been uttering maledictions against the hypocrisy of the Scribes and Pharisees; and He now intimates that they who suffer for the truth are children of "the Blessed," and that He Himself Whom they were about to put to death as accursed,—for, cursed is he that hangeth on a tree (Gal. iii. 13. Deut. xxi. 23), is the 'Son of the Blessed,' and had been typified in His testimony and His sufferings by all the Martyrs of the Old Testament, from Abel to Zacharias, the Son of the Blessed ; and that His own murder would be the crowning sin which would fill up the cup of God's wrath to the brim, and make it overflow with vengeance upon them. And He concludes with saying that they should not see Him till they acknowledge Him to be 'the Son of Barachias,' and say, "BLESSED is He that cometh in the Name of the LORD" (see v. 39). For an interesting inquiry into this text, see Dr. Jackson on the Creed, book xi. ch. xliii. vol. xi. p. 256—287. Lightfoot, i. 2040 ; ii. 237. 436. Thilo, Codex Apoc. N. T. lxiiv.

³⁶ ταῦτα πάντα] all these things shall come upon this generation. See on xxiv. 15. It may be asked why the blood of Abel and Zachariah, which was not shed by the Jews of that generation, should be required of it? Because they, who in their conduct to the Apostles imitated Cain and Joash, are considered as one and the same generation with them. (Jerome.)

Our Lord encouraged and comforted His disciples, by showing them that whatever they might suffer, no less had been suffered by saints of old. And He warned the Jews, by predicting that as the persecutors of the ancient Saints were destroyed, so would they be punished also. They who see how others have been chastised for sin, and yet commit the same sin, or worse, will suffer worse punishment than those whose examples they have been permitted to see, and which they wilfully follow. (Chrys.)

³⁷ Ἱερουσαλὴμ, Ἱερουσαλὴμ] O Jerusalem, Jerusalem. This repetition of the name marks intense love. (Chrys.)

— ποσάκις] how often! For Christ came to the Jews in Moses and the Prophets, and in the Angels themselves, ministering to their salvation in every age. (Origen.)

— ὄρνις τὰ νοσσία] as a hen gathers her chickens. Not only because He would have covered her with His Wings, but (as Aug. says, Serm. 264) "quia gallina propter infirmitatem pullorum ipsa infirmatur, et infirmatur cum pullis, et Dominus propter infirmitatem nostram et Ipse susceptione carnis infirmari dignatus est." Cp. 2 Esd. i. 30.

He derives the image from the bird who most loves her offspring, and from the language of the Prophets and Psalms, which speak of the people being safe under the wings and feathers, i. e. the providence and protection of God. Ps. xvii. 8 ; lvii. 1 ; lxi. 4 ; xcī. 4. What Christ then prophesied has already come to pass ; who can deny it? And as surely will His other prophecies be fulfilled. As surely as, according to His prophecies, Jerusalem has been destroyed, so surely will He come again to judgment. (Chrys.)

³⁸ ὁ οἶκος ὑμῶν] your house, particularly the Temple ; your holy House, which was God's House, but is now become your house, by being made by you to be 'a den of thieves ;' that is now left to you, being deserted by God. See on xxiv. 15, and above, xxi. 13.

The Veil of the Temple was about to be rent in twain ; and though after the Ascension the Apostles still resorted to it for prayer, yet in fact the virtue of the daily sacrifice ceased at the Crucifixion (Dan. ix. 27), when the Type was merged in the Antitype, and when the Jewish Temple became the Cenotaph of the Law, and the Christian Church was made the Oracle of God.

³⁹ Οὐ μὴ με ἴδητε] Ye shall not see Me henceforth. You shall not know Me, before you welcome Me as the Messiah, and adore Me as God. You may crucify Me as Man, but that is because you are blind, and because ye see Me not as I am. And now for your sins ye are smitten with blindness. The things that belong to your peace are hid from your eyes. Luke xix. 42. But in order to see Me, you must look at Me with the eye of faith ;

you must worship Me as God. And this will be, when with broken hearts and weeping eyes, you "look on Him Whom you have pierced." Zech. xii. 10. Hos. iii. 4, 5. John xix. 37. On the phrase ἀπ' ἄρτι see xxvi. 64.

— Εὐλογημένος—Κυρίου] Blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord. The solemn salutation of the Messiah (Ps. cxviii. 26. See xxi. 9). A reference to the name Barachias, mentioned v. 35.

What He says is this,—Unless ye repent, and confess Me, of whom the Prophets wrote, as the Son of God Almighty, ye shall not see My face. The Jews have now time given them for repentance ; let them confess Christ to be the Blessed One Who cometh in the Name of the Lord, and then they will see His face. (Jerome.)

The Jewish Nation has ceased to be God's household ; and remaining in the obstinacy of unbelief, they will not behold Christ till they bless Him coming in the name of the Lord. (Hilary.) When the veil is taken from their hearts, they will see Him. 2 Cor. iii. 14—16.

CH. XXIV. 1. τὰς οἰκοδομὰς τοῦ ἱεροῦ] the structures of the Temple, whose solidity and magnificence is described by Josephus, B. J. v. 5. Antiq. xv. 14.

As Bengel observes, the word οἰκοδομὰς intimates that the work of building was even then going on (cp. John ii. 20). "Fortasse magis opus fervebat, ob Pascha instans." While they were building it, He was prophesying its destruction. The Corner-stone was rejected by the Builders (Ps. cxviii. 22), and they built in vain ; for "except the Lord build the house, their labour is but lost who build it" (Ps. cxvii. 1).

Because our Lord had just said to the Jews, "Your house is left desolate," therefore the Apostles, surprised by such an announcement, came and show Him the buildings of the Temple ; as if in doubt whether so much glory could fade. He therefore proceeds to predict its entire destruction. Ye are surprised at the announcement—but not one stone will be left on another. The Apostles appear to have then supposed that the day of Jerusalem's destruction would be the day of His Second Coming. They imagined this would be so because He had said, "Ye shall not see Me henceforth, till ye say Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (xxiii. 39). But our Lord corrects this notion by saying, "The end is not yet" (xxiv. 6).

On former occasions, Jerusalem had been restored from time to time, and the Temple had been rebuilt ; but He now predicts that the next destruction would be total. (Chrys.)

3. τοῦ ὄρους τῶν ἐλαιῶν] the Mount of Olives. Observe, that the Siege began at the place where this prophecy was delivered, i. e. the Mount of Olives (see Josephus, B. J. v. 2 and 3). Cp. the interesting comments of the History of the Siege of Jerusalem in Eusebius, H. E. iii. 5—8, with the notes of Valesius.

Observe also, that the Siege began at the time in which this prophecy was uttered, the Passover. (Josephus, B. J. vi. 9. 3.)

Observe, likewise, that many hundreds were destroyed by the same death as they were now about to inflict upon Christ, viz. Crucifixion. (Ibid. v. 11.)

Titus, the son and successor of the Roman Emperor Vespasian, regarded himself as the executioner of God's Judgment on Jerusalem. The destruction of the Temple was a more striking fulfilment of Christ's prophecy, because it was effected by Roman soldiers in opposition to the orders of Titus, who wished to spare it. And the woes with which Jerusalem was visited were more remarkable, as being brought about by the agency of one who was distinguished for clemency, and was called "delicie humani generis."—Vespasian, his father, who began the Jewish war, seems also to have been specially raised up by God to be the minister of his purposes against Jerusalem; and it is observable that he alone of the Roman Cæsars was permitted to bequeath the Empire to his sons. — πότε ταῦτα ἔσται; καὶ τί τὸ σημεῖον τῆς σῆς παρουσίας, καὶ τῆς συντελείας τοῦ αἰῶνος;] when shall these things be? and what is the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the world? Here is the clue to the interpretation of this chapter. Our Lord's prophecy has a double reference,—

To the judgment of Jerusalem. And

To that of which that judgment was a type, viz. His second Coming to judge the world.

The Apostles, indeed, then supposed that the taking of Jerusalem, and the end of the world, and Christ's coming to judgment, would be simultaneous (cf. v. 6);

It is to be observed, that several Future Events, however distant from each other, seem to be represented by Prophecy as contemporaneous, till one of those events is near, and detaches itself from the others, and then the true sense of the Prophecy becomes more clear.

Future events in time may be compared to distant objects in place. In a mountainous country, two ridges of hills, rising the one above the other, are seen in the horizon almost as one, although there may be many miles between them; and it is only when the spectator arrives at the summit of the first ridge, that he is aware of the chasm between it and the second.

So it is with Future Events.

The Prophets of the Old Testament pass rapidly from describing the first Advent of Christ to the Second Advent, so that the two Advents seem to be blended together in one.

But when the predictions concerning the first Advent had been accomplished by the manifestation of Christ in the world, then the prophecies concerning the Second Advent became more distinct.

Yet even then the coming of Christ to judge Jerusalem seemed to be blended with His coming to the Universal Judgment, of which the judgment of Jerusalem was a type, and is so treated by Himself in the present Chapter.

It is only in the Scriptures written after the taking of Jerusalem (viz. the Revelation of St. John) that the transactions of the Great Day stand forth alone in all their awful majesty.

And as there is a gradual process of clearing up in the prophecies concerning the coming of Christ, so is there a similar process of elucidation in the successive prophecies concerning the coming of Antichrist. And there is reason to believe that the prophecies concerning the coming of Antichrist will be brought to a climax at about the same time as those concerning the coming of Christ.

5. ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου] in My Name. Not eis τὸ ὄνομα (see xviii. 20), but ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι,—i. e. standing upon it, and usurping it. See note on v. 11.

6. πάντα] all that I predict.

— οὐπω ἐστὶ τὸ τέλος] the end is not yet. Cp. Mark xiii. 7. 10. Luke xxi. 9. Our Lord, therefore, did not predict (as some have ventured to say) that He would come again to judgment immediately. He said the contrary, as here; nor did His Apostles afterwards. See 2 Thess. ii. 2.

7. λιμοὶ καὶ λοιμοὶ] famines and pestilences. See Tertullian, Apol. 20.

8. ἀρχὴ ὧδίνων] Observe the word ὧδίνες (pains of parturition) as very appropriate and significant; because the circumstances of the World on the eve of Christ's coming will be like those of a woman in travail (see 1 Thess. v. 3), and because after them the New Creation will be born,—the παλιγγενεσία will ensue. (See xix. 28.)

Lest the disciples should be absorbed in dwelling on the punishments in reserve for the Jews, and suppose that they themselves would be exempt from suffering, our Lord warns them of coming woes and trials for themselves (v. 9 and 12), and thus stimulates them to watchfulness and courage. And in order to show that the calamities which would overtake the Jews were divinely-appointed judgments for their sins, He specifies not only wars, but famines and earthquakes; and adds, "Verily I say unto you, all these will come upon this generation,"—i. e. for their cruelty to Himself. And lest the Apostles should imagine that the Gospel would be imperilled by these calamities, He says, "Be not terrified" (Chrys.); the Gospel shall be preached to all Nations.

The signs of which our Lord here speaks are to be understood both literally and figuratively; there will be famines of bread, and also spiritual famines; famines of "hearing the Word of God." (Amos viii. 11.) So also with regard to pestilences and earthquakes there will be false teachers, "whose word eats as doth a canker" (2 Tim. ii. 17), and commotions of the world, and the falling of many from the faith. (Jerome.)

11. ψευδοπροφῆται] false Prophets. Cp. v. 24. Here was one main cause of the miseries of the Jews. They had killed the true Prophet and the true Christ, Who had come for their salvation; and, for a retribution for their sin, they were deceived by false prophets and false Christs, to their own destruction. See Acts v. 36; xxi. 38. Joseph. B. J. ii. 13. 4; vii. 11. 3.

They rightly expected that the Messiah would appear at this time; and that He would come to His Temple, for so the prophets had foretold; but they knew Him not; and because they expected the Messiah and had not known Him, they were more easily deluded by impostors professing to be Christ; and they imagined it impossible that Jerusalem should ever be taken by the Romans, and even to the last believed that the Messiah would interfere to save them and to destroy their enemies.

12. τὴν ἀνομίαν] lawlessness. Cf. Zech. v. 8, where the LXX use the word for רִשְׁעָה (risheah), wickedness. Sometimes they use it for שְׁקֵרָה (sheker), falsehood, lying.

In proportion as the end approaches, errors will increase, terrors will increase, iniquity and infidelity will increase, and the darkness of hatred among brethren. S. Aug. (in Joan. xxv.)

— τῶν πολλῶν] of the many—the world.

15. "Οταν οὖν ἴδητε τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως, τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ Δανιὴλ τὸν προφήτου, ἑστὸς ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ] When ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place: τόπος ἅγιος is the ὡρ (kodesh), i. e. "the Holy Place" (Exod. xxvi. 33; xxviii. 29. 35, and passim), viz. the vads, or part of the Temple where the Golden Altar of incense, &c. stood, and called makom, or place κατ' ἐξοχήν, in Isa. xxvi. 21, rendered by the LXX τὸ ἅγιον.

βδέλυγμα, or abominatio, is the Hebrew שְׁקֵט (shekets), which signifies an unclean thing (Lev. vii. 21; xi. 10. 13. 41, 42), and is specially applied to denote an object of idolatrous worship (1 Kings xi. 5. 7. 2 Kings xxiii. 13. 2 Chron. xv. 8), or an act of uncleanness and idolatry (Jer. iv. 1; xiii. 27. Ezek. v. 11).

ἐρημωσις, or desolation, is the Hebr. שְׁמָמָה (shemamah), which signifies a devastation that causes astonishment and awe.

βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως is a Hebraism which expresses that the characteristic quality present to the speaker's mind when He contemplates the Abomination, is that it will cause Desolation. On this use of the genitive see above, xxii. 11.

The Prophet Daniel speaks of such a desolating Abomination, in three passages (ix. 27; xi. 31; xii. 11), which appear to refer to three different times; as follows,

His prophecy concerning the setting up of "the abomination of desolation" in the holy place, was doubtless fulfilled in the first instance by the setting up of the idol statue of Jupiter in the Temple of Jerusalem, by Antiochus Epiphanes; cp. 1 Macc. i. 54, where that idol is expressly called βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον.

But the reference to Daniel made by our Lord in this His prophecy concerning Judæa and the World, shows that Daniel's prediction was not yet exhausted, but was to have a further accomplishment

In Jerusalem,

And also in the Church at large.

With respect to Jerusalem, Christ says, that the Abomination which would make the Temple desolate, or be the cause of its being deserted and destroyed, would stand in "the Holy Place." Cp. Mark xiii. 14. θρονὸς οὗ δεῖ.

It cannot therefore mean the Roman armies. The passage in Luke xxi. 20, speaking of Jerusalem encompassed with armies, refers to a different circumstance. He here speaks of an abomination in the Holy Place of the Temple itself.

Our Lord also says that it should be a sign and warning to His disciples that they should escape. "Then let them that be in Judæa flee to the mountains" (v. 16).

The passage in Daniel which appears to refer to the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, and to have been specially in our Lord's eye, is ix. 27, וְיָבִי אֶת הַבְּרִית וְיִסְּרֹף אֶת הַמִּזְבֵּחַ. The LXX and Theodotion paraphrase this as follows: καὶ, ἐπὶ τὸ ἱερὸν, βδέλυγμα τῶν ἐρημώσεων. Some interpret this, "the desolator shall come on the abominable wing;" but it seems that the word 'desolator' is put in apposition with the abominable wing, and describes its character, and that the sentence is to be thus paraphrased: And it (i. e. God's wrath) shall be upon the Wing of Abominations that maketh desolate, and shall flow out or be poured out upon the desolator.

This is our Lord's interpretation of the passage, when He speaks of the Abomination of Desolation.

This prophecy of Daniel first speaks of the cessation of the daily sacrifice; and it proceeds thus: "and God's wrath will be poured out upon the wing of abominations which will be the desolator."

This seems to be further described in Dan. xii. 11, which speaks of the taking away of the daily sacrifice, and of the abomination that maketh desolate being set up, where the LXX and Theodotion use the words afterwards employed here by St.

Matthew, βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως. Their original here is עוֹשֶׂה יִשְׁמָה, i. e. the abomination that maketh desolate.

The prophecy of Daniel concerning the taking away of the daily sacrifice in the midst of a week was doubtless fulfilled by Christ's death on the Cross, at the end of his ministry of three years and a half.

But it seems to have had another fulfilment in another sense. The daily sacrifice was taken away in the siege of Jerusalem (see Joseph. B. J. vi. 2), three years and a half after the beginning of the war; and this was done by the factious zealots among the Jews themselves, headed by John, who had seized the Temple under plea of defending it and the city. (See Joseph. B. J. v. 6. 1, and v. 3. 1; cp. Antt. x. 11. 7.)

What, then, is the Wing of abomination that maketh desolate, or, in our Lord's words, the Abomination of Desolation?

A Wing (Hebr. canaph) is an emblem of covering, and defence, and love (see Ps. xvii. 8; xxxvi. 7. Ruth ii. 12); and God's presence rested in the Temple, in the Holy of Holies, on the Mercy-seat, upon the Ark, between the Wings of the Cherubim. (Exod. xxv. 20; xxxvii. 9. 1 Kings viii. 7.)

Hence the figure of a Wing is often applied to the Shechinah, or Divine Presence, by other Jewish writers. See Schoettgen, p. 208; e. g. "Nidus est Templum, Israelitæ sunt pulli quibus mater insidet, et gentiles conversi sub alas Shechinæ venisse dicuntur."

And just before our Lord delivered this prophecy, He had said, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, but ye would not!" (Matt. xxiii. 37.)

It is observable that he adds, as a consequence of their refusal to be gathered under His wings, "henceforth your house," i. e. specially your Temple, is left unto you ἐρημος, desolate." Your Holy House; that House of which He had said (xxi. 13), "My house shall be called the house of Prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves;" ye have polluted it, made it to become abominable; that Holy House which was once the House of God, but being made a den of thieves is now οἶκος ὑμῶν, your house, the house of you, is left to you desolate, being deserted by God (see Theoph. on Luke xiii. 35); it is a camp of assassins (ἀσπράλ, Joseph. B. J. v. 13), the scene of robbery and blood. (See on Matt. xxi. 13.)

Therefore the Abomination of Desolation, or, as the prophet Daniel calls it, "The Wing of abomination that would make desolate," is that Power to which the Jews, in their trouble and in the Siege, looked for shelter, instead of taking refuge under the Wings of the Cherubim and the Wings of Christ.

Our Lord prophesies here, that this abominable and desolating Wing would be in the Temple, in the Holy Place (Matt. xxiv. 15. Mark xiii. 14).

Now, we find that in Holy Scripture the word Wing is often used for a military power, on account of its rapid flight, whether for aggression or defence, and because it is, as it were, overspread to shelter those for whom it fights. See Isa. viii. 8. Jer. xlviii. 40; xlix. 22; and Ps. xci. 4, concerning the Lord of Hosts.

Hence, also, in other languages, the wings of an army. The desolating Wing, therefore, of which Daniel and our Lord speak, is that Army of Zealots and Assassins, whom the Jews invited to defend them against the besieging Army of the Romans, and under whom they took refuge and shelter, and which stationed itself and hovered and brooded, as it were, with an abominable wing over the Holy Place during the Siege, and defiled it with all manner of abominations; by whose agency the daily sacrifice ceased and was taken away (see Dan. ix. 27. Josephus, B. J. vi. 2; x. 11. 30); and which, by its outrages against God, and by its provocation of His wrath, was the cause of the desolation of Jerusalem.

Josephus appears to confirm this interpretation; for he remarks (B. J. iv. 6. 3) that there was an ancient saying then current, that Jerusalem would be taken and the Temple destroyed when it had been defiled by the hands of Jews themselves. And this exposition of Daniel's prophecy concerning the siege of Jerusalem, was adopted even by the Zealots who defiled the Temple under pretence of defending it. (Joseph. B. J. iv. 6. 3. Cp. Hengstenberg, Christol. 708, 709.)

The Jews themselves were the proper authors of their own miseries. "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself" (Hos. xiii. 9).

The same principle is applicable to Christian Nations. Their Abomination of Desolation has always been from within.

The interpretation to which these considerations lead is also confirmed by what Christ had just said concerning Zacharias, the son of Barachias. The Jews had profaned the Temple with his innocent blood (xxiii. 35. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21). And all the evils here mentioned were to come on this generation. And fitly; because they were guilty of more than the same sin—in defiling the City with the innocent blood of Christ, “the Son of the Blessed.”

The Jews had refused to shelter themselves under the Wings of the Lord of Hosts, and under the Wings of Christ; where they would have been secure from their enemies, for He would have “defended them under his Wings, and they should have been safe under His Feathers” (Ps. xci. 4). “The Wing of abominations” (Dan. ix. 27) overwhelmed not the city of Jerusalem, until Christ had long laboured in vain to gather them under His Wings as a hen gathereth her chickens” (Mede, p. 298). But they would not have Jehovah for their God; they killed the Prince of Peace; and chose to flee for refuge to the wings of those who changed God’s Holy House into a Den of Thieves; they made them to be, as it were, their God, their Idol, their βδελυγμα; and they, whom they thus preferred to God, were therefore not an Army of Defence, but an Abomination of Desolation.

In the Christian Church, the prophecy of our Lord concerning the setting up of an Abomination of Desolation in the Holy Place appears to have been in part fulfilled by the setting up of the Bishop of Rome upon the Altar of God in St. Peter’s Church, in order that, there sitting, he may be adored—on his inauguration to the Papacy, and by the “gross and grievous abominations” (Hooker) of his heretical doctrines and idolatrous worship which he enforces as terms of communion, and so, as far as in him lies, makes the Church desolate. The Apostle speaks of this abomination of desolation in the Church, when he describes the Man of Sin as sitting in the Temple of God. See below, the notes on 2 Thess. ii. 3.

The word “abomination” in Scripture means an idol; and it is called “of desolation” because the temple is made desolate thereby; and the presence of idols in the Church deprives it of the presence of God.

By “abomination of desolation” we may understand, in a spiritual sense, perverse doctrine: “Abominatio hæretice perverseque Doctrinæ in Ecclesiâ.” S. Jerome, iv. 194. 204.

And when we see this heretical abomination standing in the holy place, that is, the Church, and showing itself as God, we ought to flee from Judæa to the mountains, that is, the everlasting hills, where is the light of God.

We ought also to be upon the house-top (i. e. for prayer and meditation), where the fiery darts of the wicked cannot reach us, and not to come down from thence, nor to turn back for those things which we have left behind. And we ought to meditate in the spiritual field of Holy Scripture, that we may reap fruit therefrom. (Jerome, Hilary, Bede, on Mark xiii.)

15. Δανιὴλ τοῦ προφήτου] Our blessed Lord, the Divine Prophet, here gives the title, “the Prophet,” to Daniel; and condemns by anticipation all who, like Porphyry in ancient times, and some in modern, either reject the Book of Daniel, or ascribe it to another and later author than he. On the genuineness of the Book of Daniel see also Bp. Butler’s Analogy, ii. c. 7. Dr. Mill’s Dissertations, ii. pp. 64—72, in reply to Strauss, and the Works of Hengstenberg, Hävernicks, and Dr. Tregelles on this subject.

—ἐστὸς] On this form see Winer, p. 73. Cp. Mark xiii. 14.

—ὁ ἀναγινώσκων νοεῖτω] let him that readeth understand. Probably a reference to the words of the Angel to Daniel (ix. 25), “Know therefore and understand.”

16. φευγέτωσαν] let them flee. Not only those in Jerusalem, but they in Judæa were to fly. Before the siege, the Christians fled to Pella beyond Jordan, and so were saved (see Euseb. iii. 5. Epiph. Hær. 29, 30); whereas, on the contrary, many hundreds of thousands of Jews resorted to Jerusalem (against our Lord’s warning, Luke xxi. 21) for protection and for the Passover. See above, v. 2, and the summary in Euseb. iii. 5, and his remarks.

This warning was very necessary, for after that the λησται and στασιασταί had for some time established themselves in the Holy Place, they would not allow any one to quit the city. (Josephus, B. J. v. 12.)

17. μὴ καταβαίνετω] let him not come down. But let him flee without any regard to his goods, i. e. with all expedition.

For the spiritual meaning of this and the following verse, see on Luke xvii. 31.

18. τὰ ἱμάτια] his pallium, or outer garment.

19. ταῖς ἐν γαστρὶ] those women with child. See Josephus, B. J. v. 10. 12, 13; vi. 3. Euseb. iii. 6, 7, for the horrors of the siege—especially with regard to mothers and children. Cp. Deut. xxviii. 53—58.

These prophetic warnings may also be understood spiritually. Woe unto them that are with child, i. e. loaded with a heavy burden, and not able to escape from their pursuers. Woe also to the souls which are yet in travail with the rudiments of faith. (Jerome.) Woe to them that are with child: by these we may understand persons who are loaded with worldly hopes; and by those who give suck, persons who enjoy, cherish, and dote on the darling hopes and desires which they have conceived and brought forth. (Aug. in Ps. xxxix.)

20. σαββάτω] on the Sabbath. A prophecy that this would be the case with some. He speaks to them as yet as Jews who scrupled to travel more than 2000 cubits on that day. See on Acts i. 12. Similarly (Luke xxii. 36) He speaks of buying a sword,—not that the Apostles of Christ were to go armed,—but to show the dangers to which they would be exposed.

Besides, even though they themselves might have no scruple to travel on the seventh day, yet others would be unwilling to assist them in their flight on that day, on which the gates of cities in Judæa were shut. (Cp. Nehem. xiii. 19—22.)

On the spiritual sense of vv. 19, 20, see Jerome, iv. 193. Greg. M. Hom. i. 12: “Videte ne tunc queratis peccata vestra fugere, quando jam non licet ambulare. Ne tunc queramus ad bene agendum vivere, cum jam compellimur de corpore exire.”

Pray that your flight may not be in the winter or on the sabbath, i. e. that you may not be embarrassed by earthly impediments. (Aug. Qu. Ev.)

As far as this refers to the taking of Jerusalem, this might well be their prayer, that they might not be prevented by the law of sabbatical rest or winter’s cold from fleeing to the mountains. And spiritually, we must pray that our faith may not grow cold, and we ourselves become torpid in doing the work of the Lord; and that our flight, i. e. our death, may not happen when we are in this unhappy state of spiritual winter. (Jerome, Aug., Hilary.)

21. θλίψις μεγάλη, οἷα οὐ γέγονεν] great tribulation, such as never has been: as Josephus confesses, B. J. v. 10. 5.

22. ἐκολοβώθησαν] were shortened. So in the time of Christ’s absence in the grave, “the three days” were compressed, as it were, into the smallest possible compass. See xii. 40.

From various passages of Holy Scripture it has been inferred that the Church will have to suffer three years and a half of severe suffering, before the end of the World. See Bede here.

—οὐκ ἂν ἐσώθη πᾶσα σὰρξ] no flesh should have been saved. A double Hebraism, οὐ πᾶς = none (Ps. cxlii. 2. Jer. ix. 12; li. 43. Luke i. 37). Rom. iii. 9, οὐ πάντως: iii. 20. ἐξ ἔργων νόμου οὐ δικαιωθήσεται πᾶσα σὰρξ. See Vorst. Hebr. p. 529. Schroeder. Inst. Hebr. p. 316. Glass. Phil. Sacr. p. 463. Winer, p. 154.

And on the use of σὰρξ = ἄνθρωπος for homo, Vorst. de Hebr. 124.

—διὰ δὲ τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς] on account of the elect. Lest any should object, as the heathens did, that these calamities were due to Christianity, He says that those days of affliction should be shortened for the sake of Christians; and if it were not for these Christians, all the nations would perish.

Observe, that the Evangelist St. John has recorded none of these predictions, lest he should seem to write prophecy from history; for he lived for a long time after the destruction of Jerusalem. But these prophecies are recorded by the Evangelists who wrote before the taking of Jerusalem, and saw nothing of what they wrote; in order that the splendour of the prophecy might shine forth more brightly. 26. Ἰδοὺ ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ] Behold! in the desert. Our Lord passes from the destruction of Jerusalem to the times a little preceding His own Second Advent. And these prophecies are addressed not only to the Apostles, but to us. He declares the characteristics of that future coming, which will not be like the first coming at Bethlehem, in a corner of the world known only to a few, but glorious and universal. Among the tokens of His approach will be signs and wonders of Deceivers. He is here speaking of Antichrist and his ministers. And observe, He does not say,—Go out, and believe not, i. e. be not misled by those false wonders. But, Go ye not out after them; for there is great delusion where are the signs of delusion. But these signs will be only local. The wonder of Christ's presence will be universal. It will be like lightning, which requires no preannouncement, but shows itself to all who are sitting in houses and secret chambers, in the twinkling of an eye. (Chrys.)

If any would persuade you that Christ is to be found in the wilderness of incredulity or sceptical Philosophy, or in the secret chambers of Heresy, believe them not; the faith of Christ shines from east to west in the Catholic Churches of the world. It is absurd to look in a corner for Him Who is the Light of the World. (Jerome.)

Our Lord teaches us that He Himself is not limited to any particular place, or visible only to certain individuals, but that He is like lightning shining from East to West. And lest we should be ignorant where to look for Him, He proceeds to add, that wheresoever the Body is, the Eagles will be gathered together. He calls His saints Eagles, soaring, as it were, to Him, the Body, by a spiritual flight. (Hilary.) See note on v. 28.

By the "secret chambers" and the "desert" our Lord signifies the obscure and occult conventicles of Heretics; by the name of "the lightning," He may designate first, the manifestation of His Church, by which He now comes and shows Himself in the clouds and darkness of this world (Aug. Quæst. Ev.), and secondly, His coming to Judgment.

A very interesting Exposition of this and the succeeding prophecies will be found in S. Aug. Epist. 199, and in his Work de Civitate Dei, lib. xx.

28. ὅπου γὰρ ἐὰν ᾦ τὸ πτώμα, ἐκεῖ συναχθήσονται οἱ αἰετοί] for wheresoever the body is, there will the eagles be gathered together. Our Lord had been warning them not to follow false Christs, either to the wilderness or to the secret chamber. And He adds that wherever the πτώμα or dead body is, there the eagles will be congregated. That is, as keen as is the sense of Eagles for their prey, so sharp-sighted will be true Christians to discern, and flock to, the body of Christ.

He calls Himself here πτώμα, and He also calls Himself σῶμα in the parallel passage of St. Luke xvii. 37. The reason is, Christ saves us by His death. His body is σῶμα (ὁ σώζει), because it is πτώμα (ὁ πίπτει). The corn is not quickened except it fall into the earth and die (John xii. 24), and then it brings forth much fruit. By His fall we rise, by His death we live. Christ's πτώμα is our σῶμα. And here is an answer to the objection which has been made to our Lord's saying, viz. that Eagles do not feed on dead bodies. But to Christ's Body, which is Himself, in His Church, His Word, His Sacraments, especially the Holy Communion, where He feeds the faithful with His Body (Bp. Andrewes quoted below, on 1 Cor. v. 8)—all who are the Eagles of the Gospel will be gathered together; as the Eagle hasteth to its prey (Job ix. 26); they will flock to Him with Eagles' wings (Deut. xxxii. 11); and they that wait upon Him shall renew their strength, and mount up with wings as Eagles (Isa. xl. 31), even to heaven itself.

The following may be cited in support of the above exposition:

The congregated Eagles are the assembly of Saints and Martyrs. (Chrys.) Christ is called the Great Eagle (Rev. xii. 14), and Christians are compared to Eagles, because they partake in the royalty of Christ. (Cp. Origen here.) Eagles are the Saints whose youth is renewed like the Eagles' (Ps. ciii. 5); and who, according to the saying of Isaiah (xl. 31), mount up with wings as Eagles, that they may ascend to Christ. (Jerome.) In Christ we are renewed like Eagles, and cast off the plumage of our old age (i. e. of the old man). (Ambrose on Luke xvii.) Christ's Body crucified is that of which it is said, 'My flesh is meat indeed' (John vi. 55). The Eagles, which fly on the wings of the Spirit, flock to this body. To this body the Eagles are gathered who believe Christ to have come in the flesh (1 John iv. 2). They fly to Him as to a dead body, because He died for us, so all the Saints fly to Christ wherever He is, and hereafter, as eagles, will be caught up to Him in the clouds. (S. Aug. Quæst. Ev. in loc. Theophyl. and on Luke xvii. and in Euthym. Zyg. in Luc. xvii. 37. Greg. Moral. xxxi. 53.) And as the Eagle bears its young on its wings, so the true children of Christ will mount with Him on Eagles' wings to heaven. Deut. xxxii. 11. Exod. xix. 4. 1 Thess. iv. 17, and note on 2 Thess. ii. 1. Chrysostom, who, on 1 Cor. x. 24, applies this text to the eager hunger and thirst with which the Eagles of the Gospel flock to Christ's Body and Blood in the Holy Communion of the Lord's Supper, in order that they may thence derive strength to soar to heaven.

Eagles are said to catch the scent of a body even across the ocean, and to fly to it. How much more ought we and all the flock of believers to hasten to Him Whose light shines from East to West! By the term "body," or, as it is in the original, πτώμα, or dead body, we may understand the death of Christ, to which we are all called. (Jerome.)

Ἀετοὺς γὰρ ὠνόμασε τοὺς δικαίους ὡς ὑψηλοὺς ταῖς ἀρεταῖς καὶ βασιλικούς, σῶμα δὲ Ἐαυτὸν ὡς συναγωγὴν τῶν τοιοῦτων ἀετῶν· πτώμα δὲ τὸ σῶμα ἔγραψεν ὁ Ματθαῖος, on which nearly the same words are repeated by Euthymius, adding, that Christ is τροφὴ πνευματικὴ τῶν τοιοῦτων ἀετῶν καὶ ζωὴ αἰώνιος. (Euthym. Zygab. in Luc. xvii. 37.)

Ὅπου τὸ πτώμα,—τούτ' ἐστίν, ὅπου ὁ νῦν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, ἐκεῖ πάντες οἱ ἅγιοι οἱ κοῦφοι καὶ ὑμπετεῖς—ὥσπερ σώματος νεκροῦ κείμενον πάντες οἱ σαρκόβόροι ὄνρεις ἐπ' αὐτὸ φέρονται,—οὕτω καὶ τοῦ νῦν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου τοῦ δι' ἡμᾶς νεκρωθέντος καὶ ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ φανέντος πάντες οἱ ἅγιοι συναχθήσονται. (Theophyl. in Luc. xvii.)

The modern notion that Jerusalem is the πτώμα, and the æroli the Romans, has been rightly rejected by Meyer, p. 398.

29. Εὐθὺς] "Non ad nostrum computum, sed divinum, in quo dies mille sicut unus dies." Ps. xc. 4. 2 Pet. iii. 8. (Glass. Phil. Sac. p. 447.) Hence the whole interval between the first Advent and the second, is called in the Scriptures the last time (cp. 1 John ii. 18. Acts ii. 17. 1 Cor. x. 11. Phil. iv. 5. Heb. i. 2. James v. 8. 1 Pet. iv. 7), ἐσχάτη ὥρα, and the Judge is described as at the door. So it is also in the mind of the Church. For example, in the Creed, after "He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty," we say immediately, "from thence He shall come again to judge the quick and the dead." So the Holy Ghost writes. And we ought to read Prophecy with the same mind as that with which it is written.

The euthēws is connected with what has immediately preceded, which by many of the Fathers (e. g. Chrys.) is regarded as a description of the Antichristian persecution in the last days, immediately before the second Advent of Christ.

Besides, observe, ἐκεῖναι,—those days, i. e. those great days of trial, whenever they may be, as ἡμέρα ἐκείνη is that Day, that great Day, the Day of Judgment, whenever it may be. 2 Thess. i. 10.

and from v. 34, that our Lord represents His second coming as immediate, not merely neglect all these considerations, but contradict the express words of Scripture. See v. 6. 2 Thess. ii. 2. 2 Pet. iii. 8, 9.

— ὁ ἥλιος σκοτισθήσεται] the sun shall be darkened. See Mark xiii. 24, and on Luke xxi. 25. Rev. vi. 12; viii. 12. These Prophecies appear to have a double sense,

First, to describe commotions and woes at Jerusalem, and the signs physical and political before its destruction. (Joseph. B. J. vi. 5. 3. Euseb. iii. 8.)

And secondly, troubles, alarms, and defections in the Church before the End. The sun shall be darkened,—i. e. the solar light of Christ's Truth shall be dimmed, the lunar orb of the Church will be obscured by heresy and unbelief, and some who once shone brightly as stars in the firmament of the Church, will fall from their place.

30. σημεῖον τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου] the sign of the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven. Unbelieving men ask Me for a sign from heaven (xii. 38; xvi. 1), they shall then see one, and mourn at the sight. It is supposed by some that this sign will be the cross. The sign of the Son of Man is the cross shining more gloriously than the sun. Christ comes to judgment bearing his wounds, and showing the manner of his ignominious death, that sin may be self-condemned. Then the tribes of the earth will wail because they pierced Him whom they ought to have adored (Zech. xii. 10. John xix. 37), and did not profit by his death for them. He mentions the Cross to be revealed hereafter in glory, that His disciples may not be ashamed of the cross here. (Hilary, Jerome, Chrys. Cp. Bp. Taylor on Christ's Advent to Judgment, vol. v. p. 12.) They ask for a sign from heaven,—they shall then see Me coming from heaven.

— φυλαὶ τῆς γῆς] the tribes of the earth. The children of this world as contrasted with those of heaven. So in Rev. xi. 10, "they that dwell on the earth" are they who dote on earthly things, and have not their hearts, their treasure, and their conversation, in heaven. (Cp. Jerome.)

31. τοὺς ἀγγέλους] See Rev. vii. 1.

32. Ἀπὸ δὲ τῆς συκῆς] from the fig-tree. Though these are heavenly things, yet you may learn wisdom concerning them from a common shrub on earth.

— τὴν παραβολήν] its parable,—the parable it is designed to teach. Thus our Lord reminds us, that every thing on earth, however lowly, has to attentive minds its appropriate moral—its parable—concerning the kingdom of heaven. See Matt. vi. 28.

— γένηται ἀπαλός] is now become tender.

33. ἐγγὺς ἐστίν] He is near, and even at the door. See v. 30; cp. James v. 9. There is something solemn in the brevity of the phrase, without the nominative expressed.

34. ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη] this generation. This, like most other expressions in this prophecy, has a double sense, as follows:

First, relative to Jerusalem, destroyed by Christ coming to judge it about forty years after this was said,—and

Secondly, to the world at large;

As to the first, He affirms that the generation of the literal Vol. I.

Israel then living would not pass before the woes here predicted would fall on Jerusalem;

As to the second, He declares that the spiritual Israel, "the generation of them that seek the Lord" (Ps. xxiv. 6, where γενεὰ is used by LXX. So Ps. lxxiii. 14, γενεὰ τῶν υἱῶν σου), would not pass away,—i. e. that the faithful seed of Abraham would survive, and that the blessings of the Gospel would be preserved intact, notwithstanding all trials and afflictions of the Church, even to the End.

The generation of the Church will survive the world; but all other generations, especially that of the tribes of the earth, will pass away. (Origen.)

The generation of the faithful, notwithstanding all the afflictions which He has described, will remain constant even to the end. (Cp. Matt. xvi. 18.) Our Lord says, "heaven and earth shall pass away," to show that His Church is dearer to Him than the elements, whose Lord He is. She is more precious in His eyes than any creature; for all the creation will be dissolved, but the Church will remain unimpaired. (Chrys. Theophyl. on Luke xxi. Mark xiii.)

Christ's words have been already fulfilled in great measure. From what is past, let us learn to believe the future. (Chrys.)

36. ὥρας] See Rev. ix. 15.

— ὁ Πατήρ μου μόνος] The Father only knows that day; an assertion which does not exclude the Son of God from that knowledge, as the Agnostæ imagined. Christ does not know it as Man, and it is not His office to declare it, as Son of God. See on Mark xiii. 32.

By saying that the Angels do not know it, He checked the disciples from desiring to know it. He knew that they would be inquisitive concerning it, and restrains their curiosity. The times and seasons are in the Father's own power, and they are not therefore for the Son to reveal. It is in this sense only that He says that they are not known by Him. (Chrys. citing Luke x. 22.)

The Arians say, that the Son cannot be equal with the Father, if the Son does not know what the Father knows. To whom we reply, that by the Son all things were made (John i. 3); and therefore all times are made by Him, and all things are delivered to Him of the Father (Matt. xi. 27), and all the treasures of wisdom are hid in Him (Col. ii. 3). And when He says, it is not for His Apostles to know the times and seasons which the Father has put in His own power (Acts i. 7), He intimates that He Himself knows them; but it is not expedient for the Apostles to know them, in order that, being always uncertain when the Judge will come, we may so live every day, as if we were to be judged on that day. (Jerome: see v. 42.)

37. Νῶε] Noë. He thus describes the suddenness of His coming. So the Apostle, 1 Thess. v. 3, 4. But how is it, that He speaks of the tribulation of those days, and yet compares them to two periods of luxury? Because such will be the condition of the world; there will be great excess, and surfeiting, and debauchery, and insensibility, imaginary "peace and safety," and yet great tribulation, especially to the godly, as Noah and Lot. Such will be the times of Antichrist. (Chrys.)

40. Τότε δύο] Men may make the same profession of faith, but with different hearts. The mill represents the world of secular labour; the house-top a life of contemplation; the field a spiritual office in the Church. Aug. Ps. xxxvi. cxxxii. Quæst. Ev. See below on Luke xvii. 34—36.

From all ranks of life some will be taken, and some left. (Chrys., who compares Exod. xi. 5.)

Men may labour side by side in the field, but not be rewarded together at the Harvest. Let no one, therefore, plead his profession as an excuse for sin. (Jerome.)

Observe the present tense (παραλαμβάνεται) in these prophecies—denoting Certainty.

42. Γρηγορεῖτε] Watch ye. For such as you are at your death, such will you be at the day of judgment; and therefore, since Death is near, Judgment is near; therefore, watch.

45. πιστὸς δούλος καὶ φρόνιμος] Called οἰκονόμος by St. Luke, xii. 42; and these sentences specially concern the οἰκονόμοι, or stewards of Christ's Mysteries,—the Bishops and Pastors of the Church. See S. Ambrose on Luke xii. 48, and Theophyl. on Luke xii. 42. Observe, ὁ π. δ. κ. φ.; faithfulness is prudence.

Our Lord is speaking here concerning the proper use of worldly substance, and of reason, power, graces, and all other talents committed to each man's trust. These words are specially applicable to Civil Rulers, who ought to use all that they possess, whether wisdom, or office, or riches, for the general weal. Hence He requires of them prudence and fidelity. He speaks also to the Clergy, and to the Rich. If, when the Clergy spend large sums for Christ, you are not willing to make your offerings, where will be your excuse at the great day? On the other hand, He speaks of rewards to the wise and faithful servant. He will set him over all His goods. Who can conceive the blessedness of such an exaltation? (Chrys.)

The layman is a steward of his property, in the same way as the priest is, who dispenses the offerings of the Church. As the priest is not at liberty to scatter as he chooses what you offer for the poor, neither are you justified in so dealing with your own wealth. For, although you received it as an inheritance from your parents, yet all your wealth is the property of God. And if you exact from others an account of your offerings to them, will not God require with much greater strictness from you a reckoning of His bounties? Do you suppose that He will tolerate waste there? No! what He has committed to you, He has entrusted on this condition, that you should give to others their meat in due season. He has confided it to you in love, as an occasion for the manifestation of your own love, and that He might thus kindle the love of man for man, and make it burn more warmly. (Chrys.)

He here warns you of the severe punishment due to uncha-

ritableness and self-indulgence. Do you imagine that you have any thing of your own? No! what you have, you hold in trust for the good of the poor. Could not God immediately take it from you? Yes; but He graciously lends it to you that you may gain eternal glory by charity. Think not, therefore, your property to be yours; but give to God His own. He hath lent it to you as a talent, that you may trade with it for Heaven. Nothing more offends Him than neglect of our brother's salvation. Thus we forfeit our own. God will be wroth with the evil servant, and command him to be cut asunder; for God makes love the characteristic of His own disciples: and if a man really loves, he will have a tender care for the things of Him whom he loves. Chrys., who quotes John xxi. 15. Rom. xv. 2, 3. 1 Cor. x. 24; xiii. 3. Phil. i. 23, 24, as inculcating the duty of zeal for the salvation of others.

48. Χρονίζει (ὁ κύριος) My lord delayeth. On the temper of mind to be cherished with regard to these prophecies, concerning the Second Advent, see S. Augustine's admirable Epistle (ccxcix.) to his brother bishop, Hesychius, deserving the careful attention of all students of prophecy. "Veniet dies" (he says, Sermon. xlii.) "quo cuncta adducuntur in Judicium. Et ille dies, si sæculo longè est, unicuique homini, vitæ suæ ultimus, prope est. Utrumque latere Deus voluit. Vis non timere diem occultum? Cum venerit, inveniat te paratum."

51. διχοτομήσει] See 1 Sam. xv. 33. 2 Sam. xii. 31. 1 Chron. xx. 3. Dan. ii. 5; iii. 29, "supplicium in διψήχους conveniens" (Bengel), and for those who make divisions. And yet it cannot mean "utterly destroy," or annihilate; for he is described afterwards as having his part with hypocrites, where is that dreadful weeping, and that endless gnashing of teeth.

CH. XXV. 1. παρθένοις] virgins. 1—13. On this Parable, see Greg. M. in Evan. i. 12.

Our Lord proceeds to inculcate still further the need of communicating to the spiritual and temporal good of others. The Virgins must have oil in their lamps. (Chrys.)

By the Virgins He means all in the Visible Church; by the wise who have oil, those who have faith and works; by the foolish who have lamps but no oil, those who seem to confess God with the same faith as the wise, but do not maintain good works. (Jerome.)

They are called Virgins, because the souls of Christians are espoused in baptism as chaste Virgins to Christ (2 Cor. xi. 2), and wait for the coming of the Bridegroom from heaven, Rev. xxii. 17.

— eis ἀπάντησιν τ. ν.] to the meeting of the bridegroom. On these nuptial rites, see Jahn, Archæol. § 154. Judges xiv. 11. Ps. xlv. 15; cf. Isa. lxi. 10.

Christ is the Bridegroom, see on ix. 15. John iii. 29. ³ λαμπάδας—ἐλαιον] Λαμπὰς in the N. T. as in LXX, often signifies a torch (see John xviii. 3. Rev. iv. 5; viii. 10); but here it appears to signify a lamp (so Vulg.), and cp. Acts xx. 8.

The lamps being probably of earthenware (terra cotta), fitly represent men, who are οστράκινα σκεύη, earthen vessels (2 Cor. iv. 7), and yet have the treasures of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, the pure and holy oil (1 John ii. 20. 27) of spiritual grace, which, duly cherished, sheds forth the light of good works (2 Pet. i. 3—8), which are the fruit of the Spirit, for the glory of God (Matt. v. 16). "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, even so saith the Spirit, for their works do follow them" (Rev. xiv. 13). Their lamp never goes out, but burns more brightly in Paradise, where they wait in patience and joy, like wise Virgins, for their Lord, till He comes from heaven, to lead His Bride to the Marriage. Rev. xix. 7; xxi. 2. 9; xxii. 17. Cf. Greg. Nazian. Or. xl. pp. 728, 729.

The following is from S. Hilary. The Bridegroom is Christ. Oil is the fruit of good works. The Vessels are our human bodies, within which we ought to have the treasure of a good conscience. The wedding feast is the commencement of a glorious immortality. The delay of the Bridegroom is the time of repentance. The sleep of those who wait is the rest of believers, and the temporary death of all, in the time of repentance. The shout at midnight is the uncertainty of the last trump. The taking of the lamps is the resumption of our bodies. Their light is the manifestation of good works. The wise Virgins are they, who have the opportunities given them of working out their salvation, and have prepared themselves for the coming of their Lord. The foolish are they, who have only thought of present and worldly things, and have made no provision for the Resurrection, when no one will be benefited by the works of another. Every one must provide oil for his own lamp.

⁶ Μέσης δὲ νυκτός] Suddenly, as it were at midnight, when all are in a sleep of security, the Advent of Christ will be proclaimed by the shout of angels and the sound of the trump. It is a tradition of the Jews that the Messiah will come at midnight, as the destroying Angel came to the Egyptians. (Jerome.)

— νυμφίος] the bridegroom. "Christus, die judicii tanquam fur in nocte" (Greg. M.)—ἔρχεται is not found in some MSS. (B, C*, D, L, Z) and Versions, and may perhaps be a subsequent addition.

⁸ αἱ λαμπάδες ἡμῶν σβέννυνται] our lamps are going out. There is some extenuation and equivocation in these words; as if their lamps were only then just going out.

The foolish Virgins represent persons who die in a careless condition, and their lamps were gone out, and now it was too late to ask for oil: "Excesserat emendi tempus, nec adveniente die judicii locus erit poenitentiae." (Hieron.)

⁹ Μήποτε οὐ μὴ ἀρκέσῃ ἡμῖν καὶ ὑμῖν] Let there be not sufficient for us and you. Non possunt in die judicii aliorum virtutes aliorum vitia sublevare. (Hieron.)

No one in the other world will be able to be an advocate for those who are delivered up for judgment by their own works. No one, however charitably disposed, will plead for us then, not because no one will be willing, but because no one will be able. This is what Abraham intimates in the parable (Luke xvi. 26). And although after our death we ourselves may be charitably disposed, as the rich man was for the salvation of his relations, this will be of no avail. He had neglected the beggar at his gate in his lifetime, and he could do nothing for his brethren or himself after his death. (Chrys.)

— πορ.] δὲ is added by Elz., but is not found in A, B, D, E, G, H, K, S, V, Δ, and other MSS.

¹³ Γρηγορεῖτε οὖν] Watch therefore. As our Lord says, Luke xii. 35, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning, and be ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord." Semper extremum diem debemus metuere, quem numquam possumus praevidere. (Greg. M.)

— ὅτι οὐκ οἴδατε τὴν ἡμέραν] for ye know not the day. Latet ultimus dies, ut observentur omnes dies. (Aug.)

— ἐν ᾗ—ἔρχεται] Omitted by A, B, C*, D, L, X, Δ, and some other MSS. and Versions.

¹⁴ ἄνθρωπος ἀποδημῶν] a man travelling. Christ, in leaving this world at His Ascension, gave gifts to men (Eph. iv. 8), and now in Heaven dispenses talents to each severally, of which, when He comes again, He will require an account.

Compare the Parable of the Pounds (Minæ), Luke xix. 11—28, and the notes there. Some of the most remarkable points of difference between these two Parables are as follows,

That of the Talents was spoken to the disciples;

That of the Pounds to the Multitude, when they drew near Jerusalem, and thought the kingdom of God should immediately appear, and that our Lord would immediately display Himself as King of the Jews.

In the Parable of the Talents, all men are represented as slaves (δούλοι) of Christ, called simply ἄνθρωπος, and among them He distributes His goods; and they who do not improve His gifts, but bury them in the ground, are cast out into outer darkness.

In that of the Pounds, Christ, here called an ἄνθρωπος ἐγγενής, selects ten servants who are contrasted with His πολῖται—the citizens of this world, who hate Him, and oppose His claims to the Kingdom; and the judgment of the unprofitable servant who hides his pound in a napkin, and the reward of the faithful who remain steadfast in their Lord's absence, notwithstanding the opposition of the world, is combined with the destruc-

21. Ἡ Εἶπε] Some MSS. add δέ.
 — ἐπὶ ὀλίγα—ἐπὶ πολλῶν] Observe the change of case, from an accusative to a genitive; the former indicating a relation of trust extending to a thing; the latter, a condition of supremacy over it.

24. θερίζων—διεσκόρπισας] A Hebrew proverb (see Vorst. p. 822).

διασκορπίζω is the Hebrew רָצַח (paradh), or רָצַח (zarah) (Ruth iii. 2). Chald. רָצַח (berar), 'ventilate,' 'vannare,' to winnow. Dan. ii. 35. The sense here is, "gathering corn into a barn floor whence thou winnowedst nothing."

On this use of σκορπίζω = to winnow, see 2 Cor. ix. 9.

25. φοβηθεὶς] See on Luke xix. 20.

26. ὀκνηρὲ] slothful. ὀκνος = φονὴ πόνων. (Phavorin.)

Observe, it is not only the sinner, who is cast into outer darkness, but he also who does not do good. Nothing is so pleasing to God as edification. Let us listen to the warning while we have time; let us have oil in our lamps, and improve our talents in the salvation of others, and for the glory of God. (Chrys.)

Luke 22. 1.

38. σέ] Thee. Observe, the pronoun is placed before the verb, and is emphatic here and in the two following clauses. It is as much as to say, We may have done these things to our fellow-man, but when wast Thou,—Thou, our King and Judge,—seen by us in this state of need, and relieved by the alms of us, poor miserable sinners. Thy creatures and servants?

So in the answer, ἐμοὶ is placed before ἐποιήσατε. It was even I to whom ye did what ye did to them. And the same collocation is seen in vv. 44—46.

41. τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον] the fire that is everlasting; much stronger than πῦρ αἰώνιον; see on v. 46.

— τὸ ἡτοιμασμένον τῷ Διαβόλῳ] that has been prepared for the Devil.

In verse 34 He describes the joys of heaven as a κληρονομία, or inheritance, prepared for men by God even from the beginning. But the pains of hell are not described as prepared for men, but for the Devil and his Angels. God designs eternal happiness for men; men incur eternal misery by their own acts.

The fire of Hell has been prepared for the Devil and his Angels, but they are not as yet cast into it; see above, vii. 21.

44. σέ] Thee. See v. 38.

46. αἰώνιον] everlasting. The same word is used by our Future Judge to describe the duration of heavenly joys and of hell torments. Cf. Rev. xx. 10. Dan. xii. 2, where the word αἰώνιος is used twice in the LXX as it is here by our Lord. In the original the word olam (עולם) is used twice. Indeed, our Lord's words here are a solemn iteration of those in Dan. xii. 2, πολλοὶ τῶν καθυδόντων ἀναστήσονται, οἱ μὲν εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, οἱ δὲ εἰς αἰσχύνην αἰώνιον. The punishment of hell and the joys of heaven are both of them eternal. (Aug. de Fide et Op. 15; de Civ. Dei, xix. 11; xxi. 3—11. Greg. Moral. xxxiv.)

The word αἰών (as was observed above, xii. 32) corresponds to the Hebrew עולם (olam), which appears to be derived from the unused root עָלַם (alam), to conceal; so that the radical idea in αἰών, as used in Holy Scripture, is indefinite time; and thus the word αἰών comes to be fitly applied to this world, of which we do not know the duration; and also to the world to come, of which no end is visible, because that World is Eternal.

This consideration may perhaps check rash speculations concerning the duration of future Punishments. What the sense of the Christian Church has ever been on this subject we know from its sentiments expressed concerning Origen, who denied their Eternity. Cf. S. Clem. Rom. i. 25. Tertullian, Apol. 18. Minucius Felix, § 35. S. Aug. de Spiritu, c. 56, and particularly ad Orosium contra Priscill. et Origenistas 4, vol. viii. p. 940. Lact. vii. 21. Prosper de Vit. Cont. ii. 12, and S. Hippolytus, Philosophumena, p. 338, and de Universo, p. 221, ed. Fabric., and Dr. Horbery's Treatise on this subject; Works, vol. ii. 7—273, ed. Oxf. 1828.

Depart from me ye cursed, shall the Judge eternal say to all the reprobate, into everlasting fire; and lest any should imagine that the fire shall be eternal, but the torments not, it followeth, and these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal. (Matt. xxv. 41. 46.) Now, if the fire be everlasting by which God punisheth the reprobates, if the punishment inflicted be also everlasting, then must the reprobates everlastingly subsist to endure that punishment, otherwise there would be a punishment inflicted and none endured, which is a contradiction. Nay, the life eternal may as well be affirmed to have an end, as the everlasting punishment, because they are both delivered in the same expression. Bp. Pearson.

Indeed the eternity of that fire prepared for the devil and his angels is a sufficient demonstration of the eternity of such as suffer in it; and the question only can be, what that eternity doth signify. For, because some things are called in the Scriptures eternal, which have but a limited or determined duration; therefore some may imagine the fire of hell to be in that sense eternal, as lasting to the time appointed by God for the duration of it. But as the fire is termed eternal, so that eternity is described as absolute, excluding all limits, prescinding from all determinations. The end of the burning of fire is by extinguishing, and that which cannot be extinguished can never end: but such is the fire which shall torment the reprobate; for he, whose fan is in his hand, shall burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire (Matt. iii. 12. Luke iii. 17); and hath taught us before, that it is better to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire (Matt. xviii. 8), to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched (Mark ix. 43. 45); and hath farther yet explained himself by that unquestionable addition and undeniable description of the place of torments, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. (Mark ix. 44. 46.) And that we may yet be farther assured that this fire shall be never extinguished, we read that the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever (Rev. xiv. 11); and that those which are cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever (Rev. xx. 10), which expression of day and night is the same with that which declareth the eternal happiness in the heavens, where they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy: where they are before the throne of God and serve him day and night in his temple. (Rev. iv. 8; vii. 15.) If then the fire in which the reprobates are to be tormented, be everlasting; if so absolutely everlasting, that it shall never be quenched; if so certainly never to be quenched, that the smoke thereof shall ascend for ever and ever; if those which are cast into it shall be tormented for ever and ever (all which the Scriptures expressly teach), then shall the wicked never be so consumed as to be annihilated, but shall subsist for ever, and be coeternal to the tormenting flames. And so this language of the Scriptures proves not only an effect eternal, as annihilation may be conceived, but an eternal efficient, never ceasing to produce the same effect, which cannot be annihilation, but cruciation only. Bp. Pearson, Art. xii. p. 723. See also notes below on 1 Cor. xv. 26.

transitus, from root פסח (pasah), transiit (Exod. xii. 11). Vocabulum πάσχα est origine Hebraicum, פסח Exod. xii. 11, et prop. notat transitum, transgressum, à פסח, transiit, pepercit, liberavit, unde Symmach. Ex. l. c. vertit ὑπερβασίς et Joseph. Ant. ii. 14. 6 usus est voc. ὑπερβασία.

Deinde πάσχα dicebatur agnus paschalis, quotannis à Judæis die xiv. mensis Nisan, post occasum solis, cum ergo jam esset dies xv. mensis Nisan, comedendus, vid. Exod. xii. 6. Num. ix. 5, agnus paschalis hoc nomine insignebatur, quia cruor ejus, quo imbuti erant postes forium domuum Israelitarum ex Ægypto migratorum, defendebat ab iis cædem, ita, ut angelus mortis, Ægyptiorum primogenitos percussens, Israelitarum domos præteriret; vid. interpp. ad Ex. l. c.

Denique πάσχα nominabatur etiam ut h. l. ipsum Paschatos festum, quod septem diebus, quibus Judæi vesci debebant panibus infermentatis, vid. Deut. xvi. 6. Exod. xii. 18, absoluebatur, unde et festum ipsum vocabatur τὰ ἄζυμα v. 17. ἡ ἑορτὴ τῶν ἄζυμων Luc. xxii. 1. γίνεταί νίμ habet futuri γενήσεται, nostis post biduum Pascha celebrari, etenim γίνεσθαι positum est pro ἄγεσθαι, agitari, celebrari, atque respondet Hebr. נִסְחָן 2 Regg. xxiii. 22, ubi Alex. οὐκ ἐγενήθη τὸ πάσχα τοῦτο. (Kuini.)

Since the sufferings of our Blessed Lord, the Lamb of God, were typified by the death of the Paschal Lamb, a bone of which was not to be broken, and whose blood was to be sprinkled on the door-posts of the houses, that the destroying Angel might pass over them, when he smote the Egyptians and delivered Israel, it is not surprising that some of the Greek and Latin Fathers connected the Passover with the word πάσχα, to suffer, and with the sufferings of Christ, the true Passover, Whose blood reconciles us to God, and saves us from everlasting death, and purchases for us life eternal. Almighty God is the Author of Language, and there may be a superintending providence, and even a prophetic character in its uses; and there seems to be a paronomasia in Luke xxii. 15, ἐπιθυμία ἐπεθύμησα τοῦτο τὸ πάσχα φαγεῖν μεθ' ὑμῶν, πρὸ τοῦ με παθεῖν. The Holy Spirit loves to use this figure in the sacred Oracles. See Gen. ix. 6. 27; xviii. 27; and the numerous other instances of Paronomasia at the close of Dr. Wilson's Bible Student's Guide, Lond. 1850, p. dxcī, and note below on 2 Thess. iii. 11.

After His description of the last Judgment, and of future rewards and punishments, our Lord speaks of His own Passion. Thus He suggests the question, — If such glory is in store for you hereafter, why should you fear present suffering? He does not say, — You know that after two days I shall be delivered to be crucified; but — After two days is the Passover, and the Son of Man shall be delivered, showing that what would take place was a Mystery, a Festival celebrated for the salvation of the World; and that His Passion is our Liberation from innumerable woes; by mentioning the Passover, He reminds them of the deliverance of old from Egypt. Chrys.

He thus showed also that He foreknew all that He suffered; and that He suffered by His own will. (Chrys., and on v. 5.)

3. ἀρχιερέως, τοῦ λεγομένου Καϊάφα] the High Priest who was named Caiaphas. It was necessary to record his name; for the high priests were now frequently displaced by the Romans, and others put in their room. (See Joseph. B. J. xviii. 2.) Annas had been deposed A.D. 14 by Valerius Gratus; then Ismael was appointed; then Eleazar, son of Annas; then Simon; then (A.D. 25) Joseph or Caiaphas, son-in-law of Annas, to the year A.D. 36. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4.)

See further below on Luke iii. 2.

5. Μὴ ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ] Not at the feast. Observe Christ's power over His enemies. If He had not been killed at the Passover, we should not have had the benefit of the argument from the coincidence of time in the offering of the typical Lamb, sacrificed year after year, for nearly fifteen centuries, and the sacrifice of the true Passover, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world. And the Passion of Christ would not have been so exemplary and glorious as it now is, having been consummated in the Jewish capital, when it was most thronged by Jews and Proselytes from all parts.

Oftentimes when they endeavoured to take Him, He escaped from them, for He would not then be taken (John x. 39). But at the very time when they desired not to take Him, viz. at the Passover (cp. Luke xxii. 6), then He willed to be taken, and they, though unwilling, took Him (Euthym.); and so they fulfilled the Types and Prophecies, in killing Him Who is the true Passover, and in proving Him to be the Christ. Cp. Leo, Sermon. lviii. Theophyl. in Marc. xiv. 2.

Observe also: the Jews were accustomed to have executions at the Passover in order to inspire terror into a larger number of people then collected at Jerusalem, and for a salutary example to them. But they now desire to deviate from their usual practice. But God does not allow them to do so — in order that the Death of Christ may be more public and illustrious.

— μὴ θόρυβος] lest an uproar should arise. Not because it was a holy season.

Hence it appears that they had no religious scruples against transacting judicial business at the Passover.

6. Τοῦ δὲ Ἰησοῦ γενομένου] When Jesus was come to, and was at Bethany. Here is an instance of recapitulation. See above on xx. 29. This incident took place some days before our Lord's betrayal, but St. Matthew introduces it here to mark the contrast between Mary and Judas. Judas murmured against her (John xii. 4) because she had bestowed on our Lord the offering of this precious ointment which might have been sold for three hundred pence (Mark xiv. 5), and he sells his Master for thirty pieces of silver, or sixty pence. See xxvii. 3, and on Mark xiv. 3—5.

Bethany, the Place of Dates of Palms: see above, Matt. xxi. 17; hence the βαῖα φοινίκων (John xii. 13) strewed in our Lord's path the following day.

— Σίμωνος τοῦ λεπροῦ] Simon the leper. Not that he was a leper now, but who had been a leper; and perhaps he had been healed of his leprosy by Christ. So Matthew is called the Publican (x. 3), though he had been called by Christ from being a Publican to be an Apostle. Cp. on Mark ii. 26.

7. γυνή] a woman. Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus. John xii. 2—8.

— ἀλάβαστρον] A cruse of alabaster, ἀγγεῖον μυροδόχον. (Euthym.) “Unguenta optimè servantur in alabastris.” (Plin. N. H. xiii. 3.) “Nardi parvus onyx eliciet cadum.” (Horat. Od. iv. 12. 17.) See further on Mark xiv. 3.

8. ἀπώλεια] loss. A fit question for the vids ἀπωλείας, John xvii. 12.

11. ἐμὲ δὲ οὐ πάντοτε ἔχετε] but Me ye have not always. How then could He afterwards say to His Apostles, “I am with you always?” Matt. xxviii. 20. Because He is now speaking of His corporeal presence. See 2 Cor. v. 16. (Jerome.) My Divine Presence will be with you for ever, but you will not always have My human body, which she has anointed.

Can He then be said to be present carnally in the Holy Eucharist, which is to be celebrated in His Church even till He come? (1 Cor. xi. 26.) And may not this saying be designed as a caution against such a notion concerning that Sacrament which He was now about to institute?

12. πρὸς τὸ ἐνταφιάσαι με] to embalm Me; from a divinely vouchsafed presentiment of My death; a reward for her love.

13. εὐαγγέλιον—ὅλῳ τῷ κόσμῳ] When St. Matthew wrote and published this prophecy, the Gospel was not preached in the whole world, and it was not a century old. But it has now been preached for eighteen centuries, and has been circulated in many hundreds of Versions in the principal languages and countries of the world; and in this fulfilment of the prophecy we see an evidence of its truth.

15. ἔστησαν] they weighed. An allusion to the words of the prophet, Zech. xi. 12, "they weighed for my price." See xxvii. 9. — τριάκοντα ἀργύρια] thirty shekels; the price of a slave. Exod. xxi. 32. (Jerome.) Comp. also the sale of Joseph by his brethren, Gen. xxxvii. 28.

Judas wished thus to compensate in part what he thought he had lost by the effusion of the ointment. (Jerome.) See on xxvii. 3.

It has been alleged by some, that what is said of the conduct of Judas in selling his Master for so paltry a sum, is incredible; but they forget that when Satan has entered into a man's heart he triumphs over his victim by infatuating him, and making him sell his birthright for a mess of pottage.

A respectable Roman Catholic Expositor calls this the objection of "many Protestant Interpreters." Arnoldi, p. 500, and see p. 576, "Recent Protestant Expositors pronounce the Gospel account of the sealing of the sepulchre (Matt. xxvii. 66), and the bribery of the soldiers to be legendary, because if it had been true, the women would never have come to embalm the Body." Into what contempt has Rationalism brought the name of Protestant.

17. Τῇ πρώτῃ τῶν ἀζύμων] On the first day of unleavened bread. See on v. 2 and Mark xiv. 12.

They reckon the beginning of the day from the evening. They come on the fifth day of the week. Our Lord ate the Passover, in order to show, even to the end, that He did not contravene the Law. He has no place of His own where to lay His head, and therefore He sends to some persons unknown. (Chrys.)

It therefore appears that our Lord instituted the Holy Communion in unleavened bread. Cp. on v. 20 as to the allegation that we are obliged to conform to His example in all these incidents.

— φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα] to eat the Passover. This and other passages,—xxvi. 19. Mark xiv. 12—16. Luke xxii. 7, 8. 11. 13. 15,—prove that our Lord did not (as some suppose) anticipate the paschal meal by one day. Such anticipation would have been a breach of the Law which He came to fulfil. As Tertullian says (c. Marc. iv. 39), "O Legis destructorem, qui concupierat etiam in Paschâ servare!" (Luke xxii. 7.)

He ate the paschal Lamb with His Disciples on the day prescribed by the Law, i.e. on the 14th of Nisan, in the evening. (Exod. xii. 6. 17, 18. Lev. xxiii. 5. Numb. xxviii. 16. Deut. xvi. 6.)

On the difficulty supposed to arise from John xviii. 28, see the note on that passage.

It may be objected, "Was not Christ Himself the true Passover?" (1 Cor. v. 7.) And being so, why did He eat the Passover, and not suffer as the Passover, on the day appointed by the Levitical Law for killing the Passover, i.e. on the 14th of Nisan, as some say that He did? See Routh, R. S. i. 160. 168, 169; and S. Hippolytus and the Church of Rome, p. 67, 68, note.

Our Lord instituted the Blessed Sacrament in commemoration of His own death on the day when the Lamb was killed; and He spoke of His Body as already broken, and of His Blood already shed for the sins of the whole world. Cp. Theophyl., who says on Matt. xxviii., "Our Lord, when He instituted His Supper, said to His Disciples, 'Take, eat, this is My Body;' so that He may be said to have then offered Himself, for no one eats what has not first been killed." And it is well said by Remigius, "If the Paschal Lamb was a type of Christ, how was it He did not suffer on the day when the Paschal Lamb was killed, —i.e. on the 14th day of the month? The fact is, He did institute the mysteries of His Flesh and Blood on that night, and on that night He was seized and bound by the Jews, and He so consecrated the commencement of His sacrifice."

His agony in the Garden may rightly be called a part of His Passion. The cup of His Passion (v. 39) was then presented to His lips. He suffered then by anticipation. He then said, "My soul is sorrowful unto death" (Matt. xxvi. 38), and, "the Hour is come." Matt. xxvi. 45. Mark xiv. 41. John xvii. 1.

Perhaps also it may be said, that, in a new and special sense, our Lord, in suffering from Thursday at Gethsemane, to Friday on Calvary, fulfilled the command that the Passover should be slain between two evenings. (Exod. xii. 6. Numb. ix. 3; xxviii. 16, 17.)

18. ποιῶ τὸ πάσχα] A Hebraism. See Vorst. p. 163. St. Luke, xxii. 11, has φάγω τ. π.

19. ἡτοίμασαν] they prepared. See Mark xiv. 15.

20. ἀνέκειτο] he reclined,—a deviation from the attitude prescribed Exod. xii. 11, where it is ordered, that the Israelites should eat the Passover with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, and their staff in their hand, and in haste. God had commanded the attitude of standing in the reception of the paschal meal; because the Israelites were then setting forth out of Egypt, as pilgrims to Canaan the Land of Promise, the type of heaven. But the Jewish Church having come to the Land of Promise, and being there at rest, reclined at that festival, and our Lord conformed to that practice.

Here is a proof, that positive commands of a ceremonial kind, even of Divine origin, are not immutable, if they are not in order to a permanent end. See Hooker, III. x. and III. xi. and IV. xi., and Bp. Sanderson, Prælect. iii. vol. iv. p. 54, 55; ii. 159; iii. 285. 301.

As to the allegation of some (among the Nonconformists of the seventeenth century in England) that because our Lord and His Apostles reclined at table, in the institution of the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and because the attitude in reclining in those days was analogous to that of sitting in ours, we ought to receive the communion sitting, and not kneeling, see the excellent remarks of Bp. Sanderson, Prælect. iii. vol. iv. p. 54. Our Lord instituted the Holy Eucharist at a supper, in the evening, but we are not obliged to imitate His example in this particular. See the passages just specified in Hooker and Bp. Sanderson. But, whatever was instituted and ordained by Christ or His Apostles with a view to the conveyance of spiritual grace, and for the attainment of everlasting salvation (e.g. such things as the two Sacraments, the rite of Confirmation, &c.), obliges all men at all times.

— μετὰ τῶν δώδεκα] with the twelve. Cp. Mark xiv. 17. Luke xxii. 14. It is generally supposed by the Fathers, that Judas, whose sin was not yet public, was admitted to partake of the Holy Eucharist. See the authorities in à Lap. and Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, Disc. xix. p. 435, and below on John xiii. 30, and Bengel here, and Williams, Holy Week, p. 420.

21. εἰς ἑξ ὑμῶν παραδώσει με] one of you will betray Me. Observe how tenderly He deals with the traitor. Before supper He washed his feet; and He did not say, he will betray Me, but "one of you,"—in order to give him an opportunity for repentance; and He terrifies them all, in order that He may save one. And when He produced no effect on his insensibility by this indefinite intimation, yet, still desirous of touching his heart, He

23. τρυβλίῳ] the dish. See Ps. xli. 9; lv. 13. The word τρυβλίον had been always used by the LXX for Hebr. קִיכָר (kearah); from root (not used) קָרַר (kaar), 'to be deep;' cp. Lat. trulla.

24. καλὸν ἦν] So Latin "bonum erat;" where we should use the conjunctive. For other examples see 2 Pet. ii. 21, and Winer, p. 253.

25. Σὺ εἶπας] Yes. Exod. x. 29. See xxvi. 64, and Beng. there. Mark xv. 2, σὺ λέγεις.

26. τὸν ἄρτον] the one and same loaf for all; probably one of the loaves provided for the Paschal meal.

He had already prepared them for this action by saying (John vi. 35), 'Εγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἄρτος τῆς ζωῆς; and 51, 'Εγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἄρτος ὁ ζῶν, καὶ ὁ ἄρτος ὃν Ἐγὼ δώσω ἡ σὰρξ μου ἐστὶν ἡν Ἐγὼ δώσω ὑπὲρ τῆς τοῦ κόσμου ζωῆς; and 58, ὁ τρώγων τοῦτον τὸν ἄρτον ζήσεται εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. See the notes at the end of the sixth chapter of St. John.

Besides, this consecration of bread and wine had been already prefigured by Melchizedek, the Priest of the Most High God, the type of CHRIST (Ps. cx. 4. Heb. vii. 1—17) before the Law; who blessed Abraham, and who brought forth bread and wine (Gen. xiv. 18),—the first mention of bread in Holy Scripture. And so, in a certain sense, the mysteries of the Gospel were before the Law,—as the priesthood of Melchizedek, the type of Christ, was before that of Aaron, who was blessed in Abraham (Heb. vii. 7—9) by Melchizedek, and so was inferior to him. Hence S. Jerome thus speaks: "After the typical Passover was over, and He had eaten the flesh of the Lamb with His Apostles, He takes bread, which strengthens man's heart, and passes to the true sacrament of the Passover, in order that as Melchizedek the Priest of the Most High God had done when he offered bread and wine, so He Himself might represent the truth of His own body and blood." See below on Heb. viii. 1—17.

—εὐλογήσας, ἔκλασε] having blessed, He brake. Luke xxii. 19, and 1 Cor. xi. 24, εὐχαριστήσας ἔκλασε, and τοῦτό μου ἐστὶ τὸ σῶμα (for τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ σῶμά μου) τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν κλάμενον.

He brake the bread "post benedictionem; contra transubstantiationem. Accidens enim, quale post benedictionem panem esse volunt, non potest frangi." (Beng.)

On this subject see also Bp. Cosin's Historia Transubstantiationis Papalis. Works, vol. iv. pp. 1—147.

—ἐδίδου] ἐδίδου τὸν ἄρτον, but v. 27, ἔδωκε τὸ ποτήριον. He was giving the bread to each. He gave the cup once for all to all. (Humphry.)

—Λάβετε, φάγετε] Take ye, eat ye. This He said and did in order to transform the Levitical sacrifice prefiguring His death into an Evangelical Sacrament representing that Death, and in order to perpetuate the memory of His death, and to convey the benefits of it to all faithful receivers, to declare and strengthen their federal union as members with Christ their Head, and with each other in Him; to heal the wounds, and satisfy the hunger of their souls; to invigorate and refresh them with Divine virtue and grace flowing from Himself, God Incarnate, and to preserve their souls and bodies to everlasting life.

If one clause of this sentence is to be understood corporeally, the latter ought to be so understood; i.e. if the bread was literally changed into Christ's human body, the Disciples were to take and eat it. But that body was standing before them, and gave them what they did eat, and remained with them visible and entire after they had eaten, and afterwards died on the cross. Compare St. Paul's language, 1 Cor. x. 4, "They all drank of that Spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was Christ."

St. Paul in that chapter gives a divinely inspired exposition of our Blessed Lord's words, "The Cup of Blessing which we bless, is it not the κοινωνία, communicatio, of the Blood of Christ? The Bread which we break" (the Apostle does not scruple to call it Bread after consecration), "is it not the κοινωνία of the Body of Christ? For we being many are one Bread and one Body; for we are all partakers of that one Bread" (1 Cor. x. 17). And so Tertullian, de Oratione 6, "Corpus Ejus in pane censetur." At the Jewish Passover, the master of the family took the unleavened bread into his hand and said, This is the bread of affliction which our fathers did eat in Egypt; and they ate it in remembrance of what they had endured there, and of their deliverance thence. Cp. Dean Stanhope on the Gospels, ii. 517.

On the true sense of the words see Hooker, V. lvi. "Christ as God and Man is that true Vine whereof we both spiritually and corporally are Branches. The mixture of His bodily substance with ours is a thing which the ancient Fathers disclaim. . . ." And (V. lxvii. 5) "The Bread and Cup are His Body and Blood, because they are causes instrumental, upon the receipt whereof the participation of His Body and Blood ensueth. Every cause is in the effect which groweth from it. Our souls and bodies quickened to eternal life are effects, the cause whereof is the Person of Christ; His Body and Blood are the true well-spring out of which this life floweth. . . . What merit, force, or virtue soever there is in His sacrificed Body and Blood, we freely, fully, and wholly have by this Sacrament; and, because the Sacrament itself being but a corruptible and earthly creature, must needs be thought an unlikely instrument to work so admirable effects in men, we are therefore to rest ourselves altogether upon the strength of His glorious power Who is able and will bring to pass, that the Bread and Cup which He giveth us shall be truly the thing He promiseth. . . ." And (V. lv. 9) "There is no stint which can be set to the value or merit of the sacrificed Body of Christ; bounds of efficacy unto life it knoweth none, but is infinite in possibility of application."

On the doctrine of the Holy Eucharist see further below, the note on Heb. x. 12.

28. τοῦτο—τὸ αἷμά μου] this is My Blood. The sense in which these words were spoken is explained by the Holy Spirit thus paraphrasing them (Luke xxii. 20, and 1 Cor. xi. 25): τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ αἵματι μου τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἐκχυνόμενον: "Præsens in S. Cœnâ ea vis est, ac si eo momento Christi sanguis effunderetur;" for then what has been shed once is applied to the soul of the faithful receiver, of whatsoever age or country he may be; and so the fountain opened at Calvary is perennially flowing in the Church.

Διαθήκη is the Hebrew בְּרִית (berith), a covenant, perhaps from root בָּרַא (bara), to cut, from the slaying of victims in the ratifying of covenants by sacrifice, Gen. xv. 10. In Exod. xxiv. 8, Moses says, "Behold the Blood of the Covenant," to which our Lord seems here to refer. Cp. Heb. ix. 20. In the New Covenant of the Gospel, all the blessings flow from the death of the One, Heavenly, Holy Victim smitten for our sakes. Cp. Waterland on the Christian Sacraments, v. p. 493.

He calls it the new covenant, because the Evangelical Sacrament succeeds to, and supersedes, the Levitical sacrifice, now become old and ready to vanish away (Heb. viii. 13), as the husk and the blossom vanish when the fruit succeeds.

The Cup in the Holy Eucharist is appointed for the conveyance of the blessing of remission of sins in the new Covenant,—that is, the Covenant of Grace,—ratified between God and Man by the shedding of the blood of Christ, typified by the blood of the victims sacrificed under the old Covenant.

Either then Christ did what was superfluous (which it would be impiety to imagine) when He gave the Cup as well as the Bread to His Disciples, and commanded them all to drink of it (xxvi. 27), "and they all drank of it" (Mark xiv. 23); or else the benefits of the New Covenant are not fully conveyed, when the Cup is not administered to the people.

Cp. Bp. Costin, Works, iv. 319—330, "On Communicating in one Kind," and below on Luke xxiv. 30.

It may be asked, How is it, that the Holy Spirit has given various reports of the words used by Christ in the Institution of the Holy Eucharist? Cp. Matt. xxvi. 26—28. Mark xiv. 22—24. Luke xxii. 19, 20. 1 Cor. xi. 23, 25. The reason seems to be, that He designed to afford the full sense of the words by paraphrasing them in different ways. He has dealt with them in the New Testament as He has treated prophecies delivered by Himself in the Old (see above, ii. 23); and by presenting them in various outward forms He has given us a clearer view of the one inward sense. . . . But which of the Apostles or Evangelists would have ventured to do this without the Inspiration of the Holy Ghost? See above, Introduction to the Gospels.

— πολλῶν] of many; equivalent to all. See Isa. liiii. 12, cp. with v. 6. Dan. xii. 2. 2 Cor. v. 15. Matt. xx. 16; and above, note on xx. 28. Rom. v. 15, 18, 19; viii. 29. As S. Augustine observes, Civ. Dei xx. 23, Abraham is called a father of many nations (Gen. xvii. 5); and in Gen. xxii. 18, all nations are blessed in him. So τῶν is for any one whatsoever (John vi. 50). Cp. Glass. Phil. Sacr. p. 887; and Barrow's Sermons on Universal Redemption (Serm. lxxi.—lxxiv.), vol. iii. pp. 350—426. And see note below on Rom. viii. 29.

— εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν] for the remission of sins. On the force of this phrase see on Eph. i. 7. Our Blessed Lord here declares that the remission of sins is conferred in the Holy Eucharist. See chap. ix. of Waterland's Review of the Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist, vol. vii. pp. 240—266. Bingham, xix. 1, sect. 6.

29. ὅταν αὐτὸ πῖνω μεθ' ὑμῶν καὶνόν] when I shall drink it with you new in the kingdom of My Father. This was His last meal with His disciples, before His body laid aside all the weakness of mortality in the Grave. He made all things new by His Resurrection. (Rev. xxi. 5.) He here promises them a participation in the joys of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 2), concerning which He says, Ye shall eat and drink at My Table in My Kingdom (Matt. viii. 11. Luke xxii. 30. Rev. xix. 9) at the Marriage Supper of the Lamb, when they will sing a new Song (Rev. v. 9; xiv. 3), and dwell in the new heavens and new earth (2 Pet. iii. 13). He does not say νέον, but καὶνόν. He does not say new wine, νέον οἶνον (Mark ii. 22), but wine made new. See on Eph. iv. 23.

Our Lord did eat and drink with them after His Resurrection (John xxi. 12), in one case to give proof of His Resurrection, and in another in the Holy Eucharist (Luke xxiv. 30, 43), when the Kingdom was come more nearly by the glory of His Resurrection.

He had spoken of His crucifixion, He now speaks of His Resurrection; and assures them that they will see Him again, and be with Him. I will then drink with you the fruit of the vine new; that is, I will do it in a new manner; not having any longer a body liable to suffering, but an incorruptible body, and one that does not require nourishment. (Chrys.)

See also on Luke xxii. 16.

30. ὑμνήσαντες] having sung. Psalms cxvi.—cxviii.; the second part of the great hymn of praise or Hallel; the former part (Ps. cxiii.—cxv.) was sung before the Paschal feast.

Observe how the use of the Psalms is commended to the Church by the example of Christ. Cp. below, xxvii. 46.

31. γέγραπται] it is written; in Zech. xiii. 7, from LXX. Cp. Surenhus. p. 279.

32. προάξω] I will go before and lead you as your Shepherd. "Verbum pastorale." (Beng.) Cp. v. 31, ποιμένα—πρόβατα. Mark x. 32. John x. 4. The promise now given was fulfilled Matt. xxviii. 7.

34. ἀλέκτορα] the cock. Rare, but not unknown at Jerusalem. (Lightfoot.) Before a cock crows, i. e. about midnight. The ἀλεκτοροφωνία (Mark xiii. 35; xiv. 30), or second crowing, was later, but before πρωή.

35. δέ] δε is excluded by some Editors; but it is found in the majority of MSS., and it has a peculiar value and interest, as suggesting an extenuation of St. Peter's fault, by a brother Apostle, St. Matthew:—as much as to say, he made these professions, but we all did the same.

36. Γεθσημανεῖ] Gethsemane. On the western foot of the Mount of Olives, and on the east of the Brook Kedron. The name is from Hebr. גַּת (gath), torcular or press, and שֶׁמֶן (she-men), oleum; e. g. the Olive Press.

The Press, in which Olives were crushed and bruised, is used in Holy Scripture and in the Christian Fathers as an emblem of trial, distress, and agony (Isa. lxiii. 3. Lam. i. 15. Joel iii. 13). See also S. Aug. Serm. xv., where he compares the Church to a Torcular, an Olive Press, in which by the crushing of trials and persecutions the dark amurca or lees are separated from the "Oleum sanctitatis." Therefore there was something in the name of Gethsemane very fitting for the place in which the Man of Sorrows was bruised by His agony, from which flowed those precious drops which proved the reality of His Manhood, and the intensity of His love.

We may briefly notice here the meaning of the Names of some of the principal places in our Lord's History. The Bread of Life was first given to the world at Bethlehem, the House of Bread. (See Matt. ii. 1.) The Man Whose Name is Nelser, the Branch, grew up at Nazareth (see on ii. 23), whose name, derived from its branching shrubs and trees, may have shadowed forth that circumstance in His life. He chose His Apostles to be fishers of men from Beth-saida, the House of Fishing (see xi. 21; xiv. 13). He dwelt at Capernaum (iv. 13), the town of Consolation. He healed the impotent man at Beth-esda, the House of Mercy (John v. 2). Beth-any, the place of Palm Dates, speaks of the palms and hosannas of His triumphal entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday, and of the Victory and triumphal glory of His Ascension. In Beth-phase, the House of Figs, we may see a mentation of the warning that He gave to Jerusalem and the World by the withering of the Barren Fig-tree. And now Geth-semene, the Press of Oil, is witness of His agony in which it pleased God to bruise Him for our sakes (Isa. liii. 10), that Oil might flow from His wounds to heal our souls. God so ordered it that the cemetery of strangers at Jerusalem should, by its name, Aceldama, or Field of Blood, bear a perpetual record of the confession of Judas, and of the innocence of Christ. "I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood." (Matt. xxvii. 4.) At Golgotha He rolled away our shame (see on xxvii. 33).

And on the Mount of Olives Christ went up to heaven, whence He holds forth the Olive branch of Peace between God and Man.

May there not therefore have been some providential adaptation in these names to the Birth, Sufferings, and Victory of Him Who is the Everlasting Word of God, and became Man for us?

37. τὸν Πέτρον] Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, who were also witnesses of the glory of the Transfiguration, with which the Agony of Gethsemane is to be considered in connexion. See Matt. xvii. 1—8. Luke ix. 28—36. The glory of the one was a preparation for a right understanding of the suffering of the other. And the Transfiguration, which presented a view of the glory which belongs to the risen body of Christ and of His Saints (see xvii. 3), displayed the beatific state to which He and His are brought through the sufferings represented by the Agony.

Accordingly, we find, there are many points in the Evangelic narratives of the Transfiguration and of the Agony which suggest that they are to be considered in this relation to each other;

Both, it would seem, took place by night. The same three Apostles were chosen to be witnesses of both. In both, Christ prayed (see Luke ix. 28, 29). In both, the three Apostles are described as heavy with sleep (see v. 43). In both, it is said that Peter wist not what to say (Mark ix. 6; xiv. 40). In both, Christ had a message from heaven.

The one is a Vision of Suffering, the other of Glory; the one is in a lowly valley, the other is on a high mountain; in the one His visage is marred, in the other it shines like the sun, and His raiment is white as the light. We must all pass through the vale of sorrow in order to rise to the hill of Transfiguration; and if we do this, our vile bodies will be changed hereafter, so as to be like to His glorious body. Phil. iii. 21. 1 John iii. 2.

38. Περίλυπος ἐστίν] Is very sorrowful. The soul of our Blessed Lord and Divine Head was troubled and sorrowful unto death, and His sorrow has been recorded in Scripture in compassion to us, in order that we His Members may not despair, when we find ourselves sorrowful in affliction and at the approach of death, and that we may not be tempted by Satan to imagine that God has deserted us. (S. Aug. Serm. xxxi.) "Tristis est, non Ipse, sed anima," says S. Ambrose on Luke xxii. 42. "Non suscipiens, sed suscepta, turbatur; anima enim obnoxia passionibus, Divinitas libera."

Knowing the sinfulness of sin, Christ felt proportionably the bitterness of its sting—death.

Our Lord was very sorrowful, and so proved the truth of His Humanity. He was very sorrowful, not through fear, but for the sake of the unhappy Judas, and for the rejection of the Jews, and for the destruction of Jerusalem. But, returning to Himself, He acquiesces as a Son in that from which in His Human nature He had shrunk; and He says, Let not that be which I speak from human feeling, but let that be for which I came down from heaven, by Thy Will. (Jerome.) They had said that they would die with Him; and yet they are not able to watch with Him.

But He prays earnestly. And in order that His grief may be known to be real, His sweat falls to the ground, and this in drops as of blood, and an Angel comes to strengthen Him. For the same cause He prays; and by saying "if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me," He shows His human nature; and by adding "not as I will," He teaches us submission to God, even though our Nature draws us in an opposite direction. Since His countenance might not give evidence enough to the incredulous, He adds words and actions, in order that the sceptic might believe that He was really Man and suffered death. (Chrys.)

39. πλὴν οὐχ] nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou. The Agony of Christ shows that prayer may be lawful and in faith without express promise of obtaining that which is prayed for; and also proves the existence of Two Wills in Christ's Person, viz. His Human Will, and the Divine Will, which were indeed distinct, but not at variance with each other; and were perfectly reconciled by His exemplary Resignation. "Non Mea Voluntas, sed Tua: Suam Voluntatem," says S. Ambrose on Luke xxii. 42, "ad hominem retulit; Patris ad divinitatem." Cp. Aug. in Ps. xxxii. and Leo, Serm. 58; and see Athanas. p. 1009. "Christ intimates here His Two Wills, the one Human, the other Divine; the Human Will from infirmity shrinks from the Passion, the Divine Will is eager for it." Hence is refuted the Heresy of the Monothelites. See on Luke ii. 52; and below, xxvii. 46, and on John xii. 27; and Hooker, V. xlviii.

41. τὸ μὲν πνεῦμα] Quoted by Polycarp, Phil. 7.

43. βεβαρημένοι] their eyes were heavy with slumber—for it was night. The same is said of their state at the Transfiguration, which also seems to have been in the night time. See Luke ix. 32.

In both these respects, the three disciples—as yet not illuminated by the Holy Ghost—are figures and representatives of our unregenerate state.

The eyes of the natural man are weighed down with slumber, and are unable to gaze at Christ's glory, and to watch in His tribulation.

But, when the Apostles had received the Holy Ghost, they were empowered to follow Christ in His sufferings, and so to enter into His glory.

45. Καθεύδετε] Sleep ye. S. Chrys. understands this as spoken ironicē. (Cp. Zech. xi. 13. Mark vii. 9. John vii. 28. Glass. Phil. Sacr. p. 710.) Not so S. Augustine (de Consens. Evang. iii. 4), who supposes that our Lord allowed them to sleep till Judas came. Some read the words interrogatively. So Greswell and Robinson.

Perhaps these words may have a deeper meaning. Now you may hope for sleep and rest, for I am about to die, to sleep in death for you, and so to procure true rest for you here, and a blessed sleep for your bodies in the grave, and eternal rest for you, both in body and soul, in heaven.

— ἰδοὺ—ἀμαρτωλῶν] behold the Son of Man is being delivered into the hands of sinners. He says this in order to prove to them that (with all their professions) they would not be able to endure the sight of danger, and would fly for fear, and that He does not need their assistance. And in order to show that, though all was foreknown by Him and preordained, yet the agents of His death are responsible and guilty, He says, 'the Son of Man is delivered into the hands of wicked men.' (Chrys.) He adds, 'Arise,' i. e. that they may not find us as it were terrified: but let us go on willingly to death. He says this, that they may see His confidence and joy when He was about to suffer. (Jerome.)

47. Ἰούδας] Judas came to Gethsemane, and at night, because he sought an opportunity to betray Him without the knowledge of the multitude. (Cp. vv. 5. 16. Luke xxii. 6.) They came with lanterns and torches (John xviii. 2—11)—though it was full moon—to look for Him, lest He should be concealed among the trees of the Garden.

The first Adam attempted to hide himself, through fear and sense of guilt, from a righteous God, amid the trees of the Garden; the second Adam, in the consciousness of innocence, comes forth from amid the trees of the Garden, and gives Himself up to wicked men.

49. κατεφίλησε] kissed Him earnestly. More emphatic than ἐφίλησε. Cp. Acts xx. 37.

Judas, the false Apostle, the traitor of Christ, is a personal type of that spirit of Antichristianism, which professes love for Christ, and flatters Him with the lips, and yet sells Him into the hands of His enemies, and makes itself instrumental in crucifying Him.

50. Ἐταῖρε] Used in remonstrance, Matt. xx. 13; xxii. 12. See also Luke xxii. 48.

— ἐφ' ὃ] ὅ ἐλζ., but ὃ has the preponderance of authority.

On ἐφ' ὃ for ἐπὶ τί, see Winer, p. 150. Lobeck, Phryn. p. 57. Fritzsch. renders it 'ad qualem rem perpetranda adies!'

51. εἰς] Not specified as Peter (cp. Mark xiv. 47. Luke xxii. 50) till St. John wrote (xviii. 10); an evidence of the comparative lateness of St. John's Gospel. On τὸν δούλον see John xviii. 10.

52. οἱ λαβόντες μάχαιραν] i. e. they who take it of their own motion, without authority from God, Who alone gives commission to bear the sword (Rom. xiii. 4), shall perish by the sword of divine retribution. Cp. Gen. ix. 6.

53. δώδεκα λεγεῶνας ἀγγέλων] Twelve legions of Angels in lieu of twelve feeble and little Apostles. (Jerome.)

56. τοῦτο—πληρωθῶσιν] The Passion of Christ is the Plethora of Prophecy.

57. κρατήσαντες] See on Luke xxii. 54.

— Καϊάφαν] After He had been before Annas. See that incident supplied by John xviii. 13; but St. Matthew hastens on to the great catastrophe.

— ὅπου οἱ γραμματεῖς] i. e. the Great Sanhedrim of seventy with the President (Numb. xi. 16). The members were, the High Priest, the High Priests emeriti; the twenty-four Presidents of the twenty-four ἐφημερίαι of Priests (called ἀρχιερεῖς); Heads of Tribes or Families, πρεσβύτεροι and γραμματεῖς. (Cp. Mishna Cod. Sanhedrim, cap. 1. Selden de Synedrio. Jahn, Archæol. § 244. Winer, R. W. ii. 551.)

58. ἠκολούθει] was following.

— τῆς αὐλῆς] the open court-yard; 'atrium.'

59. καὶ τὸ συνέδριον ὅλον] and, in a word, the whole Sanhedrim; of which the Chief Priests, &c. mentioned before were members. Cp. Winer, p. 388.

— ἐζήτουν] were seeking; the imperfect tense describes a protracted employment studiously pursued.

60. οὐχ εὑρον] they found not. The second οὐχ εὑρον is cancelled by some Editors; but in solemn matters the Holy Spirit often uses Repetition. Cp. on Acts x. 16. And the repetition here shows the earnestness of the search—and its vanity.

61. καταλῦσαι τὸν ναόν] to destroy the Temple. See John ii. 19. Our Lord did not undeceive them as to the meaning of this saying, which was cast in His teeth even on the cross (xxvii. 40). Their time of trial was past.

ἀρχιερεὺς εἶπεν αὐτῷ, Οὐδὲν ἀποκρίνη τί οὔτοι σοῦ καταμαρτυροῦσιν; ⁶³ ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς ἐσιώπα. Καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς εἶπεν αὐτῷ Ἐξορκίζω σε κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος, ἵνα ἡμῖν εἴπῃς εἰ σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστὸς, ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ. (³¹⁰/_I) ⁶⁴ Λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς, Σὺ εἶπας. πλὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ἂπ' ἄρτι ὄψεσθε τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου καθήμενον ἐκ δεξιῶν τῆς δυνάμεως, καὶ ἐρχόμενον ἐπὶ τῶν νεφελῶν τοῦ οὐρανοῦ. (³¹³/_I) ⁶⁷ Τότε ἐνέπτυσαν εἰς τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐκολάφισαν αὐτὸν, οἱ δὲ ἐρράπισαν ⁶⁸ λέγοντες, (³¹⁴/_I) ἰ Προφῆτευσον ἡμῖν, Χριστὲ, τίς ἐστιν ὁ παῖσας σε;

⁶⁹ ^k Ὁ δὲ Πέτρος ἔξω ἐκάθητο ἐν τῇ αὐλῇ, καὶ προσῆλθεν αὐτῷ μία παιδίσκη λέγουσα, Καὶ σὺ ἦσθα μετὰ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ Γαλιλαίου. ⁷⁰ ὁ δὲ ἡρνήσατο ἔμπροσθεν πάντων λέγων, Οὐκ οἶδα τί λέγεις. (³¹⁵/_I) ⁷¹ Ἐξελθόντα δὲ αὐτὸν εἰς τὸν πυλῶνα εἶδεν αὐτὸν ἄλλη, καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς ἐκεῖ, Καὶ οὗτος ἦν μετὰ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ Ναζωραίου. ⁷² καὶ πάλιν ἡρνήσατο μεθ' ὅρκου ὅτι Οὐκ οἶδα τὸν ἄνθρωπον. ⁷³ Μετὰ μικρὸν δὲ προσελθόντες οἱ ἐστῶτες εἶπον τῷ Πέτρῳ, Ἀληθῶς καὶ σὺ ἐξ αὐτῶν εἶ, καὶ γὰρ ἡ λαλιά σου δῆλόν σε ποιεῖ. ⁷⁴ ^m Τότε ἤρξατο καταθεματίζειν καὶ ὁμνύειν ὅτι Οὐκ οἶδα τὸν ἄνθρωπον. Καὶ εὐθέως ἀλέκτωρ ἐφώνησε. (³¹⁶/_{II}) ⁷⁵ Καὶ ἐμνήσθη ὁ Πέτρος τοῦ ῥήματος τοῦ Ἰησοῦ εἰρηκότος αὐτῷ, Ὅτι ἂπρὶν ἀλέκτορα φωνῆσαι, τρίς ἀπαρνήσῃ με καὶ ἐξελθὼν ἔξω ἔκλαυσε πικρῶς.

62. Οὐδὲν ἀποκρίνη] Dost thou make no answer to what these are witnessing against thee? On τί for ὅ τι see Kühner, § 837. Or, the sentence may be divided into two questions; οὐδὲν ἀποκρίνη; τί ο. σ. κ.;

63. ἐσιώπα] 'tacebat'—was remaining silent.

— Ἐξορκίζω σε] I conjure thee. Our Lord, Who had before been silent and answered nothing, being adjured by the High Priest officially, replies.

On the practical inferences from this, as to the legality of Oaths in Courts of Justice, see Bp. Andrewes, de Jurejurando, Lond. 1629, p. 92: "Bellum et Jusjurandum spontanea, mala sunt; et ut bona sint, ἐπακτὰ esse debent, id est, pressa et expressa (ut scitè Augustinus de Juramentis) vel auctoritate deferentis vel saltem duritie non credentis." See above, v. 34.

64. πλὴν λέγω ὑμῖν] nevertheless I say unto you. He answers their thoughts. Thou the Son of God! think they; Thou Who art here bound as a Malefactor. Yes; and I am also the Son of Man; and as Man, I am now enduring these things in My appointed way toward that glorious exaltation, in which you, who now revile Me, will see Me, seated as King, at God's right hand.

— ἀπ' ἄρτι] henceforth—à modo; that is, the next time that ye see Me will be when ye will see Me appear in glory. Mal-donat. See xxiii. 39.

— ὄψεσθε] ye shall see Him appearing. As Daniel has prophesied, vii. 13. Our Lord said this δευτικῶς, i. e. referring to Himself, as in that other reference to Daniel, Matt. xvi. 18, ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ, κ.τ.λ. Thou, O Caiaphas, and ye, O Priests, who sit there to judge Me, will then see Me appearing in the clouds in the divine glory, and be summoned to stand before My judgment-seat.

It was this assertion, joined with that in v. 63, which elicited the charge of blasphemy. See v. 65, note, and on Mark xiv. 62.

65. διέῤῥηξε τὰ ἱμάτια] he rent his clothes. St. Mark has διέῤῥηξε τοὺς χιτῶνας. The plural appears to be according to Hebrew usage (cp. Mark v. 30. John xiii. 4; xix. 23. Acts xviii. 6). "Hebraei" (says Rosenmüller, on John xiii. 4) "pallium plurali numero ἵματιον et ἡγῶν notarunt." Cp. Schroeder. Inst. Ling. Hebr. p. 130, and pp. 236, 237. Glass. Phil. Sacr. p. 285. Winer, p. 159.

The High Priest Caiaphas did what was unlawful for a High Priest to do in a private grief (Lev. x. 6; xxi. 10). To him the declaration of the Son of Man's coming hereafter to judgment, was a worse woe, than even the loss of a son. He, the High Priest of God, was conspiring against the True High Priest. Perhaps, also, there was something significant in the act, showing that the Priesthood itself was now about to be rent from him and the Jewish Nation. (Jerome, Chrys.) — ἐβλασφήμησε—βλασφημίαν] He spake blasphemy. Here is an instance of an use of the word Blasphemy, for assumption of what belongs to another, especially to God, see ix. 3. This use is frequent in the Apocalypse, ii. 9; xiii. 1. 5, 6; xvii. 3. For the cause of the High Priest's imputation of blasphemy, see on xvi. 14.

66. θανάτου] of death. By the Law (Lev. xxiv. 13—16) it would have been by stoning. As St. Stephen was stoned (Acts vii. 58), and as Christ Himself had been menaced with stoning (John viii. 59; x. 31), for what they called blasphemy. But God ordered that the death of Him Who was the true Paschal Lamb, should not be by stoning, but by crucifixion; a death not usually inflicted by the Jews, but a heathen punishment, and yet, wonderful to say, precisely typified in the slaying and death of the Paschal Lamb (Exod. xii. 9), and that without the breaking of a bone (Exod. xii. 46). See the parallel between the killing of the Lamb and crucifixion, traced by Justin M., Dial. Tryphon. § 40.

On the religious considerations suggested by the manner of Christ's death, i. e. by crucifixion, see below on xxvii. 22.

69. ἔξω ἐκάθητο] he was sitting without, in the court-yard, while His Master was standing within before the High Priest, and undergoing these indignities.

— μία παιδίσκη] a certain maiden. A special one, for she kept the door. See John xviii. 17.

71. ἄλλη] another. For the reconciliation of a seeming discrepancy here, see on John xviii. 25, and on Luke xxii. 54.

— αὐτοῖς ἐκεῖ] So the best MSS. Elz. τοῖς ἐ. The sense is,—she says to persons stationed at the πυλῶν, or gate of the court-yard (i. e. officials), there,—not to all that were there. On this use of αὐτοῖς, see Matt. xii. 15; xix. 2. Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 133.

72. μεθ' ὅρκου] with an oath. Peter volunteers an oath, and denies Christ. Our Lord is put on His oath by the High Priest, and confesses Himself to be Christ. See above, v. 63.

73. ἡ λαλιά σου] thy language. St. Peter was terrified by a woman, and was not able to speak his own Syro-Chaldaic language with correctness, and he denies Christ. But afterwards, when Christ was glorified, and the Holy Ghost was given, he was enabled to confront and confound those who slew Christ, and to convert three thousand Jews from every country under heaven by his eloquence in their languages. See on Acts ii. 14—41.

Holy Communion. And St. Peter's sin, and the sins of other saints, are written in Holy Scripture that we may not be high-minded, but fear; and that when we fall into sin we may repent. (Cp. Theophyl., Mark xiv. 72.) The grace given in the Holy Communion was improved by St. Peter into the means of godly repentance; but it was perverted by Judas to his own destruction. It was used as medicine by the one, and was abused into poison by the other.

CH. XXVII. 2. Ποντίῳ Πιλάτῳ] to Pontius Pilate. The successor of Valerius Gratus, as Procurator of Judæa (Tacit. Ann. xv. 54, "Christus, Tiberio imperante, per Pontium Pilatum Procuratorem supplicio affectus est." Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4).

Pilate is said to have communicated the facts of the crucifixion of Christ in an official despatch to the Emperor Tiberius. See Euseb. ii. 2, and below on Acts iv. 6.

Pontius Pilate held the office of Procurator from A.D. 25 to A.D. 36; he was deprived of it for cruelty, and is said to have destroyed himself at Vienne, in Gaul, in the first year of the Emperor Caligula. See Euseb. ii. 7, ed. Vales., and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iv., who observes, as an eminent act of the providence of God, that the full power of Judicature in Judæa ('jus gladii') was left in the hands of its resident Procurator; which was not usually the case.

On the succession of Jewish Procurators at this time, see Chronol. Tables at the end of the Preface to the Acts, p. xl.

The Roman Procurator's residence was at Cæsarea, but he came to Jerusalem for the Passover, to maintain order in the city.

—τῷ ἡγεμόνι] to the Governor. On the different usages of the Evangelists, as to this word, see Mark xv. 1.

3. μεταμεληθεὶς] He does not say μετανοήσας. On the difference between true and false repentance, see Bp. Sanderson, iii. 13—25, and below on 2 Cor. vii. 10.

—τὰ τριάκοντα ἀργύρια] the thirty shekels (see above, xxvi. 15). A shekel was two drachmas (Gen. xliii. 15, 16, LXX), or two denarii. See xvii. 24, and Winer, Lex. i. 266; ii. 445.

4. αἷμα ἀθῶον] more than an innocent man. I am guilty of his blood,—εἰς τὸ χυθῆναι. (Euthym.)

5. ἐν τῷ ναῷ] in the Holy Place; where the Corban was. On the difference between vaḥs and ἱερόν, see xxvii. 51. Luke i. 9. 2 Thess. ii. 4, note.

—ἀπήγατο] he hanged himself; as his prototype, Abithophel, the friend of David, who conspired against him, had done, 2 Sam. xvii. 23. See on Acts i. 18, and cp. the ancient author adv. Cataphryg. in Euseb. v. 16. Routh, R. S. ii. 188, λόγος ἀναρτῆσαι ἑαυτοῦς, Ἰούδα προδότην δίκην—καὶ δισκευθέντα κακῶς τελευτήσας.

The following words, on the death of Judas, contain important historical statements, as well as doctrinal truths. "Unde scelestior omnibus, Juda, et infelicior extitisti, quem non poenitentia revocavit ad Dominum, sed desperatio traxit ad laqueum? Expectasses consummationem criminis tui; donec sanguis Christi pro omnibus funderetur peccatoribus, informis lethi suspensum distulisses. Cumque conscientiam tuam tot Domini miracula, tot dona torqueant, illa saltem te à præcipitio tuo revocassent, quæ in Paschali cænâ jam de perfidia tuâ signo divinæ scientiæ detectus acceperas. Cur de Ejus bonitate diffidis, qui te à corporis et sanguinis sui communione non repulit? qui tibi ad comprehendendum se cum turbis et armatorum (Joan. xviii. 5) cohorte venienti, pacis osculum non negavit? Sed homo inconvertibilis, spiritus vadens et non revertens, cordis tui secutus es rabiem, et stante diabolo à dextris tuis, iniquitatem, quem in sanctorum omnium armaveras caput, in tuum verticem retorsisti: ut quia facinus tuum omnem mensuram ultionis excesserat, te paveret impietas tua judicem, te pateretur tua poena carnicem." Leo M. (Sermo lii. p. 121.)

Judas was a type of the Jews, in his sin and end. See on Acts i. 20.

6. κορβανᾶν] Hebr. קרבן (korban); from root קרב (karab), appropinquavit; and in Hiphil קרבן, appropinquare fecit; i. e. obtulit; whence Corban is used either as an offering (Mark vii. 11) or oblation; or the place where oblations were received,—the Treasury of the Temple,—as here.

If the money had been cast into the treasury, the circumstance of the betrayal would not have been so notorious; but by the purchase of the field the Chief Priests perpetuated its memory to posterity, and fulfilled the prophecy; and this they did with deliberation—having called a council—and so they bear public testimony against themselves. (Chrys.)

8. Ἀγρὸς αἵματος] Akel-dama. See Acts i. 19.

—ἕως τ. σήμερον] until this day. Cp. xxviii. 15. In both these cases the clause follows an aorist, indicating that the act then begun had been continued without interruption till the time of the writing of the Gospel. It does not necessarily intimate a long time; but it marks a striking circumstance, that the Rulers of the Jews in one case were not able, in the other were not willing, to put an end, even after a short interval, to what reflected so much disgrace on themselves. It also shows a continuity of knowledge on the part of the Evangelist.

9. Τότε ἐπληρώθη τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ Ἰερεμίου] Then was fulfilled what was spoken by Jeremiah. A prophecy not now read in Jeremiah, but in Zechariah, xi. 12, 13. In that prophecy of Zechariah the Messiah is introduced asking for the wages due to Him as Shepherd of His people; and the wages paid Him are thirty pieces of silver; and Jehovah says to Him, "Cast them to the Potter (the LXX has χωνευτήριον, for an explanation of which see S. Cyril Hieros. Cat. 13, pp. 188, 189), a goodly price at which I have been priced by them!"

Thus then Jehovah identifies Himself with the Shepherd—the Messiah—and speaks of this contempt shown to the Messiah as an insult to Himself. "Then I took the thirty pieces of silver and cast them in the House of Jehovah to the Potter."

No one can doubt the general adaptation of this prophecy to the death of Christ, the Good Shepherd laying down His life for His sheep. (John x. 11. 15.)

It is the practice of the Holy Ghost, especially in St. Matthew's Gospel, written primarily for Hebrew use, to give the sense rather than the exact words of the Hebrew Prophecies, which He Himself had dictated in the Old Testament (see above, on ii. 23); and in this passage He intimates, that though the parties concerned in the present transaction recorded in the Gospel, were Judas and the Priests, yet all that was done by them in the rejection of Christ, was foreseen by God, and was done with "His determinate counsel and foreknowledge." (Acts ii. 23.) As S. Augustine says, "Pater tradidit Filium; Ipse Filius seipsum tradidit pro nobis; et Judas Eum tradidit."

But how is it to be explained, that a prophecy written by Zechariah is ascribed by St. Matthew to Jeremiah?

If (as some do not scruple to say) St. Matthew had written Jeremiah by mistake, such an error as this—in a matter obvious to every reader of the Old Testament—would have been pointed out to him by those who read his Gospel in primitive times, and the text would have been corrected accordingly, and have been so read in the Church. For, as Antiquity testifies, St. Matthew published his Gospel originally in Hebrew, and afterwards in Greek. The error (if error it had been) would have been pointed out in the first edition—the Hebrew—and would never have appeared in the second edition—the Greek. Such errors, committed by Hittorians and Editors in their first editions, are amended in subsequent revisions; and if this had been an error, it would not now stand in the transcripts of the Gospel.

It is observable, that though the Prophet Zechariah is three times quoted by St. Matthew (xxi. 5; xxvi. 31; xxvii. 9), he is never quoted by name; nor is he once quoted by name even in the whole of the New Testament. Indeed, the Holy Spirit in the Gospels, in quoting the prophecies, is not accustomed to particularize the names of the Prophets, by whose instrumentality He had delivered them; and thus, it is probable, He intends to teach, that all prophecies proceed from One Spirit, and that those by whom they were uttered are not sources, but only channels of the same Divine truth. Cp. Aug. de Consens. Ev. iii. 7, vol. iii. p. 1416.

For a similar reason, it may seem, the Holy Spirit in the New Testament often combines prophecies spoken by different Prophets in the Old Testament, and introduces them as spoken by “the Prophet,” or by one of the two Prophets, and treats them as coming from the same Author. Compare, for instance, Matt. xxi. 4, 5, in which passage we see that a prophecy of Zechariah is coupled with one of Isaiah, and both are said to be διὰ τοῦ προφήτου. So Matt. xxi. 13 is formed out of Isa. lvi. 7, and Jer. vii. 11. So He speaks of what is written in one Prophet (e. g. Habakkuk, i. 5), as “written in the Prophets.” Acts xiii. 40. Again, in quoting two prophecies, written by two Prophets, He mentions only one of the two Prophets. See Mark i. 2. Cp. Glass. Phil. Sacr. p. 960, and Junii Parallela; and the Parallela in Mr. Grinfield’s Editio Hellenistica N. T., Lond. 1843.

We may infer from the manner in which the Prophets of the Old Testament are treated by the Holy Spirit in the New, that He designed to teach us, that, as in the Gospel, Paul is nothing, and Apollon is nothing (1 Cor. iii. 5), so, in the Old Testament, Jeremiah is nothing, Zechariah is nothing, but God’s ministers, holy men, who all spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost (2 Pet. i. 21); and that there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit; and diversities of ministries and operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all (1 Cor. xii. 6).

Again, in the New Testament, the Holy Spirit sometimes cites Prophecies which were delivered of old to the world, and of which we have no written record in the Old Testament. See Jude 14.

Also, there appears to have been a tradition among the Jews that prophecies now read in Zechariah had been in the first instance delivered by Jeremiah; for it was a saying current with them, “Zechariam habuisse Spiritum Jeremiæ.” (See Surenhus. p. 282.) And the words quoted by St. Matthew were seen by St. Jerome in a copy of Jeremiah used by the Nazarenes. See also Rosenm., “Huic sententiæ faveat locus insignis Lectionarii Coptici à cel. Woide notatus.” Vid. Michaelis, Bibl. Orient. iv. 238. Cp. Hammond, p. 135. Burgon. ad loc.

S. Jerome says, ad Pammachium, vol. iv. p. 251, “Accusent Apostolum Matthæum falsitatis, quòd nec cum Hebraico, nec cum Septuaginta congruat Translatoribus, et (quod his majus est) erret in nomine, pro Zechariâ quippe Jeremiam posuit—Sed absit hoc de pedissequo Christi dicere!”

S. Jerome then refers to another passage of Zechariah, where the Evangelist deviates from the precise words of the Prophecy in order to give the sense. See Matt. xxvi. 31. And he says, “Sermonum varietas Spiritûs unitate concordat.”

On the whole, there is reason to believe, with S. Chrysostom and Eusebius (D. E. x. 5), that the prophecy which we read in Zechariah (xi. 12, 13) had, in the first instance, been delivered by Jeremiah; and that by referring here not to Zechariah, where we read it, but to Jeremiah, where we do not read it, the Holy Spirit teaches us not to regard the Prophets as the Authors of their prophecies, but to trace their prophecies backwards and upwards, flowing in different channels from age to age, till we see them all at length springing forth from the one living Fountain of wisdom and knowledge,—the Divine Well-spring of Inspiration in the Godhead Itself.

Thus this passage, like others in the Written Word of God, appears to be set, as the Incarnate Word is set, for the fall and rising of many in Israel (Luke ii. 34). They are set for our moral probation, which supposes difficulty, “ut fides, non mediocri præmio destinata, difficultate constaret” (Tertul. Apol. 21). And so these difficulties are the leaves and flowers of which the crown of glory is woven. They are set for our fall, if with a partial eye to single difficulties, and without due regard to the general evidence and scope of Revelation taken as a whole, and presuming too much on ourselves, we thence take occasion to deny the Inspiration of the Gospels. They are set for our rising, if we thence are led to distrust ourselves, to feel the weakness of our own faculties, and our need of Divine grace, and to exercise humility and faith, to recognize the same Spirit speaking by all the Writers of Holy Scripture, and to look forward with patience and hope to the time when all that is dark in Holy Scripture will be cleared away, and we shall see the truth as it is, and know even as we are known (1 Cor. xiii. 12).

Other replies to the question here considered may be seen in Glass. Philol. Sacr. p. 99, and in Surenhus. Καταλλαγή, p. 280. Cornelius à Lapide on Zech. xi. 12. Dr. Jackson on the Creed, book viii. ch. xxvii. Mintert, Lexicon, voc. Ἰερεμίας. Archbishop Newcome on Zech. xi. 13. Hengstenberg, Christologie, ii. 258. 465.

11. Σὺ λέγεις] Thou sayest; i. e. what is true. See xxvi. 64. John xviii. 37; and 1 Tim. vi. 13.

16. Βαραββάν] Barabbas. From בָּר (bar), filius, and אבָּא (abba), pater. They rejected the True Son of the Father, and chose a robber, who bare the name of Father’s Son, in His place.

17.] In some MSS. and Versions there is a remarkable reading here, i. e. Ἰησοῦν prefixed to Barabbas; and this is approved by Fritzsche, Meyer, and others. “Codices ante Origenem habuerunt Ἰησοῦν Βαραββάν.” (Rosenm.)

If this reading is correct, the contrast is striking. Whom will ye? Jesus who is called Barabbas, or Jesus Who is called Christ, the Son of the Living God? But perhaps Ἰησοῦν, i. e. ἸΝ after ἸΜΙΝ, is only a repetition of the two final letters, IN.

Barabbas the murderer and robber is acquitted by the Jews, and Jesus is killed by them. But He is acquitted by the voice of Pilate’s wife, and is pronounced innocent by Pilate, the Roman Governor, and is acknowledged by the Roman centurion to be “truly the Son of God.” The act of the Jews was suggested by the Evil One, who still reigns over them, and therefore they cannot have peace. (Jerome.)

In the whole history of the Passion of Christ no one pleads for Him but a woman—the wife of a Heathen Governor, the deputy of the Emperor of the World. She says, Have thou nothing to do with that Just Man.

How often the movements of the heart of one weak woman are wiser than all the popular clamours, and deliberative counsels, and judicial decisions, of the Multitudes, Nations, Senates, and Rulers of this world!

— πολλὰ ἔπαθον] I suffered many things. How many things took place that ought to have made the Chief Priests pause! Together with the examination and inquiry by Pilate came this dream of his wife; sent to her perhaps because she was holier than her husband, and because, if sent to him, it might never have been divulged. And not only did she see the vision, but suffered many things in that very night, because of Christ. Pilate wished to let Him go, but they importuned to have released unto them a notable prisoner—one infamous for his crimes—and preferred Barabbas to the Saviour of the World. Chrys.

22. Σταυρωθήτω] Let Him be crucified! Not only by putting Him to death, but also by the manner of His death, viz., by Crucifixion, did the enemies of Jesus fulfil the prophecies, and prove Him to be the Christ. See above, xxvi. 24. 66; and below, on v. 43, and on Gal. iii. 13.

For a description of the cross and of crucifixion, see Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iv. and the notes. That the feet were nailed as well as the hands, see Justin, c. Tryphon. 97. Tertullian, c. Marcion. iii. 19. Plaut. Mostell. ii. 1. 13. Cp. Ps. xxi. 17. Luke xxiv. 39.

Some of the meditations of the Ancient Church upon the Crucifixion are thus expressed:

“Per lignum servi facti sumus; per crucem liberi.” (Aug.)
 “Ut non sibi sibi omnibus vinceret Christus, manus in cruce tetendit.” (Ambrose.)

“Ipsa species crucis, quid est nisi forma quadrata mundi? unde S. Apostolus, quæ sit altitudo et latitudo amoris Christi.” (Hieron.) See John xii. 32, and on Ephes. iii. 18.

23. ἔκραζον] they were crying. Then were fulfilled the words of Isaiah (v. 7), “He looked for judgment, but behold oppression; for righteousness, but behold a cry.” (Jerome.)

24. ἀπενίψατο τὰς χεῖρας] he washed his hands, but not his heart. He was guilty of crucifying Christ, by delivering to be crucified Him Whom he pronounced innocent; and so in delivering up Christ he condemned himself.

Sense of guilt makes men cowards. Pilate was afraid, lest, if he did not comply with the desires of the Priests and People, and deliver Jesus to them, he himself should be accused by them to his master, Tiberius, for the many sins he had committed in his government of Judæa. See John xix. 12.

Observe how many things were done by Christ to deter the Jews from this sanguinary deed. They saw Pilate washing his hands; they heard his protest of Christ's innocence; they saw the death of Judas the Traitor, stung in conscience for betraying Him; they beheld the majestic silence of Christ; and yet they prefer Barabbas to Christ, and imprecate a curse on themselves and their children. This curse is still of force upon the Jews even to this day; as Isaiah says (i. 15), “When ye make many prayers, I will not hear: your hands are full of blood.” This is the legacy which the Jews have bequeathed to their posterity, “His blood be upon us and upon our children!” Jerome.

26. φραγελλώσας] having scourged; as was usually done to slaves before their crucifixion. See Webst. here. “Φραγελλοῦν vox origine Latinâ, id. qd. mastrigoum xx. 19. Joan. xix. 1. According to the Roman laws, they who were to be crucified were first scourged. Jesus was delivered to the soldiers, and thus that most holy body was torn by the scourge. But this was done, that “by His stripes we might be healed” (Isa. liii. 5). (Jerome.)

28. χλαμύδα] A round military cloak ('sagum,' 'paludamentum'), of dyed wool, fastened on the right shoulder with a fibula, so as to cover the left side, and thrown over the other dress.

— κοκκίνην] scarlet. As military Emperor, or King—in mockery. It is called πορφύρα by St. Mark, xv. 17, and was probably of scarlet, with purple clavi, or stripes. See Eutrop. ix. 26. Winer, Lex. i. p. 664.

All these things, done in mockery, were so ordered by God as to have a divine meaning. Christ is clothed in scarlet and purple, for He is a military Conqueror and King; He is crowned with thorns, for He has a diadem won by suffering, the diadem of the World; He has a reed in His hand, for He wields a royal Sceptre, earned by the weakness of humanity (see Phil. ii. 8—11). The cross is laid on His shoulder, for this is the sign of the Son of Man, the trophy of His Victory, by which He takes away sin and conquers Satan; His titles are inscribed on the Cross, "King of the Jews," for He is the Sovereign Lord of Abraham and all his seed. In all these circumstances, as S. Hilary says, He is worshipped, while He is mocked. The purple is the dress of royal honour; His crown woven with thorns is a crown of victory. As S. Ambrose says (on Luke xxiii. 11), "illudentes adorant."

32. Κυρηναῖον] a Cyrenian. The Cyrenians, who had now come up for the Passover, had a synagogue at Jerusalem. Cp. Acts ii. 10; vi. 9.

— Σίμωνα] Simon. See Luke xxiii. 26.

— ἡγγάρευσαν] they pressed into service. See above, v. 41. Mark xv. 21. His Cross was laid on a stranger. The Jews were not worthy to bear it. (Hilary.)

— ἵνα ἄρῃ] in order that he might bear it. Criminals were obliged to carry their own cross to the place of execution. It is probable, that when our Lord was oppressed by the burden, the soldiers, meeting Simon coming from the country, pressed him into the service as a disciple of Jesus.

33. Γολγοθᾶ] from rad. גלגל (galal), volvit; whence the word Gilgal, Golgotha, and euphonic Golgotha, a rolling; and Gulgoeth, a skull (2 Kings ix. 35), from its roundness.

Perhaps by recording the name Golgotha the Holy Spirit may intend a reference to the words of Joshua the type of Jesus, at the hill Gilgal, where he circumcised the people (Josh. v. 9), and had his camp. "Behold, I have to-day rolled away (רולל) the reproach of Egypt; therefore the name of the place is called Gilgal." And by our Jesus at Golgotha the shame and guilt of sin was rolled away from the Israel of God; and there—where He was crucified—was His camp;—for He conquered by the Cross. Cp. above on xxvi. 36.

Golgotha was outside the walls of the city (Heb. xiii. 12), and probably on the n.w. of Mount Sion. See Williams, Holy City, p. 253. Some Expositors suppose that Golgotha derived its name from its conical form (Reland, Palæst. p. 860), and that for this reason it is called κράνιον by St. Luke, xxiii. 33. Cp. Stanley, Palestine, p. 454, and Museum of Classical Literature, ii. pp. 311—476.

There was an ancient tradition (see Origen, Tertullian, Athanas., August.) that the bones of Adam had been buried there. S. Jerome is of opinion that it was called Calvary because it was a place of public executions, and many skulls of criminals who had been beheaded, might be seen there, perhaps exposed in terror.

Observe, our Lord was crucified on Golgotha, and He ascended into heaven from the Mount of Olives. The Sun of Righteousness went down in the west, and arose to heaven on the east of Jerusalem.

34. ὄξος μετὰ χολῆς] vinegar with gall. οἶνον ἐσμυρνισμένον, Mark xv. 23. Ps. lxix. 21.

— οὐκ ἤθελε πιεῖν] He would not drink. "Sive quòd aversaretur malitiam; sive quia volebat majorem pati sitim in cruce, ut nobis mortificationis vivum daret exemplum." (à Lapide.) Perhaps He refused it, that it might not be said by His enemies that He had not suffered all the agonies of crucifixion, and that some drugged potion had been given Him by His friends to stupify His senses and to deaden His pain till just before He died (see below, v. 48. John xix. 28). Such potions were often given to those who were crucified. See Lightfoot. "Vinum myrrhâ conditum mentem turbat. Solebant supplicio afficiendis porrigere vinum, herbis temulentiam procreantibus mixtum, quò minùs sentirent dolores. Tr. Sanhedrin. c. 6, Dixit R. Chesda: qui ducitur ad mortem, ei datur bibendum granum turis in poculo vini, ut distrahatur mens ejus, quia dictum est Prov. xxxi. 6, Date siceram perituro, et vinum illis qui sunt amaro animo." Merrillius. Casaubonus, Exercitt. Antibar. xvi. 80. Jesus verò, qui doloris sensu rationisque usu privari hoc modo nolebat, sed animo forti fatum subire volebat, vino leviter degustato calicem epotare recusabat. (Kuin.)

35. ἵνα πληρωθῇ—κλήρον] not found in A, B, D, E, F, G, H, K, L, M, S, U, V—and probably not from St. Matthew.

36. ἐτήρουν αὐτὸν] they were watching Him. The vigilance of the soldiers and Priests has proved of great use to us, as giving us clearer evidence of the Resurrection, and of Christ's power therein. (Jerome.)

37. Οὗτός ἐστιν—Ἰουδαίων] This is Jesus, the King of the Jews. See S. Aug. in Joan. xix. 19.

Thus by Pilate's voice the Gentile World (represented by him as Roman Governor) replies to the Jews, "Whether ye will or no, Jesus is King of the Jews,—the Lord of all who believe." (Jerome, referring to the derivation of the word Jew, i. e. one who confesses and praises God.)

"The first authorized title of 'King of Judah' after the captivity of king Zedekiah, was that Inscription written on our Saviour's cross by the command of Pilate (the Representative in Judæa of Cæsar, the world's Governor), so that the Jews could not get a change of it in any of the three languages in which it was written. That which the world might conceive was written in jest, the God of Israel made good by making this Jesus, Whom Pilate crucified, both Lord and Christ (Acts ii. 36; iv. 10); that is, a far greater King than Cæsar, whom they acknowledge their only king!" Dr. Jackson on the Creed, bk. vii. c. 32.

On the different forms in which this Inscription is represented by the Evangelists, see above, Introduction to the Gospels.

38. δύο ληστὰι two robbers, or, rather, felons, rebels, and assassins. "Vocabantur ληστῶν et sicariorum nomine qui in jussu publico arma cepissent. Crux pœna latronum." (Rosenm.) See above, xxi. 13. These rebels and assassins were executed at the Passover for a public example at that great festival.

— εἷς ἐκ δεξιῶν one on the right, the other on the left. Like the good and wicked at the Great Day of Judgment. See above, xxv. 33, 34, 41. Christ on the cross accepts the one (Luke xxiii. 43), while the other remains impenitent and blasphemes. So even the Cross becomes a Judgment-seat, and the Crucifixion displays a vision of the Universal Judgment to come.

42. καταβάτω—καὶ πιστεύσομεν let Him come down, and we will believe. A false promise. For which was greater, to come down from the cross, or to raise Himself from the dead? He rose again, and ye did not believe. If He had come down from the cross, ye would not have believed. Perhaps the Spirits of Evil suggested these words; for, as soon as the Lord was crucified, they felt the power of the Cross, and that their own power was broken thereby; they would then that He should come down from the Cross. But Christ remains on the Cross in order to destroy the Devil, and in order that the world may believe and be saved. (Jerome.) Cp. 1 Cor. ii. 8.

— ἐπ' αὐτῷ we will become believers in Him; a stronger expression than the reading of some MSS. π. αὐτῷ.

43.] Quoted by Clem. Roman. c. 16, p. 71.

— πέποιθεν ἐπὶ τὸν Θεόν He trusted in God, let Him deliver Him, if He will have Him. Wonderful fulfilment of Divine prophecy! They who nailed Jesus to the cross, and mocked Him on the cross, used the very words which the Holy Spirit, speaking by David in the person of the Messiah, a thousand years before the crucifixion, had said that the enemies of the Messiah would use against Him, when they would pierce His hands and feet, and part His garments, and cast lots for His vesture. Ps. xxii. 16, 18. See that Psalm, v. 7, 8, All they that see Me laugh Me to scorn, they shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying, He trusted in God that He would deliver Him; let Him deliver Him, if He will have Him. Thus they fulfilled the Scriptures in condemning Him. (Acts xiii. 27.) Thus, in crucifying Jesus, they proved Him to be the Christ.

44. ληστὰι the robbers: one of them. Luke xxiii. 42, 43. S. Aug. de Consens. Evang. iii. 16, and S. Ambrose in Luc. lib. x. For similar uses of the plural see above, ii. 20. Acts xvii. 18, and Matt. xxvi. 8, where it is said that "the disciples murmured,"—viz. Judas, one of them, did. Acts xiii. 40, "that which is spoken by the Prophets,"—i. e. in one of them, Habakkuk, i. 5.

Or, it may be inferred from a comparison of St. Luke's account with St. Matthew's, that at first, both the malefactors nailed on Him; but afterwards, one of them (Luke xxiii. 40), moved by the prodigies which he saw (the darkness and the earthquake, &c.), was penitent, and rebuked the other. So, first, Jews and Gentiles reviled Christ; but now the Gentiles repent, and plead with the Jews. Jerome.

In the two Thieves, one blaspheming, the other confessing Christ, some of the Fathers see a figure of the "duo populi," the Jew and the Gentile, ἀμφότεροι γὰρ ἄνομοι (says Theophyl. in Marc. xv.) ἀλλ' ὁ μὲν ἐθνικὸς εὐγνώμων, ὁ δὲ Ἰουδαϊκὸς βλάσφημος.

VOL. I.

45. Ἀπὸ δὲ ἑκτῆς ὥρας σκότος ἐγένετο] And darkness came over the land from the sixth hour until the ninth hour, i. e. from twelve o'clock, when our Lord was crucified, to three, when he expired.

As to the hour of the Crucifixion, see below, Mark xv. 25. John xix. 14.

Concerning this darkness, which could not have been an eclipse, the moon being then full, see Jul. African in Routh, R. S. ii. 297, 298, ἡν σκότος θεοποίητον, ibid. ii. 477, and iv. 7. Euseb. Chron. ad A.D. 33. Cf. Tertullian, Apol. 21, who appeals for the fact to the Roman Archives.

S. Cyril Hieros. p. 195, sees here a fulfilment of Zech. xiv. 6, 7, and Amos viii. 9.

By πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν, St. Matthew probably meant the Land of Judæa (Origen, Chrys.), and see Matt. ix. 26. Luke iv. 25; so that it would not be surprising if no mention of it is made in Heathen Historians.

At the first Passover, the Hebrews had light in their dwellings, while the rest of Egypt was dark; but now, when the True Passover is killed by them, they are in darkness; and the light of the Gospel is about to be poured on the Gentile world.

Observe, the Passover was to be killed at the full moon. When Christ suffered the Moon was full. Christ the Sun of Righteousness illumines the Church typified in Scripture by the Moon; and the fulness of her light is from the death of Christ.

46. λαμὰ σαβαχθανί] Ps. xxii. 1. Our Lord cries out, "My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" using the words of the Psalmist, in order that He might show with His last breath that He acknowledges the Old Testament. (Chrys.)

Our Lord, with His dying breath, taught us to refer this Psalm to the Messiah; it is therefore impiety not to apply it to Him. (Jerome.) Cp. Acts i. 20; iv. 25.

It would seem from this, and from Mark xv. 34, Ἐλω, Ἐλω, that our Lord used the vernacular, or Syro-Chaldaic words: "Hæc verba deprompta sunt ἐ Ps. xxii. 1, et Jesus, hæc vocem emittens, utebatur dialecto, quæ tunc in Judæa vigeat, atque verba ipsa ut Galilæus pronuntiabat. Pro ἥλι, ἥλι, Hebr. הָאֵל, הָאֵל ap. Marc. xv. 34, legitur, Ἐλω, Ἐλω; quod est Chald. הָאֵל, הָאֵל; Jesus vero pronuntiabat, v. ad xxvi. 73, הָאֵל, הָאֵל. Apud Marcum legitur λαμὰ, quia Hebr. et Chald. scribitur מָלַךְ. Pro Hebraico מָלַךְ usus est Jesus Chaldaico מַלְכִּי." (Rosenm., Kuin.)

May not this be an argument also for the use of vernacular Scriptures?

This voice is for our sakes; that we may know that Christ was perfect Man, having a human body and human soul, to the last. He spoke in our name. (Greg. Naz. 543. Athanas. adv. Arian. iii. pp. 478—480.) And that we should never despair, even if God hides His face from us. For Christ, Who uttered these words, was the Beloved Son in Whom He was well pleased; and with reverence be it said, the Father was never more pleased with Him than in this His act of humility and perfect obedience. And He was then heard (Heb. v. 7), and because He was obedient to death, even the death of the Cross, therefore God highly exalted Him, and gave Him a Name above every name (Phil. ii. 9).

— Θεέ] On this rare vocative for Θεός, see Winer, p. 59. Cp. Jud. xxi. 3. The LXX in the Psalm here quoted has ὁ Θεός μου. St. Paul uses Τιμόθεε, 1 Tim. i. 18; vi. 20.

48. καλάμῳ] with a reed. This is probably the stem of the hyssop, mentioned by St. John xix. 29, which grew from a stalk into a tuft; and, the cross not being high, might be reached by a person holding it. "Hyssopus caules erigit dodrantes aut altiores, duos ac lignosos." Dodonaus, de Stirp. iv. 19. See Mintert and Winer in v.

50. φωνῇ μεγάλῃ] with a loud voice. To show that He laid down His life by His own will, not from exhaustion of natural force.

He cried with a loud voice, and thus proved the truth of what He had said, No one taketh away My life from Me; I have power to lay down My life, and have power to take it again (John x. 18). Pilate, therefore, wondered that He was so soon dead (Mark xv. 44), and the centurion was the rather led to believe in Jesus, because He died with power (Mark xv. 39).

This cry rent the veil of the Temple; and opened the graves, and made the house of the Jews desolate. He showed His might by the raising of the dead, and by the quenching of the sun's light, and by the earthquake, and by a revolution in the elements.

He who rent the rocks and shook the earth, could have also destroyed His enemies; but in His mercy He spared them, and wrought these wonders for their conversion, and yet their hearts were hardened. (Chrys., Jerome.)

51. τὸ καταπέτασμα—ἐσχίσθησαν] the Veil of the Holy of Holies was rent in twain. Duo erant templi vela; interius, quo velatum erat Sanctum Sanctorum, quod Hebr. חֹדֶשׁ, ab Alex. καταπέτασμα dicitur, alterium exterius, quod erat ad introitum templi et Hebr. פָּרֹק, ab Alexandrinis κάλυμμα Exod. xxvi. 31. 33. 35, à Philone ἐπίσπαστρον vocatur. Velum Templi scissum est, ut omnia Legis revelata mysteria universis Gentibus proderentur. (Jerome. iv. 176.) Liber jam aditus in Sancta. (Bengel.)

The veil was rent. Thus our Lord showed His power and wrath, and at the same time His love. He intimated that what was before inaccessible, was now made easy of access, and that Heaven would be opened, and that He our Great High Priest would now enter the true Holy of Holies. They had said, "If He be King of Israel, let Him come down from the Cross;" but He proves Himself King of the World. They had derided Him, saying, "Thou that destroyest the Temple," He showed that it would be desolate, by rending the Veil. (Chrys.)

Concerning this Veil and its typical meaning, see below, Heb. vi. 19; ix. 3; x. 20.

52. κεκοιμημένων] of those who were asleep. κοιμᾶσθαι = ὑπνῶ, to sleep in death, 1 Kings xi. 43, and passim. Vorst. pp. 199, 202. John xi. 11. 14. Acts vii. 60; xiii. 36. See notes 1 Thess. iv. 13—15. 1 Cor. vii. 39; xi. 30; xv. 18, 20. 51.

—ἠγέρθη] arose from the graves. This is the eighth Resurrection recorded in Holy Scripture. There may be something symbolical in this number, which is specially connected in Holy Scripture with Resurrection. See on Luke xxiv. 1. The preceding ones are as follows:—

1. The Son of the Widow of Sarepta. 1 Kings xvii.
2. The Shunamite's Son. 2 Kings iv.
3. That caused by the bones of Elisha. 2 Kings xiii.
4. Jairus' Daughter. Mark v.
5. The Widow's Son at Nain. Luke vii.
6. Lazarus. John xi.
7. Christ Himself.

These bodies of the saints arose after Christ's Resurrection; and were an earnest of the general Resurrection consequent on the Resurrection of Christ. The Chief Priests had said, "He saved others, Himself He cannot save." He hanging upon the Cross raised the saints from their graves, and thus gave a pledge of the General Resurrection.

Although the graves were opened, yet none of the bodies of the Saints arose before the Resurrection of Christ; in order that He might be the firstborn from the dead. (Col. i. 18. 1 Cor. xv. 20. 23.) They did not appear generally to all persons, but to some chosen for that honour. (Jerome.)

The risen Saints entered the Holy City and appeared to many—as a pledge that all the bodies of the Saints will be raised hereafter, and enter the heavenly Jerusalem.

The fact of this Resurrection is referred to by S. Ignatius ad Magnes. 9.

53. ἐξεληθόντες] the masculine, after σώματα, indicating personal life and action. Cp. on Mark ix. 26.

—ἁγίαν πόλιν] the Holy City—Jerusalem, so called here by the Holy Ghost, even in the History of the Crucifixion. She was still the Holy City, because of God's goodness to her in the gifts and graces of the Holy Scripture, and of the Temple and its sacred offices, which she still by His mercy retained, though miserably abused by her who had received them, and who by her sins would, ere long, bring destruction from heaven upon herself.

This is an important testimony to the true doctrine concerning particular Churches, which make up the Church Visible on earth. Every such Church, as long as it retains the Word and the Sacraments of Christ, is a Holy City; but any one of such Churches may be rejected and destroyed for her sins.

The Visible Church of God was not destroyed by the taking of Jerusalem; but rather it was farther enlarged and more firmly established by that event. The Universal Church of Christ will never fail, though any one particular Church may.

—ἐνεφανίσθησαν] they appeared visibly. Whether they died again, or were received into glory, the Fathers are not agreed. See Aug. Epist. ad Euodium, 99. Theophyl. for the former opinion; and Origen, Jerome, and others (apud à Lapide) for the latter. Cf. Heb. xi. 40.

Samuel, in Mount Ephraim (1 Sam. i. 1), sometimes called Rama πρῶν, from Hebr. רומ (rum), elatum esse.

For a beautiful Homily on the Burial of Christ, ἐν τῷ ἀγίῳ καὶ μεγάλῳ σαββάτῳ, see S. Epiphani. ii. 259.

See further Luke xxiii. 51.

— τοῖνομα Ἰωσήφ] named Joseph. In addition to the parallelism in our Lord's Birth to life from the Virgin's Womb, and the second Birth of His humanity to eternal life from the Virgin Tomb (see v. 60), it may be noted that one Joseph was appointed by God to be guardian of His body in the Virgin Womb, and another Joseph was the guardian of His body in the Virgin Tomb, and each Joseph is called a just man in Holy Scripture; see Matt. i. 19. Luke xxiii. 50.

59. συνδόνι καθαρῷ] clean linen. συνδών is the word used by the LXX for the Hebr. שדין (sadhin), and seems to be derived from it, from root שדן (sadan), to cover. Arab. wool. The LXX sometimes uses ὀδόνιον (Jud. xiv. 13), as St. John does here, xix. 40, for συνδών.

Some of the Fathers applied this to the preparation to be made for the reception of Christ's mystical body in the Holy Eucharist. It is to be received in linen fine and white, which is the righteousness of saints. Rev. xix. 8.

By this simple burial of the Lord, a rebuke is given to those who cannot dispense with luxury, even in their graves. And, spiritually, we may say that whoever receives the body of Christ with a pure heart, wraps it in clean linen. (Jerome.)

60. καινῷ] new, free from corruption; and lest it should be said that some one of the saints had risen for Him, or had been the cause of His Resurrection. Cp. the history of Elisha, 2 Kings xiii. 21. (Bengel.)

The new tomb, in which none was ever laid. And thence He arose to everlasting life, as He had been born from the Virgin's womb. (Jerome.) Christ rose from the new tomb, without moving away the stone. He who, as man, entered life through the closed gate of the Virgin's womb, rose to immortality from a sealed sepulchre.

The Fathers observe here the analogy to His birth from the Blessed Virgin, "ut ex clauso Virginis utero natus, sic ex clauso sepulchro resurrexit, in quo nemo conditus fuerat, et postquam resurrexisset se per clausas fores in conspectum Apostolorum induxit." Cp. Ezech. xlv. 2. Greg. M.

S. Epiphani. (in Sepulch. Christi, tom. ii. p. 262) observes that Christ arose without breaking the seal of the tomb, — ὥστερ ἐσφραγισμένων τῶν κλειθρῶν τῆς παρθενικῆς φύσεως ἐκ παρθένου γεγενῆσθαι, — and he also remarks, that as He was presented in the Temple of the earthly Jerusalem forty days after His πρώτη γέννησις, so after forty days from His δευτέρα γέννησις, or birth from the grave, He presented Himself in the Temple of the heavenly Jerusalem.

— ἐν τῇ πέτρᾳ] in the rock. Concerning the Holy Sepulchre and the Church there built, see S. Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. 14, pp. 211. 216, and the authors there cited in the notes.

On the question whether the present site so called is the same as that of the Sepulchre, see the statements and authorities in Robinson, ii. 64. Later Researches, p. 254.

62. παρασκευῇ] the Preparation, i.e. for the Sabbath; hence Friday has this name (παρασκευήν) in the Eastern Church, and was observed in memory of the Crucifixion, "ab antiquo et ubique," says Routh, R. S. iv. 500; iii. 457. 467. 470; iv. 45. 74.

The following are from Authors of the third century. Victorinus (Routh, iii. 457): "Dies sextus parascæue dicitur: hoc die, ob passionem Domini, aut stationem Deo aut jejunium facimus. Die septimo requieuit ab omnibus operibus suis. Hoc die solemus superponere, ut Die Dominico cum gratiarum actione ad panem exeamus: eâ die resurrexit quâ lucem fecit." S. Peter Alex. (Routh, iv. p. 45), τὴν τετράδα νηστεύομεν διὰ τὸ γενόμενον συμβούλιον ὑπὸ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐπὶ τῇ προδοσίᾳ τοῦ Κυρίου, τὴν δὲ παρασκευὴν διὰ τὸ πεπονθέναί αὐτὸν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν τὴν γὰρ Κυριακὴν χαρμοσύνης ἡμέραν ἄγομεν διὰ τὸν ἀναστάντα ἐν αὐτῇ.

On the sixth day of the week (Friday) the first Adam was created; and on the seventh day God rested. So, Christ, the second Adam, Who by dying for us is become to us the Prince of Life, died on the sixth day, and by His death became the Author of the new creation of man; and on the seventh day He rested in the tomb; and on the first day, on which Light had been created at the beginning, the Light of the World arose from the darkness of the tomb.

The seventh-day Sabbath died and was buried with Christ, and the Sabbath rose again with Him in fresh glory and beauty on the first day of the week, and became the LORD'S DAY. Cp. on xxviii. 1. Col. ii. 16.

64. νυκτός] Not in some of the most ancient MSS.; cp. xxviii. 13.

— πλάνῃ] cp. πλάνος, v. 63. That will be worse for us than His former πλάνῃ in calling Himself the Messiah.

65. ὡς οὔδατε] as ye know: said with something of irony. Uti nosis—nam ego quidem de istâ re nihil laboro, vos atinet, me nihil spectat.

66. ἡσφάλισαντο] they made fast. A divine dispensation; that the evidence of Christ's power in His Resurrection might be more glorious.

The more strictly He is guarded by His enemies, the more clearly the power of His Resurrection is proved by us. (Jerome.)

It has been asked, If the stone was sealed and the watch set, how was it that the women came to anoint the body? (Mark xvi. 1. Luke xxiv. 1.) The sealing had not taken place on Friday, but on the Sabbath, the great Sabbath (xxvii. 62). The women had returned home (Luke xxiii. 56) on Friday afternoon, and prepared spices, and rested during the Sabbath, "according to the commandment," while the Priests were busy negotiating with Pilate for the watch, and in setting the seal on the tomb; and it is not probable that the women knew any thing of the matter. Cp. Arnoldi, p. 576.

CH. XXVIII. 1. Ὁψέ] Late, i.e. "nocte in auroram vergente." See Mark xvi. 2, ἰαν πρωί. The word ὀψέ is equivalent to the Hebrew ערב (ereb), and together with the morning makes the day. Gen. i. 5.

— σαββάτων] The Sabbath, or seventh day in the paschal week, was a high day. On that day, the second day of unleavened bread, and falling in that year on a Saturday, the first ripe sheaf of the harvest was to be waved before the Lord (Levit. xxiii. 10—12),—a prophecy of our Lord's Resurrection, and of our Resurrection also. (1 Cor. xv. 20.) Cp. Hos. vi. 2, quoted by S. Cyril P 2

Hierosol. p. 212. Bp. Pearson, on the Creed (Art. v. p. 486), appears to be of opinion that this year the sheaf was waved on the First Day of the week—the day of the Resurrection; and this perhaps may be explained by what is stated by Bp. Patrick on Levit. xxiii. 16.

— τῇ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ] illucescente. A remarkable expression. The Sabbath dawns into the Lord's Day, and shines in heavenly radiance in the whole Church, see xxvii. 62.

— μίαν σαββάτων] the first day of the week. μία = πρώτη, τῆς. Vorst. de Hebr. p. 47. See on Acts xx. 7. Thence called ἡ Κυριακή, 'dies Dominica' (dimanche), 'the Lord's Day.' Rev. i. 10. Cp. above, note on xxvii. 62.

On the due observance of the Lord's Day, see the excellent remarks in Sermon. 280, p. 3100, in Appendix to Sermons of S. Augustine. "Dominicum diem Apostoli et Apostolici viri ideo religiosā solemnitate habendum sanxerunt, quia in eodem Redemptor Noster à mortuis resurrexit, quique ideo Dominicus appellatur, ut in eo, à terrenis operibus vel mundi illecebris abstinentes, tantum divinis cultibus serviamus, dantes scilicet diei huic honorem et reverentiam propter spem Resurrectionis nostræ quam habemus in illā.

"Nam sicut Ipse Dominus, Jesus Christus et Salvator, resurrexit à mortuis, ita et nos resurrecturos in novissimo die speramus. Apparet autem hunc diem etiam in Scripturis Sanctis esse solennem. Ipse enim est primus dies sæculi, in ipso formata sunt elementa mundi, in ipso à mortuis resurrexit Christus, in ipso de celis Spiritus Sanctus super Apostolos descendit. Manna in eodem in eremo primum de celo datum est. Ideo sancti doctores Ecclesiæ decreverunt omnem gloriam Judaici Sabbati in illam transferre, ut quod ipsi in figurā, nos celebraremus in veritate; quia hinc erit Requies nostra vera, quando Resurrectio fuerit perpetrata, et remuneratio in animā et corpore simul perfecta. Observemus ergo diem dominicam, et sanctificemus illam sicut antiquis est de Sabbato præceptum." (Levit. xxiii. 32. 35.)

Christ resting in the grave consecrated to us the true Sabbath, which is rest from sin, and rest in Christ; that we may rise again to newness of life here, and to glory everlasting hereafter, for an eternal Lord's Day. And therefore Christ says, "Come unto Me, —and ye shall find Rest for your souls." See Macar. Hom. 35, "On the Old and New Sabbath," p. 191.

On the "case of the Sabbath," see Bp. Sanderson, v. 40; and on the divine Institution and perpetual obligation of the Lord's Day, Bp. Cosin, Works, iv. p. 451—461, and v. p. 529. Bingham, Ant. xx. 2. Hooker, V. lxx. and the Editor's Occasional Sermons, No. 44.

— ἡ ἄλλη Μαρία] the other Mary. The mother of James and Joseph, and, probably, the wife of Cleophas or Alphæus. Cp. James. 56. 61. Mark xv. 40. John xix. 25.

The women are said by the Evangelists to have come to the tomb at different times; this is no sign of error on their part (as is profanely alleged by some), but it is a proof of the zeal and love of those who could not bear to be long absent from the tomb of their Lord. (Jerome.)

For Homilies on the Resurrection, see Epiphany. ii. 276. S. Cyril Hierosol. Cat. 14, p. 205—216, and Bp. Andrewes, Sermon. ii. 185—427; iii. 1—103.

2. ἄγγελος] an angel. Our Lord, who is one and the same person, both Son of God and Son of Man, according to His two Natures, at one time shows signs of His greatness, at another of His humility. As Man He is crucified and buried, inclosed in a tomb sealed with a stone; but the deeds done in the outer world prove Him the Son of God; the sun hiding his face, the darkness covering the earth, the earth itself rocked by an earthquake, the veil torn, the rocks rent, the dead raised, the ministry of Angels. Angels attended Him at His birth. An Angel was sent to Mary, to Joseph, to the Shepherds. He is tempted in the wilderness, and after His victory Angels minister unto Him. Now an Angel comes to guard His tomb, and by his white raiment intimates the glory of His triumph; and at His ascension two Angels appear to the Apostles and give a promise of the second coming of Christ, when He will appear with legions of Angels. (Jerome.)

— ἀπεκύλισε τὸν λίθον] rolled away the stone. St. Matthew goes back to an earlier point. The stone had not been rolled away in order that Christ might rise from the tomb; but it was rolled away after His resurrection, in order that the women and others might go in and see where He had lain.

In the case of Lazarus, the stone was removed before he was raised by Christ; but Christ raised Himself, and the stone was removed afterwards.

Thus He showed the Divine Power by which He will hereafter call us all out of our graves, John v. 28. Rev. xx. 13.

5. γυναῖξιν] to the women. Death began with woman; and to women the first announcement is made of Resurrection. (Hilary.) See v. 9.

— ὑμεῖς] ye, emphatic: Let those Roman soldiers fear (v. 4) —not ye,—weak women though ye be,—for ye are seeking Jesus, who has been crucified, and has now raised Himself.

— ἐσταυρωμένον] crucified. After the Resurrection the Angel came and rolled away the Stone, in order that the women might see the tomb empty, and might believe that He was risen. And they were rejoiced (v. 8) when they saw it, for they were persuaded that no one could have taken away the body while the soldiers were watching the grave. And the Angel says, I know that ye seek Jesus who has been crucified. The Angel is not ashamed to speak of the cross; for that is the source of our blessings. (Chrys.)

6. ὁ Κύριος] the Lord: yours and ours; the Lord of life and death; and now declared to be such by His glorious Resurrection. See v. 2, where this angel is called ἄγγελος Κυρίου, and so Christ is acknowledged to be one with Jehovah.

7. Γαλιλαίαν· ἐκεῖ αὐτὸν ὄψεσθε] In Galilee of the Gentiles, despised by the Jews; in Galilee, the scene of His earthly ministry, not in Judæa;—an intimation that the Gospel, refused by the Jews, would be preached to the Heathen.

Probably this manifestation is the same as that mentioned by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 6.

8. ἐξελθοῦσαι] having come out of the sepulchre. St. Matthew does not tell us that they had gone in, but this circumstance is supplied by St. Luke xxiv. 3.

9. ἀπήντησεν αὐταῖς] He met them. After He had appeared specially to Mary Magdalene. (See Mark xvi. 9. John xx. 1. 11—18.) That previous appearance accounts for the readiness with which the women here acknowledge Jesus as risen.

— Χαίρετε] Hail ye! The women receive the reward of their constancy and faith; they were the first to see the sepulchre open, and to carry the good tidings of what they heard and saw. And Jesus Himself met them, and said, "All hail!" Observe, how our Lord elevates the weaker sex, which had fallen into dishonour through the transgression of Eve; and how He inspires it with hope, and heals its sorrows, and makes women to be messengers of glad tidings to His disciples. They hold Him by the Feet. We may perhaps wish to have been with them. And we may hold Christ now by receiving the holy eucharist with a pure heart; and if we are merciful to His members, we shall see Him coming with the Holy Angels at the great day, and not only receive His salutation, "All hail!" but hear the gracious words, "Come, ye blessed children of My Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." (Chrys.)

13—15. Εἴπατε—σήμερον] Say ye that His disciples came by night and stole Him away while we were asleep. Cp. Justin Martyr c. Tryphon. §§ 17. 108.

Veritatem absconderunt, mendacium vendiderunt, mendacium cæci cæcis. O vanitas vendens veritatem vanitati. Hodieque hoc est apud Judæos. Testimonium Martyrum nolunt audire, ut vivant; et testimonium dormientium audiunt, ut pereant. Si dormierunt custodes, unde poterant scire quis illum tulerit? Aut vigilabatis et custodire debebatis; aut dormiebatis, et quid sit factum nescitis. Aug. (Serm. 44 and 129.)

For an answer, by implication, to this calumny of the Chief Priests, see John xx. 6, 7.

17. Ἐδίστασαν] they doubted. Dubitatum est ab illis ne dubitaretur à nobis. (Leo M. Serm. lxxi. in Ascens. p. 152.)

18. Ἐδόθη μοι] Was given to Me as Man; for as God He had it from everlasting. It was given to Him in virtue of His Incarnation and humiliation, and of His perfect obedience as Man (Phil. ii. 8. Acts ii. 36; xiii. 33. 1 Pet. iii. 22). Given to Him it is for the protection of His Church and the subjugation of His adversaries (John xvii. 2). Cp. Athanas. c. Arian. Orat. i. p. 354, 355, who says, "Christ, as Son of Man, is said to receive, because He has a human body, which is by nature capable of reception; but He Himself as the Word possessed all things from the beginning because of His Divinity and perfection." This is enlarged upon by Athanas. adv. Arianos iii. pp. 26. 40. 456. 467. See also S. Basil de Spiritu Sancto, vol. iii. pp. 23—28.

This Power that has been given to Christ is that of His Mediatorial Kingdom, which He will exercise till the last Day (1 Cor. xv. 24, where see note), when all His enemies shall be put under His Feet (Ps. ii. 6. 9; ex. i. Heb. x. 13. See Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. vi., and below on Acts iii. 21). But His kingdom absolutely, in that He is God and Man for ever and ever, will have no end.

19. Πορευθέντες οὖν] Go ye therefore. The οὖν is not found in some MSS.—A, E, F, H, K, M, S, V, and may perhaps have been inserted in others to mark the connexion.—Since I, as God-Man, am universal Lord, therefore, go and bring all Nations under subjection to My sway by the ministry of the Word and Sacraments. He Who before His Passion said, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles" (Matt. x. 5), now that He has suffered and is risen, and about to ascend, says, "Go ye (μαθητεύσατε), make disciples of all Nations."

Here is an assertion of Christ's Universal Sovereignty, and of His claim to public homage from all Nations of the World. He now, as King of the Universe, demands obedience and honour from All Nations; and hereafter will "be gathered before Him as Judge of the World All Nations" (xxv. 32).

— μαθητεύσατε] make disciples of. μαθητεύσαι is preparatory to διδάσκειν, which marks a continual habit. See the use of the word μαθητεύσαι ch. xxvii. 57.

— βαπτίζοντες] baptizing them. The Jews baptized Proselytes into the Name of One God. This One God is revealed to Christians as being in three Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. See Waterland, Serm. viii. on this text.

— εἰς τὸ ὄνομα] Not in, but into the Name; and not Names (plural), but into the One Name; i. e. admit them by the Sacrament of Baptism into the privileges and duties of Faith in, and Obedience to, the Name of the One God, in three Persons, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost (S. Hieron., S. Cyril Alex. in Joh. i., Euthym.), and into participation of, and communion with, the Divine Nature. On ὄνομα, see above, vi. 9; xviii. 20, on εἰς τὸ ὄνομα. "Christ," says Athanas. p. 555, "has founded His Church in the belief in the Holy Trinity."

— καὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ] and of the Son. From this junction of the Son with the Father, Athanasius (adv. Arian. ii. 41, p. 402) demonstrates the Godhead of the Son. The same may be said of the Holy Ghost. (See Athanas. ad Serapion. § 12, pp. 528. 541, 542. 553; and Greg. Naz. Orat. xxxi. de Spiritu Sancto, et Orat. xxxiii. p. 615.) Indeed this Baptismal formula is a declaration from Christ, that His Religion is grounded on a Profession of Belief in, and Obedience to, One God in three Divine Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. See Waterland's excellent Sermon on this text, Serm. viii. vol. ii. p. 172.

And on the difference between the doctrine of the Trinity, and Tritheism on the one side, and Arianism on the other, see ibid. p. 447, and Dr. Barrow, Defence of the Blessed Trinity, iii. 495—519.

On the privileges founded on Christian Baptism, see, among others, the beautiful Sermon in S. Hippolyt. i. p. 261, and Greg. Nazian. pp. 692. 729, Orat. xl. S. Jerome, ad Lucifer, says, p. 292, "In Patre et Filio et Spiritu Sancto baptizatus homo Templum Domini fit; quum veteri eade destructa novum Trinitatis delubrum aedificatur."

20. μεθ' ὑμῶν] with you, and with those in whom your Apostolic authority to preach and administer the Sacraments will be continued to the end, and in whom therefore it will live by My Power.

— πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας] all the days. I shall never be absent from you a single day; I shall never be absent in any of the days of the greatest trial and affliction of the Church; but I shall remain with her till the last Day, when you will see Me again in bodily presence.

— ἕως] until the end of the world. I shall be with you always till that time; and shall never be absent from you after it. (Greg. Nazian. p. 542.) See above on i. 25, and xvi. 28.

Christ is now with us; hereafter, if we continue His to the end, we shall be for ever with the Lord. 1 Thess. iv. 17.

Why did not St. Matthew mention the Ascension? Why did not St. John? They were both present at it; but St. Mark and St. Luke, who describe it, were not. The Holy Spirit inspired St. Matthew and St. John. And He inspired St. Mark and St. Luke to describe what they did not see. They saw it and describe it by the Spirit's aid. And when He was writing by St. Matthew He knew that He would describe the Ascension by St. Mark and St. Luke; and when He was writing by St. John He knew that He had sufficiently described it by them. And St. John takes it for granted as a fact well known to the Church. (See John vi. 62; xx. 17.) St. Matthew's silence is that of foresight; St. John's silence is that of assent. And "blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (John xx. 29).

INTRODUCTION

TO

ST. MARK'S GOSPEL.

It appears from external testimony that the Evangelist St. Mark was the son of Mary, who dwelt at Jerusalem, and whose house was resorted to by the Apostle St. Peter, on his deliverance from the prison by an Angel¹.

After St. Peter's departure from Jerusalem², St. Mark was associated with the Apostle St. Barnabas, who was his near kinsman³; and he travelled together with him and St. Paul, after their ordination to the Apostleship, during the former part of their first Missionary tour, in Cyprus⁴ and in Asia; and he remained with them till their arrival in Pamphylia, when he departed from them, and went back to Jerusalem⁵.

Paul and Barnabas, after their return to Antioch in Syria, and after the Council at Jerusalem, and a sojourn of some time at the Syrian Antioch, resolved to undertake a second missionary journey into Asia; and Barnabas was desirous of again having his kinsman Mark as their companion; but this wish was resisted by St. Paul, and led to a separation between them; and Paul took Silas⁶, or Silvanus, with him, and went through Syria and Cilicia; but Barnabas took Mark⁷, and sailed to Cyprus, his own country⁸. This happened about A.D. 50⁹.

Subsequently we hear nothing of St. Mark from the New Testament for an interval of about twelve years; when we find him restored to the friendship and entire confidence of St. Paul, then at Rome, in his first imprisonment. St. Mark is with him, and is described by St. Paul as his *fellow-labourer*¹⁰, and the salutations of Mark "the cousin of Barnabas," are sent by the Apostle, together with those of the "beloved Physician," the Evangelist St. Luke, to the Colossian Church, and to St. Paul's Colossian friend, Philemon¹¹. St. Mark is specially commended by St. Paul to the favourable reception of the Church of the Colossians, in Phrygia; whom, it would seem, he designed to visit at that time. Perhaps St. Mark was then on his way to meet his father in the faith, St. Peter. He next appears in St. Peter's company, when that Apostle was at Babylon¹², where he wrote his first Epistle to the Christians of Asia Minor, both Jewish and Gentile¹³; and St. Peter concludes that Epistle with sending to them a salutation from Marcus his son, who may therefore be presumed to have been well known to the Asiatic Christians, and to have laboured among them.

Shortly after this date, we see St. Mark in Asia Minor, in the neighbourhood of Ephesus. St. Paul, now in his second imprisonment at Rome, and on the eve of martyrdom, writes to Timothy, the Bishop of Ephesus, and desires him to come and bring Mark with him, "for," adds the Apostle, "he is profitable to me for the ministry¹⁴." This apostolic testimony closes the historical notices of St. Mark in Holy Scripture. Such is the honourable witness which he received from St. Paul; and we have seen that he is mentioned in affectionate terms by the Apostle St. Peter, calling him his son.

These Scriptural notices of St. Mark are illustrated by the ancient records of Church History, which attribute to this Evangelist an intimate connexion with the Apostle St. Peter. It is asserted by early authorities¹, that St. Mark wrote his Gospel under the eye of St. Peter; and that it was written at the request of the Christians² at Rome, who heard St. Peter preach there; or, as others say³, it was dictated by that Apostle at Rome, with a special view to circulation in Italy and among the Romans generally; and that St. Mark was sent afterwards by St. Peter to Alexandria in Egypt; and that he was the first Bishop of that Church⁴; and that the Catechetical school at Alexandria, which produced a succession of learned teachers, was founded under his authority⁵.

It is observable, that he bore the surname of Mark, a Roman name, in addition to his Hebrew name John; and perhaps he was thus designated with a view to intercourse with Gentiles, especially with Romans; as the Hebrew name of Saul was changed into Paul for a like reason⁶.

The external testimonies above recited are corroborated by the internal evidence presented to us in the Gospel of St. Mark;

1. It is the shortest of all the Gospels. This characteristic harmonizes with the design assigned to it by Ecclesiastical writers, who inform us that it was specially intended for Roman use. The brevity of this Gospel would commend it to the acceptance of a great body of the Roman people, especially of the middle classes, engaged in practical business, legal affairs, commercial enterprise, and military campaigns, and migrating in frequent journeys from place to place. Such an Evangelical Manual as this, would be particularly appropriate and serviceable to them. Accordingly we find it distinguished from the other Gospels by the introduction of Latin words, and by an accommodation of phraseology to Roman usages⁷. The Evangelist seems to suppose that his readers are not familiar with Jewish topography⁸ and Jewish customs⁹. And in his own narrative he rarely¹⁰ quotes the Jewish Scriptures; and never, in his own person, cites any Hebrew writer by name.

2. The narrative of St. Mark's Gospel, as far as it goes, coincides in a great measure with that of St. Matthew, both in substance and in language. Indeed, there are clear evidences that it was St. Mark's design to repeat much that had been already said by *St. Matthew*¹¹.

The question, therefore, here arises,—whether St. Mark's Gospel is not, consequently, inferior in value to that of St. Matthew; whether, in a word, it may not be regarded, in a great measure, merely as a transcript, and an epitome of another previous narrative; and whether the Gospel of St. Mark can be regarded as a divinely-inspired work, unless we are ready to allow that it is consistent with the dignity of the Holy Spirit to be a mechanical copyist of what has been already written?

To these questions it may be replied, that it will be found, on a careful perusal of St. Mark's Gospel, that there are numerous evidences of original and independent knowledge possessed by the writer; that there are several important incidents related, and divine speeches recorded, in this Gospel, and in it *alone*¹². The historical narrative of this Gospel is singularly¹³ graphic and picturesque. The Author makes use of the *present tense*¹⁴ more frequently than any of the Evangelists, and appears to realize the transactions described, as actually before his own eyes, and to endeavour to place them vividly before the reader. He recites more often than any of the Evangelists the very *words of Christ*¹, not in Greek, the language in which he was writing, but in the original Syro-Chaldaic uttered by Christ; as if the sound of that Divine Voice was still ringing in his ears; and he notices more frequently the expression of Christ's aspect and look², as if the features of that Blessed Countenance were indelibly graven on his memory.

Besides, many incidents in it confirm the statement of ancient Church History, that this Gospel was written under the inspection of St. Peter; and it is an interesting and instructive circumstance, that the failings of St. Peter are described more fully in this Gospel than in any other, while less is said in it of those things which redound to the honour of that Apostle³.

Therefore, since this Gospel was composed under the eye of that Apostle, who was present at our Lord's miracles, teaching, and secret retirements, no doubt can be entertained of the writer's qualifications to supply a full and minute record of our Lord's Ministry.

In those very passages, also, where St. Mark's narrative coincides in substance and language with that of St. Matthew, he rarely fails to introduce some slight incident, marking his own minute personal acquaintance with what he is relating. Consequently, he repeats St. Matthew, not because he does not know, of his own individual knowledge, the truth of what he is writing, but because he does know it; and because he also knows, that his predecessor St. Matthew has given a faithful account of it: and therefore he adopts that account; and this adoption, by such a writer, is the strongest confirmation of the truth of the narrative of St. Matthew which he adopts.

Surely this was a wise course of procedure. It was one that might well have been suggested to the Evangelist St. Mark by the Holy Spirit of Truth.

The Holy Ghost Himself had inspired the Evangelist St. Matthew, who had proved his love for Christ by leaving all for His sake; and who, as one of the chosen Twelve, was a constant companion of Christ, and thus, in human respects, was a competent witness of His actions; and who received the supernatural effusion of the Holy Ghost on the Day of Pentecost, and was led by Him into all truth⁴, and was enabled by Him to remember all that Christ had said to the Apostles⁵. Therefore the Gospel of St. Matthew was the work of the Holy Ghost.

Doubtless, the Apostle St. Matthew was chosen by divine Providence, on account of his personal graces and qualifications, as a fit instrument for the work of an Evangelist; but in writing a Gospel for the perpetual edification of the Church, he wrote as he was moved by the Holy Ghost⁶; and accordingly his Gospel has ever been acknowledged by the Spirit of God, speaking in the Church, and receiving that Gospel as divinely-inspired Scripture.

In like manner, St. Mark was prepared for the work of an Evangelist by human discipline and earthly opportunities; but his Gospel is the work of the Holy Ghost. He was, probably, an inhabitant of Jerusalem⁷, and, on that account, possessed local advantages and personal qualifications for writing the history of our Lord's actions and sufferings. He was a kinsman of the Apostle Barnabas, and an intimate friend and son in the faith of the Apostle Peter. He has been honoured with a high testimony by St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles; and there is good reason for believing that his Gospel was composed under the superintendence of the Apostle St. Peter, who was the constant follower of Christ, and was endued with miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, and was the chosen instrument of God in opening the door of the Church to the Gentile world⁸, and was eminently the Apostle of the Circumcision⁹. The Gospel of St. Mark, composed under such auspices, has ever been received as divinely-inspired Scripture, by the common consent of the Universal Church, to which Christ promised His presence, and the guidance of the Holy Ghost.

We should therefore be taking a low and erroneous view of the subject, if we were to say that St. Mark copied St. Matthew, or that the Holy Spirit transcribed any passages of a human writer.

The true statement of the case is this. The Holy Spirit, Who had been pleased to choose and to employ the appropriate instrumentality of the holy Apostle St. Matthew, who had been called by Christ and heard His teaching, and had been baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire, to write the first of the four Gospels, chose also and employed the appropriate agency of St. Mark for the work of an Evangelist; and by his instrumentality He vouchsafed to repeat some portions of that sacred message, which He, the same Spirit, had been pleased to deliver by St. Matthew ; and thus, by choosing fit instruments for the work, He condescended to give such evidence of the truth of the Gospel as would be of weight with reasonable men, arguing on earthly premises and considerations ; and at the same time by repeating in a second Gospel what He had spoken in a preceding one, He imparted greater solemnity to what had been uttered, and gave to the world the strongest assurance of its truth by this reiteration, and showed by this specimen, that though the Gospels written by St. Matthew and St. Mark had not only a general design for the edification of all, but also a special purpose and peculiar direction,—the one being intended particularly for Jewish readers, the other specially for Romans, and for a mixed society of Gentiles and Jews ;—yet that in substance, and also in great measure in letter, there is one and the same Gospel for all ¹.

This process of Repetition is by no means derogatory to the dignity of the Holy Spirit. On the contrary, it is one of the characteristics of Inspiration. It pervades the whole Volume of Revelation. It is a consequence of the dignity of the subject, and of the love of God, who desires to afford the clearest proofs of the truth of what He delivers, and of its unspeakable importance to men ².

A question naturally suggests itself here ;

If St. Mark's Gospel was written under the inspection of St. Peter ³, and, as some ancient writers have said, from his dictation, why was it not rather inscribed with the name of that Apostle ? Would it not have had greater weight, if it had borne that name ?

Perhaps, with reverence be it said, the Holy Spirit may have intended to teach some practical lessons by this arrangement ;

St. Mark is known from Holy Scripture as "the son" of St. Peter. The Gospel written by St. Mark's instrumentality has ever been regarded by the Church as having been composed under the sanction and authority of his spiritual father. It may be considered virtually as much the Gospel of St. Peter as if St. Peter's name were prefixed to it. It therefore, in fact, possesses the weight of that Apostolic name. But the adoption of another name in its title has its proper use and significance. It may be recognized as a silent token of the humility of the Apostle St. Peter, not ambitious for the exhibition of his own name in the eye of the world. Perhaps also he was of opinion, that, as one Gospel had been already written by an Apostle, St. Matthew, it might be more conducive to the edification of the Church, if the next Gospel were not designated with the name of any of the Apostolic body, lest it might be imagined by some that the graces of the Holy Ghost and the gift of Inspiration were limited to particular persons ; or that the Apostles of Christ had a Gospel of their own, which was not equally received by the whole body of believers. The Holy Spirit might deem it expedient to employ St. Mark, who was not an Apostle, in delivering the same Gospel as had been preached by word of mouth and in writing by Apostles, in order to show the unity and universality of that Gospel ; and that it signifies little, who the organ is, by whom the Holy Ghost speaks, or who the instrument is, by which He writes ; but that the main thing to be considered is, what is spoken and what is written, and from whom the message comes. Who is Paul ? Who is Apollos ? Who is Cephas ? Who is Mark ? but ministers, by whom ye believed, as the Lord gave to every man ⁴.

Lastly, we may regard it as a memorable proof of the divine mercy, that St. Mark, who was permitted for a time to falter in the faith, and to depart from St. Paul and Barnabas in Pamphylia ⁵, became, under the converting influence of the Holy Spirit co-operating with his own endeavours, a signal instrument of God's power in strengthening the faith of others in every age and country, and in diffusing the glorious Gospel throughout the world. Thus the Evangelist St. Mark, and his spiritual father the Apostle St. Peter, stand together in the History of the Church as imperishable monuments of the divine grace and love ; and the same consolatory words of Christ are applicable to both : "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not ; and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren" ⁶.

² See above, Introduction to the Four Gospels ; and below, the Introduction to the Book of Revelation.

³ See above, p. 112, and the assertion of S. Clement of Alexandria (in Euseb. vi. 14), who says that when Peter had preached the Gospel, by the Spirit, at Rome, many who heard him requested St. Mark to commit to writing what was preached ; and that he complied with their desire.

Preliminary Note.

The parallel passages of St. Matthew are referred to in the margin of this Edition of St. Mark's Gospel; and the Notes on those parallel passages in St. Matthew may be consulted for the elucidation of this Gospel. Some expository remarks may also be found occasionally in the parallel places of St. Luke, which are likewise noted in the margin of this Gospel.

CH. I. 1. Ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου] The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. St. Mark begins his Gospel with that good confession which gained for his father in the faith, St. Peter, that glorious testimony from Christ. Matt. xvi. 18.

St. Matthew and St. John, the Apostolical Evangelists, begin the Gospel with the Generation of Christ; St. Matthew with His Human Generation; St. John with His Divine. See on Matt. i. 1. Luke i. 2; iii. 23. John i. 1.

St. Luke begins the Gospel with John the Baptist; St. Mark with an appeal to ancient Prophecy. Hence Irenæus thus speaks (iii. 10. 6): "Marcus Interpret et sectator Petri, initium Evangelicæ conscriptionis fecit sic—Initium Evangelii, &c., manifestè initium Evangelii faciens Sanctorum Prophetarum Voces."

He observes also that St. Mark concludes his Gospel with the Ascension (he therefore regarded the conclusion as genuine), and with a reference to the words of ancient prophecy predicting it, "He sat down at the right hand of God." Cp. Ps. cx. 1; see also Bede here.

Hence Irenæus shows, against the Gnostic heresies, that the God of the Old and the New Testament is One and the Same: "Unus et idem Deus et Pater, à Prophetis annuntiatus, ab Evangelio traditus, quem Christiani colimus, et diligimus ex toto corde, Factorem cœli et terræ et omnium quæ in eis sunt."

On the use of the word εὐαγγέλιον, see above, on the title of St. Matthew's Gospel; below, x. 29.

2. ἐν Ἡσαΐα] in Isaiah the Prophet. The prophecy is in Mal. iii. 1. Isa. xl. 3. The Holy Spirit in the New Testament often combines two or more prophecies from different books of the Old Testament, and only specifies one Prophet by name.

See above on Matt. xxvii. 9. Elz. has here ἐν τοῖς προφήταις, in the Prophets,—a reading which is found in A, E, F, H, M, P, S, U, V, I, and in the majority of Cursives, and in some Versions; but the reading in the text, which is in B, D, L, Δ, and in many Cursives and Versions, and is supported by the authority of Origen, Irenæus, and Jerome, and by internal evidence, appears to be preferable, and has been adopted by most recent Editors.

All the Prophecies delivered by the Prophets are from One and the Same Spirit; and therefore the Evangelists do not specify minutely in detail the names of the Prophets through whom the several Prophecies come: "Quæcunque per eos Sanctus Spiritus dicit et singula sunt omnium et omnia singulorum." (Bede.) The Exposition of Bede on St. Mark is a catena. See his Epistola Dedicatoria. And therefore what is cited as from Bede, is for the most part of an earlier age.

It is observable, that St. Mark himself, in his own narrative, quotes the Old Testament only twice, here and xv. 28. Cp. Townson, p. 100.

4. Ἐγένετο Ἰωάννης βαπτίζων] For an excellent exposition of this text, showing how John's Baptism was "the beginning of the Gospel," see Cyril Hierosol. Cat. 3, p. 42.

—βάπτισμα μετανοίας εἰς ἄφεσιν] the Baptism of Repentance for the remission of sins. St. John's Baptism exacted, as a condition of its reception, a change of mind and life, with a view to pardon from Christ. And thus he acknowledged that his own baptism was only temporary and manuductory to the Baptism of Christ, which brings remission of sins (see v. 8). (Theophylact.) Cp. Jerome adv. Lucifer. p. 293.

To speak (says Gregory Nazian. Orat. 39) on the difference of Baptisms. Moses baptized in the water, the cloud, and the sea, but this was done figuratively. John baptized, not according to the Jewish rite, but for the remission of sins, yet not with the Spirit. Jesus baptized with Water and the Spirit. There is a fourth Baptism—that of Blood—of Martyrdom for Christ.

5. πᾶσα] all; i.e. a great part. Cp. below, v. 33, πόλις ὅλη, and Matt. iii. 5, πάντες, i.e. πολλοί.

—Ἰορδάνῃ ποταμῷ] in the river Jordan. St. Matthew says "in the Jordan," iii. 6, where however some MSS. add ποταμῷ, but that addition (which is not in the majority of the MSS.) seems to have been imported from St. Mark, whose Gospel was written for the use of persons unacquainted with the geography and usages of Judeæ. Cp. vii. 3.

7. ὁ ἰσχυρότερός] More emphatic than ἰσχυρότερος. He who is stronger κατ' ἐσχόνην:—the stronger: and who is stronger than all.

— λῦσαι τ. ἰ. τ. ὑ.] to loose his shoe's latchet. On the variety between this expression and that in St. Matthew (iii. 11), see note there. They are fully accounted for by Luke (iii. 16). See above, Introduction to the Four Gospels.

12. ἐκβάλλει] Matt. ix. 38.

13. Σατανᾶ] Satan. See Matt. iv. 10. Both Matthew (iv. 1) and Luke (iv. 2) use Διάβολος in the beginning of the History of the Temptation,—a word never used by St. Mark.

— θηρίων] He was with the wild beasts; unhurt by them, as Adam in Paradise. (Cf. Job v. 22.) Inter bestias commoratur ut homo, sed ministerio utitur Angelico ut Deus. (Bede.)

The mention of this incident, that our Lord was with the wild beasts, suggests an argument against the opinion that the region between Jerusalem and Jericho was the Scene of the Temptation.

It is more probable that our Lord's Temptation was in the wilderness of Arabia, where the Israelites were proved by God forty years. Our Blessed Lord, the Son of God, was the Head of the Israel of God. See on Matt. ii. 15, ἐξ Αἰγύπτου ἐκάλισα τὸν Υἱόν μου. The literal Israel was forty years ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, our Lord was forty days in the wilderness. The Law was given to the literal Israel, but that Law was disobeyed by the people; and their carcases fell in the wilderness (Heb. iii. 17). In the wilderness Christ used the Law as His Weapon against the Tempter; and He conquers Satan by it. In the wilderness Moses and Elias fasted forty days, and Christ fasts forty days in the wilderness. Perhaps it was in the same wilderness; that of Arabia. And this is not at variance with the language with which the Holy Spirit describes His passage from Jordan to the wilderness,—ἦγετο ἐν τῷ Πνεύματι,—ὑπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος ἐκβάλλει αὐτὸν τὸ Πνεῦμα, which may describe a rapid translation, such as that by which Prophets and Evangelists were caught up and carried to a distance (1 Kings xviii. 12. 2 Kings ii. 16. Acts viii. 39). Cp. Milton, Paradise Regained, i. 350.

15. πιστεύετε ἐν τ. ε.] Something more than πιστεύ. τ. ε.—Repose your faith in—build your belief on—the Gospel. Cp. Vorst. Hebr. p. 670.

16. Σίμωνα] Simon. He calls Peter, and afterwards John (v. 19). The Fathers regard Peter as the Apostolic σύμβολον πρακτικῆς, and John as σύμβολον θεωρίας, and say that they must both be united; but that πρακτικὴ must precede θεωρία. See Theophyl. here, and Aug. on John xxi.

— ἦσαν γὰρ ἀλιεῖς] for they were fishers. This parenthesis, introduced in a remarkable manner in the midst of the narrative, is found also placed in the same way in St. Matthew's account (iv. 18), and confirms the opinion, that St. Mark had seen St. Matthew's Gospel, and intentionally repeats portions of it. Cp. notes below, vi. 17; xv. 1; and see Introduction, p. 113.

17. Δεῦτε — ἀλιεῖς] σαγγηνέει ἀλιεῖς, ἵνα ἀλιεῖς ἀνθρώπων γένωνται.

20. μετὰ τῶν μισθωτῶν] with the hired servants. A slight incident, mentioned only by St. Mark, and showing, that while he adopts St. Matthew's narrative, it is not because he himself is ignorant of the circumstances of the narrative, but because he knows them, and because he knows St. Matthew's narrative to be true. Thus his repetitions are a corroboration of the History of the Gospel as written by St. Matthew. See below, xiv. 51.

23. ἐν πνεύματι ἁκ.] in an unclean spirit, as in a prison. (See v. 2.) The preposition ἐν is the more appropriate, because Roman prisoners were chained to their keepers (see Acts xii. 6), and were thus in their grasp.

24. Ἐα] not from ἔαω, but ἀἷ!

— ὁ ἅγιος] the Holy One. Theophylact observes the force of the definite article here. Thou art ὁ μόνος ἅγιος, ὁ ἁρισμμένος.

25. φιμώθητι] See Matt. xxii. 12, and on Luke iv. 35. Cf. v. 34.

27. διδαχὴ] See Acts xiii. 12.

29. καὶ Ἀνδρέου] and of Andrew. The two other Evangelists (Matt. viii. 14, and Luke iv. 38) describe this house as the house of Peter, or Simon only; but St. Mark, writing probably at St. Peter's dictation (see Introduction), includes his brother Andrew as a joint possessor of it. He also mentions the presence of James and John, which the others do not.

32. ὅτε ἔδν ὁ ἥλιος] when the sun set. For it was the Sabbath. See v. 21. 29.

34. οὐκ ἤφιε] On this form see Winer, p. 74. Cp. below, xi. 16. — ὅτι ᾗδειςαν] He allowed not the devils to speak, because they knew Him. Cp. Luke iv. 41, and see above, v. 24. The devils,—probably from the defeat of their prince and leader Satan, at the Temptation,—had a clearer knowledge than men had of Christ's person at this time. (See on Matt. iv. 24.) Christ would not allow Evil Spirits to be His preachers, lest He might be supposed to be in league with them, instead of having come into the world to destroy their power, and to free men from it. Our Lord had special reasons for refusing the testimony of devils, because, if He had accepted it, some countenance might thus seem to be given to the calumny of His enemies, that He acted in collusion with them, and cast out devils by Beelzebub (Matt. xii. 24. Mark iii. 22).

The devil's testimony is not to be received, because, if it is approved, when he speaks true (for he sometimes uses truth as a bait), he may more easily deceive when it is false. (See Euthym. and Athanas. Epist. Encycl. p. 215.)

Our Lord shows also, that though He accepts praise from the humble and sincere of heart, He is not to be beguiled by the flattery of hypocrites from punishing their sins. In like manner St. Paul stopped the mouth of the πνεῦμα Πόθωνος, who tried to conciliate him by calling him the servant of the Most High God.

See on Acts xvi. 16, and note above on Matt. viii. 4, and below, v. 45.

35. πρωὶ] early; on the first day of the week. It may deserve inquiry, whether our Lord did not give some prophetic intimations, even before His Resurrection, of the future sanctification of this day as the Lord's Day. See above on Matt. xxviii. 1.

37. σέ] Thee, emphatic. Thou art the object of their search: a preferable reading to ζητοῦσί σε.

38. ἐχομένας κωμοπόλεις] the neighbouring villages. ἐχόμενος = ἑγγύς, Suid. So ἐχομένη ἡμέρα (χθές), Acts xxi. 26. See also Luke xiii. 33. Acts xx. 15. Heb. vi. 9. Christ came to preach to the poor in villages, as well as to the rich in towns. Cp. Matt. ix. 35. The words pagan and paganism show the need of attention to this example. And one of the best tests of the soundness of a Church is,—does it imitate Him in this respect?

39. εἰς τὰς συναγωγὰς] A preferable reading to ἐν ταῖς συν., which would hardly have been altered by the copyists to εἰς τ. σ. It means something more than in the synagogues: He proclaimed the glad tidings of the Gospel to the synagogues of the Jews, where hitherto had only been heard the voice of the Law and the Prophets. Cp. xiii. 9, δαρήσεσθε εἰς συν. xiv. 9, κηρυχθῆ εἰς κόσμον. Luke iv. 44, where some MSS. have εἰς τὰς σ. vii. 1, εἰς ἀκόδς. xi. 7, εἰς κοίτην. xxi. 37, εἰς τὸ ὄρος.

43. ἐμβριμησάμενος αὐτῷ] rebuking him He immediately cast them out; ἐμβριμησάμενος = ἀυστηρῶς ἐμβλέψας καὶ ἐπισείσας τὴν κεφαλὴν (says Euthym., ad Matt. ix. 30), "gravier interminatus cum indignatione expulit,"—a remarkable expression, showing that nothing of worldly applause was sought by our Lord from those whom He healed. Cp. Matt. viii. 4.

These notices of our Blessed Lord's aspect are peculiarly characteristic of St. Mark, and bespeak the work of an eye-witness. See below, iii. 5; vii. 34; ix. 15; x. 32.

45. ἤρξατο κηρύσσειν] he began to publish abroad. Our Lord, by vehemently and even indignantly charging the Leper to tell no man, had openly shown (v. 43) that He had no desire for worldly praise; and thus He had proved that He did not resemble the vain-glorious Teachers of the Jews, who loved the praise of men, and to be called Rabbi, Rabbi (Matt. xxiii. 7. John xii. 43); and that in His wisdom and charity He would not minister any occasion to their envy and rancour against Him by any ambitious aspirations of rivalry; and so He gave us a lesson of humility, prudence, charity, and tender consideration for our enemies.

But though it became Him to show no desire for worldly fame, but to decline it on His own part, yet it was to be expected, and indeed was requisite,—that the knowledge of His mighty works, being the evidence of His mission, should be diffused by others; and since the diffusion of that knowledge without His consent, and even against His command, would have greater effect on the minds of many, especially in Palestine, on that very account, He did not refuse to do works of mercy to those who, He foreknew, would divulge them against His command, and publish them the more because He forbade the publication. See vii. 36.

Perhaps also the Holy Spirit thus designs to teach, that the true way to obtain eternal glory is to shun earthly glory; and that in proportion as we decline praise here, the more we shall receive it hereafter, when our Father, Who seeth in secret, will reward us openly. Cp. Matt. vi. 4—6.

CH. II. 1. εἰς οἶκον] at home,—whence He had been absent for some time.

2. χωρεῖν μηδὲ τὰ πρὸς τὴν θύραν] So that not only the house was not able to contain them, but not even its court-yard and approaches were able to do so. On this use of χωρεῖν see John xxi. 25.

These minute notices, introduced particularly by St. Mark in his narratives of our Lord's miraculous works, seem to be recorded by the Evangelist with a studied design, lest it should be supposed that, because he incorporates so much which is in St. Matthew's Gospel, he was only a copyist; and in order to show that he did so because he knew from ocular testimony that St. Matthew's narrative was adequate and accurate. See above, p. 112, 3, Introduction to this Gospel, and next note.

3. ὑπὸ τεσσάρων] by four; and unable to help himself in any respect. Another minute particular, showing that the narrative is an independent one, and from an eye-witness.

For other similar minute notices in St. Mark's Gospel see iv. 38, ἦν αὐτὸς ἐν τῇ πρῶμῃ ἐπὶ τὸ προσκεφάλαιον καθέδων. vi. 39, συμπόσια συμπόσια, ἐπὶ τῷ χωρῷ χόρτῳ. viii. 14, εἰ μὴ ἐν ἄρτον. ix. 24, μετὰ δακρύων, and the whole of the narrative, ix. 17—27. x. 16, ἐναγκαλισάμενος αὐτὰ, τίθεις τὰς χεῖρας ἐπ' αὐτὰ, εὐλογεῖ αὐτά. x. 17, προσδραμὼν εἰς καὶ γονυπετήσας αὐτόν, and x. 46—52.

Hence also St. Mark often gives, and alone gives, the ipsis- sima verba used by our blessed Lord on certain solemn occasions in the Syro-Chaldaic or Aramaic dialect, then spoken in Palestine. See iii. 17, βοανεργῆς. v. 41, ταλιθὰ κοῦμι. vii. 11, κορβάν. vii. 34, ἐφθαθά.

St. Mark also has shown his independence by relating some miracles, and that in a most minute and graphic manner, which are not mentioned by any other Evangelist. See vii. 32; viii. 22.

4. ἀπεστέγασαν τὴν στέγην ὅπου ἦν, καὶ ἐξορύξαντες] they unroofed the house where he was, and having made a hole (in the ceiling), &c. This cannot mean (as some interpret it) that they took off the breastwork (lorica, Deut. xxii. 8) of the house, and let the man into the court-yard (atrium); but, as St. Luke shows (v. 19), it signifies that they took off a part of the tiled roof, and let him down through the aperture thus made. Our Lord was teaching in a house (εἰς οἶκον, vv. 1, 2); it was not possible for any to approach Him by the door, for the crowd (v. 2). The four men who carried the paralytic mounted with their charge to the flat roof of the house (Luke v. 19), probably by means of an access from a contiguous house. Perhaps the στέγη, or roof of tiles, in which an opening was made (Luke v. 19), was the covering of the four-sided interior colonnade of the atrium or court-yard in which the people were while our Lord was teaching beneath the covering of one side of the colonnade.

—κράβαττον] grabatum, a bed. (Catull. x. 23. Cic. Div. ii. 63.) See below, vi. 55. Used by Aquila and Vulg. in Amos iii. 12. The Attic word is σκιμπος (Mæris, Hesych., Phrynich. in v.), called κλίνη by St. Matthew, ix. 6; Hebr. מִטָּה (mittah), for which κλίνη is used in the LXX, and by St. Luke, v. 24, κλινίδιον.

This may serve as a specimen of the modifying influence exercised by the Evangelists to accommodate their diction to the respective hearers and readers for whom their Gospels were primarily written. Other Roman words in St. Mark are σκεκουλάτωρα (vi. 27), ξεστῶν (vii. 4), χαλκόν, used for money (Latin as), vi. 8; xii. 41, κεντυρίων (xv. 39).

St. Matthew and St. Luke never use the word κράβαττον in their Gospels, but it is used five times by St. Mark, ii. 4. 9. 11, 12, and vi. 55. It is also used by St. John, v. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and in the Acts, v. 15; ix. 33.

On St. Mark's connexion with Italy, and St. Luke's with Achaia, see Greg. Naz. p. 611, and above, Introduction, p. 112.

8. αὐτοὶ—ἐν ἑαυτοῖς] ipsi secum. There is a peculiar force in αὐτοὶ, bringing out more clearly His Omniscience.

9. ἔγειρε] This form is commended by excellent MS. authority in St. Mark (see iii. 3; v. 41; x. 49), where Elz. has ἔγειραι; and it is more likely that ἔγειρε should have been changed into ἔγειραι, than nice versâ: ε and αι had the same sound, and were easily confused.

14. Λευὴν Levi.

It is probable that Levi, on his call by Christ, when he left his old life and engaged in a new one, took a new name (δνομα καινόν), Matthew, signifying the Gift of God (see Matt. ix. 9); and very expressive of a feeling of thankfulness for God's mercy to him a publican; and that in leaving all for Christ, he had received a great gift, and gained a great treasure from God.

— τὸν τοῦ Ἀλφαίου the son of Alphæus. The name of St. Matthew's father is mentioned by St. Mark alone of all the Evangelists.

15. ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ αὐτοῦ in his house, the house of St. Matthew; an incident modestly omitted by St. Matthew himself. St. Luke adds, that he made a great feast for Christ. See Luke v. 29.

18. ἦσαν—νηστεύοντες were fasting,—on one of the appointed Fasts of the Jews. Cp. Acts xxvii. 9.

19. Μὴ δύνανται—νηστεύειν Luke v. 34, μὴ δύνασθε ποιῆσαι νηστεύειν; A thing is often said in Scripture to be impossible which cannot be done rightly. See I Cor. iii. 1. 2 Cor. xiii. 8. Acts iv. 16. 20. Gen. xxiv. 50. So, conversely, a thing is said to be done which ought to be done. Malachi i. 6. Rom. xiv. 7. Heb. v. 4.

21. ῥάκους ἀγνάφου Matt. ix. 16.

22. οἶνον νέον εἰς ἀσκὸν καινόν On the difference between νέος and καινός see Eph. iv. 24. Col. iii. 10.

23. παραπορεύεσθαι—ἐν τοῖς σάββασιν—ὁδὸν ποιεῖν Matt. xii. 1. Luke vi. 1. Our Lord Himself παρεπορεύετο, passed by, along the path, without touching the corn; but His disciples ἤρξαντο ὁδὸν ποιεῖν, began to make a way for themselves, τίλλοντες, plucking the corn. Therefore the Pharisees did not censure Him, but them; and He did not defend Himself, but them.

26. ἐπὶ Ἀβιάθαρ ἀρχιερέως in the days of the Chief Priest Abiathar. On this use of ἐπὶ, see Luke iii. 2; iv. 27. Acts xi. 28. St. Mark has been charged by some with an anachronism, and with confounding Abiathar and Ahimelech, because this event took place in the High Priesthood of Ahimelech, the Father of Abiathar (1 Sam. xxi. 1).

Indeed, if St. Mark has correctly represented Christ's words, the objection here recited is directed against our Lord Himself.

The objection is thus stated by Meyer (3rd ed. p. 33): “ἐπὶ Ἀβιάθαρ τ. α., tempore Abiatharis pontificis maximi, d. i. unter dem Pontificate des Abiathar. Freilich war nach 1. Sam. 21, 1 ff. der damalige Oberpriester nicht Abiathar, sondern dessen Vater (Joseph. Antt. 6, 12, 6.) Achimelech. Mark. hat diese beiden irrtümlich verwechselt. S. Korb in Winer's krit. Journ. iv. p. 295 ff., Paulus, Fritzsche, De Wette.” Such is the allegation.

But the Evangelist does not say that the event here mentioned occurred ἐπὶ ἀρχιερέως Ἀβιάθαρ, i. e. in the High Priesthood of Abiathar, as he would have written, if he had thought that Abiathar was High Priest at the time. Cp. ἐπὶ ἀρχιερέως Ἀννα, Luke iii. 2. But he says that it happened ἐπὶ Ἀβιάθαρ ἀρχιερέως, which indeed intimates that it was in the days of Abiathar; but it rather suggests that he was not the High Priest then, and the reference is made to him as one well known to the readers of the Old Testament as a celebrated High Priest; and, in fact, he is mentioned in the next Chapter of that History, as the High Priest who followed David with the Urim and Thummim, when he was persecuted by Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 20; xxx. 7).

The note of Bede on this passage deserves attention. “Quod Dominus Abiathar principem sacerdotum appellat, nihil habet dissentantiæ; ambo enim fuerunt illic cum veniens David panes petiit et accepit, Ahimelech videlicet princeps Sacerdotum, et Abiathar filius ejus. Occiso autem Ahimelech à Saulo, cum viris domus suæ generis sacerdotalis octoginta quinque, fugit Abiathar ad David, et comes factus est totius exilii ejus. Postea regnante eo summi sacerdotii et ipse gradum accepit, ac toto tempore regni illius in pontificatu perseverans multo majoris excellentiæ quam pater suus effectus est; ideoque dignus fuit cujus memoriam Dominus etiam vivente patre quasi summi faceret Sacerdotis.”

Besides, we must not forget that our Lord is reasoning with the Pharisees. And one of their errors was to judge of actions by worldly success. If our Lord had mentioned Ahimelech—their answer might have been, that Ahimelech was punished by God for this profanation of sacred things; he and his were soon overtaken by divine vengeance and slain. But by specifying Abiathar, who was then with his father (1 Sam. xxii. 20), and who (we may reasonably infer from our Blessed Lord's words, which are the Words of Him Who knows all History) was a party to his father's act, and was afterwards blessed by God in his escape, and in a long and glorious Priesthood, our Lord obviates the objection of the worldly-minded Pharisees, and strengthens His own argument, by reminding them that this action took place in the time and under the sanction of one whom they held in reverence as a venerable ornament of the Pontifical family and dignity, as a person distinguished by zeal for the honour of God, and as approved and rewarded by Him for his piety.

There is a similar expression in 1 Macc. xiii. 42, ἐπὶ Σίμωνος, ἀρχιερέως μεγάλου καὶ στρατηγού καὶ ἡγουμένου τῶν Ἰουδαίων, "in the days of Simon, the great High Priest and General, and Ruler of the Jews," and it does not intimate that what is there recorded was contemporary with his High Priesthood.

Some MSS. (A, C, Δ, and a few Cursives) in this passage of St. Mark, insert the article τοῦ before Ἀβιάθαρ. If this is the true reading, the sense is more clearly defined, as already stated, that this event took place in the days of Abiathar, who was the celebrated High Priest, though not the High Priest at that time; and we may compare Matt. xxvi. 6, ἐν οἰκῇ Σίμωνος τοῦ λεπροῦ, i. e. of Simon, who was not then a leper, but was known by that name. So we read, "Jesse begat David the king" (Matt. i. 6); and in the Apostolic Catalogue (Matt. x. 3), Matthew is called the publican, although he had left the office of publican to be an Apostle. No objection could be made to the expression "such an event occurred in the days of Cato the Censor," although Cato was not Censor then. For examples of prolepsis in the names of places in Sacred History, see Glass, p. 612, and cp. the notes on Virgil, Æn. i. 2; viii. 361.

Further; we must remember that the word ἀρχιερεὺς, as used in the Gospels, has a very wide signification. See on Matt. ii. 4. And though Abiathar could not be called ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς at the time of David's visit, yet, according to the language of the New Testament, he might be termed an ἀρχιερεὺς even then. In the New Testament the word ιερεὺς is not common; it is used only twice by St. Mark, and once by St. John. And ἀρχιερεὺς has in the New Testament nearly the same signification as ιερεὺς has in the Old, where the word ἀρχιερεὺς occurs only once in LXX (Lev. iv. 3). Thus (1 Sam. i. 9) Eli, the father of Hophni and Phinehas, is called the Priest (ὁ ἱερεὺς); but Hophni and Phinehas, his sons, are at the same time called Priests (ἱερεῖς, 1 Sam. i. 3).

And in the language of the New Testament Eli would be called ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς, but Hophni and Phinehas would be called ἀρχιερεῖς, as being of his family. See above, Matt. ii. 4.

These considerations seem quite sufficient to remove all difficulty in the present passage. But even if some difficulty should still remain, we may remember that some seeming difficulties are left in Holy Writ by the Holy Ghost—for moral purposes—to exercise our humility and try our faith. If we are disposed to be wise in our own conceits, we shall pronounce confidently that they are mistakes; but if we have the spirit of meekness, which is the first requisite for wisdom and learning, we shall seek for a solution by patient inquiry, with prayer to the Holy Ghost, the Divine Author of Scripture, and "in His light we shall see light." And if, for the further trial of our faith, He should not vouchsafe to give us a solution now, we shall believe that He may give it to some others after us, and that He will give it to ourselves in that day when we shall see the light of His countenance, and our knowledge will be perfected in the sight.

CH. III. 5. περιβλεψάμενος μετ' ὀργῆς] looking round with anger. It is a special characteristic of St. Mark's Gospel, to mention the visible expressions of our Lord's feelings in His looks. Cp. iii. 34; vii. 34; viii. 33; x. 23. This characteristic bespeaks the work of an eye-witness, or of one who received his account from an eye-witness. See above, i. 43, and Introduction, p. 112.

— μετ' ὀργῆς] with anger. See on Eph. iv. 26, on the proper uses of Anger.

— παρώσσει] callousness. παροῦσθαι is used by LXX for παῖς (cahah), Job xvii. 7, i. e. to have a dry skin, or callousness, growing over the eyes, to be purblind. Cf. 2 Cor. iii. 14. Rom. xi. 25. Eph. iv. 18. Euseb. i. 18. Hesych. ἐπαρόθησαν, ἐτυφλώθησαν. See S. Cyril on Luke, p. 609, ed. Smith, note, and below, vi. 52.

6. μετὰ τῶν Ἑρωδιανῶν] with the Herodians: mentioned here by St. Mark only; a warning to the Romans, for whose special benefit St. Mark wrote his Gospel (see Introduction), and who were likely to be influenced by the teaching of that sect. See xii. 13, and Matt. xxii. 16, the only passages in the New Testament where they are noticed. It is observable, that St. Mark alone mentions the "leaven of Herod," viii. 15. Cp. Matt. xvi. 6.

8. οἱ περὶ Τύρον καὶ Σιδῶνα] those around Tyre and Sidon. This flocking of these Gentiles to Christ is mentioned only by St. Mark here; but this incident prepares the way for the narrative of St. Matthew concerning the woman of Canaan from those coasts. Matt. xv. 22.

12. ἐπετίμα] See above, i. 25. 34.

13. ἀναβαίνει εἰς τὸ ὄρος] He goes up to the mountain; to pray, before He chooses His Apostles. See Luke vi. 12, 13.

14. ἐποίησε] He made. Hebr. עָשָׂה (asah), 'fecit,' the word used to signify the act of creation, Gen. i. 7. 16. 25, 26. 31; ii. 2—4; iii. 1. 7. 1 Sam. xii. 6, "The Lord who made Moses and Aaron," i. e. appointed and invested them with power. The word intimates that the power which the Twelve exercised was due to Christ, Who created and made them to be all that they were as Apostles. See Matt. x. 1. Heb. ii. 3.

16. καὶ ἐπέθηκε τῷ Σίμωνι—Πέτρον] and He gave to Simon, in addition, the name Peter. Partly to distinguish him from the other Simon (v. 18), and partly to mark him as a θεμέλιον λίθον, or foundation-stone, in building the Church. See on Matt. x. 2; xvi. 18. St. Mark, who was the son of St. Peter in the faith (1 Pet. v. 13), and whose Gospel is said to have been dictated by St. Peter (Euseb. ii. 15; iii. 39; see above, Introduction), does not repeat St. Matthew's expression, x. 2, πρῶτος Σίμων, nor record Christ's words to him, Matt. xvi. 18.

17. Βοανεργές] a Syro-Chaldaic word from בְּנֵי (b'ne), sons (the sheva being represented by oa), and רָעָע (reyes), thunder, and by a metathesis of the p, ereyes; see Vorst. Hebr. 479, and Rosenm. p. 594. Many modern expositors (referred to by Olshausen) have supposed that Βοανεργές was given as a name of censure (with reference to Luke ix. 55); but this notion, which was unknown to Christian antiquity, is alien from the spirit and practice of Christ, Who doubtless designed by giving a new name to His Disciples, to remind them that they were called to a new life, indicated in Scripture by a new name, Rev. ii. 17; iii. 12. The name was, as it were, a Christian name, or baptismal name.

Thunder is called in Scripture קוֹל (kol), voice; i. e. the Voice of God. See Exod. ix. 23. Jer. x. 13. Ps. xxix. 3. The Law was given with Thunder, Exod. xix. 16; xx. 18; and from the throne of God in the Apocalypse come forth thunderings, Rev. iv. 5; viii. 5; xi. 19; xix. 6. In Rev. x. 3, 4, the seven Thunders are probably the seven inspired Writers of the New Testament, whose words St. John was commanded to seal; see note there.

St. James therefore and St. John are called Boanerges, as being enabled to declare with power God's will to the world. ὁ μὲν Ἰάκωβος ἀγράφως, ὁ δὲ Ἰωάννης ἐγγράφως. (Euthym.)

Their natural temper as sons of Thunder showed itself in a desire to bring down fire from heaven on the village of the Samaritans (Luke ix. 54), and in their ambitious request (Matt. xx. 21), and in St. John's appeal to Christ (Mark ix. 38). But these violent flashes of natural heat were changed by Divine grace into a pure and steady flame of holy zeal and love.

On the names of the Apostles see on Matt. x. 2—4.

18. Ματθαῖον] Matthew. See above on Matt. x. 3, and below on Luke vi. 15.

— Ἰάκωβον—Ἀλφαῖον] James, afterwards Bishop of Jerusalem; see on Acts xiii. 17; xxi. 18. Thaddæus, the same as Jude.

21. κρατῆσαι] to constrain him. Cp. ix. 27. Luke xxiv. 16. John xx. 23, and 2 Kings iv. 8, where, it is remarkable, the word is connected, as here, with eating bread, and the Septuagint Version has ἐκράτησεν αὐτὸν (Ἐλισαιέ) ἡ γυνὴ ἄρτου φαγεῖν, suggesting that the Mother of Christ supposed that she was imitating the good Shunammite in her conduct to the Prophet Elisha, in endeavouring to constrain him to eat bread.

— ἐξέστη] is beside Himself. φρενῶν παρεφρόνησε, Euthym. Ps. lxxix. 9. μαίνεται, Phavorin. 2 Cor. v. 13, εἶτε ἐξέστημεν, θεῷ. Cp. John x. 20, μαίνεται. Acts xxvi. 24, μαίνω, Παῦλε. A mark of truth. The Evangelist records what tells to their disadvantage.

This incident is mentioned only by St. Mark.

28. Ἀμὴν λέγω] See Matt. xii. 31.

29. αἰῶνα—αἰωνίου] See Matt. xxv. 46.

— κρίσεως] judgment. The sense is, he is liable to eternal condemnation. Cp. ἐνοχος θανάτου, Matt. xxvi. 66. Mark xiv. 64. This reading κρίσεως is in A, C*, E, F, G, H, K, M, S, U, V, Y, and most Cursives, and in the Peschito and Harclean Syriac and Æthiopic, and some MSS. of the Vulg. and Italic.

But ἁμαρτήματος is in B, L, Δ, and ἁμαρτίας in C*, and D, and in Lr.; and ἁμαρτήματος is preferred by Lach., Tisch., Alf., Tregelles. If that be the true reading, the sense is,—he is bound by a chain of guilt, from which he can never be freed. On this use of ἔσχατος, see Heb. ii. 15, and 1 Cor. xi. 27. Cp. Scrivener, Cod. Aug. Introd. p. ix, who prefers κρείσσεως.

³² ἡ μήτηρ] His Mother and brethren did not come in to hear His discourse, but standing without, sent to Him a message desiring Him to come out to them. They wished perhaps to participate in His fame, and to show to the people their connexion with Him and their influence over Him. But His public duties were not to be foregone or omitted for private respects; and as Son of God He knew no other relatives but God's children, to whom the performance of His will and the promotion of His glory is the first of all duties, and the moving principle of their lives. The tender love which Christ bore to his earthly Mother—as shown on the cross—brings out in stronger relief His love to God; and that love to God is the more exemplary and instructive as showing that no affection, however strong, is to be set in comparison with it; and His conduct to His beloved Mother brings out more clearly the awful Majesty of His Divine Sonship. See on Matt. xii. 46. Luke xi. 27. John ii. 4.

CH. IV. 2. ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ] See on xii. 38.

3. ἰδοὺ] See Matt. xiii. 3.

4. ὃ μὲν ἔπεσε] Observe the four cases of the seed: the first, οὐκ ἀνέβαινε: the second, ἀνέβαινε μὲν ἀλλ' οὐκ ἠύξανε: the third, ἀνέβαινε καὶ ἠύξανεν, ἀλλὰ καρπὸν οὐκ ἔδωκε: the fourth, ἀνέβαινε, ἠύξανεν καὶ καρπὸν ἔδωκε . . . τέταρτον μόνον διασωθέν. (Theoph.)

12. ἵνα βλέποντες] in order that seeing they may see, and not perceive. The sense of ἵνα here may be seen from Matt. xiii. 15. Cp. Matt. xi. 24, 25. Ps. xviii. 26. Hos. xiv. 9. 2 Tim. iii. 13. Rev. xxii. 11.

Our Lord spake by Parables, in order to try His hearers, and to show them to others and to themselves, and to recompense them judicially according to their respective tempers and moral dispositions; to reward the docile, the truth-loving, and the humble, with larger measures of knowledge and grace (see here, v. 34), and to punish the proud and the wilfully blind, by their own pride and blindness. See Glass. Phil. p. 221, 222, and Ep. Butler, Analogy, pt. ii. ch. vi.

13. πάσας τὰς π.] all My Parables; e. g. those in Matt. xiii. 24—52.

15. ὁ Σατανᾶς] Satan. St. Matt. (xiii. 19) has ὁ πονηρὸς, the Evil One; St. Luke has (viii. 12) ὁ διάβολος, the Devil, here,—a variety perhaps designed to show the identity and attributes of the person who bears these different names.

16. οὗτοι] See on Matt. xiii. 19.

21. λύχνος ἔρχεται] a candle comes, intimating spiritually that the light in our souls is not of our own kindling, but comes to us from God, in order that it may be manifested by us to the world, to His glory. Take heed, therefore, βλέπετε, examine well, what ye hear from Me; i.e. consider it, and digest it well in your hearts (St. Luke has pws, viii. 18), in order that ye may preach it to others; and may receive more abundant measures of knowledge, according as ye yourselves are more attentive in receiving, and faithful in dispensing it to others. For as ye do this, so your reward will be. (Cp. Theophyl., Euthym., and Bede.)

24. Ἐν ᾧ μέτρῳ] Quantum fidei caparis afferimus, tantum gratiae inundantis haurimus. (Cyprian.)

26—29. Καὶ ἔλεγεν—ὁ θερισμός] This Parable concerning the mysterious and divine growth of the seed of the Gospel in the heart and the world, even to the end, is supplied by St. Mark alone.

When we conceive good desires, we put seed into the ground; when we begin to act, we are the blade; when we finish a good work, we are in the ear; when we are matured in the habit of good, we are the full corn in the ear. (Greg. M., Bede.)

This Parable conveys a warning against that erroneous view of religion, which looks for sudden bursts and violent changes in the spiritual life of men; and it teaches that the growth of genuine piety is gradual and almost invisible, like the course of vegetation in the natural world. "Natura nihil agit per saltum," "Nature does nothing by fits and starts," is a maxim of Philosophy in the world of Physics; the same is true of Grace.

29. παραδῶ] gives itself to the sickle. "Multa adeo gelidâ melius se nocte dedere." Virg. Georg. i. 287; see below on xiv. 72.

34. ἐπέλυε] He used to unfold. "Discipulis explicabat.

ἐπιλύειν, explicare, interpretari, in vers. Alex. respondet Hebr. ἡρᾶ Gen. xli. 12, ubi sermo est de interpretatione somniorum; verbum simplex λύειν, ut sit ænigma solvere, usurpavit Libanius ep. 38, et nomen ἐπιλύσις, quo Aquila Gen. xl. 8 expressit Hebr. יְהִירָה. (Kuin.) Cp. 2 Pet. i. 20, πᾶσα προφητεία γραφῆς ἰδίας ἐπιλύσεως οὐ γίνεταί.

36. ὡς ἦν ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ] They convey Him with them as He was—without any further preparation; perhaps He was asleep (see v. 38), weary with preaching, for it was evening—in the ship, his migratory Church, where He had been teaching (iv. 1).

— πλοιάρια] Altered by some into πλοῖα, but the ἄλλα πλοῖα show that our Lord's vessel was also a small one,—a circumstance of interest in the miracle.

37. ἥδη γεμίζεσθαι] now becoming full.

38. τὸ προσκεφάλαιον] Probably the cushion of the steersman. See Cratin. ap. Polluc. Onomast. x. 40. (Kuin.)

This incident is mentioned by St. Mark alone, whose narrative here, as in many other places, is peculiarly graphic and minute. See Introduction, p. 112, 3.

— καθεύδων] sleeping. Some of the Fathers give also a spiritual meaning to this circumstance. When the storm of Satan's fury raged most fiercely against the barque of the Church, Christ was reclining in the sleep of death on the wooden προσκεφάλαιον of the Cross. But He awoke from the slumber of death, and rebuked the waves and the winds, and there was a great calm.

This is ever true in the greatest perils of the vessel of Christ's Church. In the storms which rage around us, He sometimes seems to be asleep; but He is trying our faith, and in His own due time He will arise and rebuke the winds and the waves, and there will be a great calm.

39. εἶπε τῇ θαλάσῃ] He spake to the sea. Not by means of a rod, as Moses; or by prayer, as Elisha; or by the ark, as Joshua;—but by a word.

— πεφίμωσο] literally, be thou muzzled. See i. 25. The Perfect tense, indicating that before the word was uttered the work was done by the silent fiat of His will.

— γαλήνη μεγάλη] a great calm. As in His Miracles of Healing there was usually no interval of convalescence, but perfect health was restored at once, so after the quelling of the storm there was no gradual subsiding of the waves, as is always the case in the ordinary course of nature, but immediately there was a great calm. See on Matt. viii. 15, a striking evidence of his Divine Power.

40. πῶς οὐκ ἔχετε πίστιν;] how is it ye have not faith? He rebukes His disciples for not having faith; for if they had had faith they would have known that though asleep He could preserve them. (Theophyl.) How is it ye have no faith? i. e. no faith in My divine power, which never slumbers nor sleeps (Ps. cxxi. 4), and by which I can quell the storm which I have raised to try your faith. You treat the Son of God as if He were like Baal, of whom Elijah said (1 Kings xviii. 27), “Peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked.”—How is it that ye have no faith? See on Matt. viii. 26.

CH. V. 1. Γαδαρηνῶν] So A, C, E, F, G, H, K, M. See Matt. viii. 28.

For Roman Coins of Gadara, see Akermann, p. 16.

2. ἄνθρωπος] a man. St. Matthew speaks of two men; St. Mark and St. Luke (viii. 27) of one. This one lived at Gadara (see v. 1. 19. Luke viii. 27, ἄνθρωπος τις ἐκ τῆς πόλεως), perhaps the other did not; and the design of the Holy Spirit writing by St. Mark and St. Luke, for Romans and Greeks, seems to have been to show the love of Christ, by this example, to the Gentile world, to which this Gadarene belonged, as is intimated by the circumstance that these Gadarenes kept swine, which was not lawful to the Jews. Cf. Levit. xi. 7. Deut. xiv. 8.

Compare the parallel case of the two Blind men at Jericho. St. Matthew mentions two, St. Mark and St. Luke only one. See note Mark x. 46. Matt. xx. 29.

7. μή με βασανίσῃς] torment me not. The devil forces the man to speak the devil's feelings and language, the very reverse of the man's own proper feelings and language; and to call himself by a devil's name (see v. 9). The devil so possessed the man, as to make him speak as a devil; not as a man, but as the enemy of man, and specially of himself. This is demoniacal possession, and is quite a different thing from any physical disease. (Cp. on Matt. iv. 24, and below on ix. 20.) Observe also the change of the man, after the devil had been cast out of him, vv. 15. 18.

9. Λεγεὼν] Legion, about 6000 soldiers. One of the Roman words in St. Mark's Gospel. See on ii. 4. Our Lord asked the question, not as if He needed to be informed of any thing, but that the bystanders might know that this one man had become like a camp or barrack of a host of devils.

This man was like an image of Heathendom. The Gentile World was then beleaguered with many Legions of evil spirits; it could not be bound by any laws, it tore their bonds asunder. Christ came from heaven to deliver it from those evil spirits and to cast them out; so that being clothed in the robe of faith and in its right mind, it might come and sit at His feet. And so it did. It came and sate like a scholar at the feet of the Divine Teacher. It came and bowed down as a vassal before the footstool of the Divine King.

13. ὡς δισχίλιοι] about two thousand. This is mentioned by St. Mark alone.

18. ἐμβαίνοντος] as He was embarking—a preferable reading to ἐμβάντος.

18, 19. ἵνα μετ' αὐτοῦ ᾗ—οὐκ ἀφῆκεν] The man, fearing that the devils would return after the departure of Christ, besought Him that he might remain with Him. But Christ would teach him by His absence that He was present with him in Divine power, by which He had cast out the Legion; and so would exercise his faith, and teach us a lesson by him.

19. ἀπάγειλον] report. Contrast this with i. 25. 44.

He would not allow devils to proclaim what He was, but He commands the man to do so, who had been delivered from them; but He does this in Gadara, where were no Scribes and Pharisees (see above, i. 45), and as a prophetic intimation that the Gospel was in due time to be preached to all Nations of the world, who were to be delivered by it from the dominion of a Legion of Evil Spirits to which they were now in bondage.

22. ἀρχισυναγῶγων] rulers of a synagogue. רֹאשֵׁי שָׁנָא (rosh hacceneseth), from root שָׂנָא (canas), to collect; 'caput synagogæ.' (See Vitringa, Archisyn. Franecq. 1684.) He appears to have been the president of a Collegium or board, or vestry, who provided for the maintenance of, and attendance at, the Synagogue, and also for the superintendence of the Service and the teaching in it.

—ὀνόματι Ἰάειρος] The name Jaeirus (not mentioned by St. Matthew) is added by St. Mark for the further proof of the miracle, and as showing, that if he himself repeats St. Matthew's account here and elsewhere, it is not because he has not independent testimony of his own, but because he has such testimony, and is assured by it that St. Matthew's narrative is true. For similar incidents added by St. Mark, riveting the proof of St. Matthew's credibility, see iv. 38; vi. 39; x. 46; xiv. 13. 51; and Introduction, p. 112—114.

23. Ὅτι—ἵνα] Two sentences put together abruptly, and characteristic of the hurried eagerness of the suppliant father. Cp. a similar broken phrase, viii. 24.

25. ἐν ρύσει] The ἐν is an imitation of the Hebrew 'Be'h essentiae' (Gesenius, Winer, p. 166). Cp. Rev. i. 10, ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι.

26. τὰ παρ' αὐτῆς] All that could be supplied from herself—all her own resources. She had spent them all; and had no hope but in Christ. And when all other aid failed, she came to Him and He healed her. An emblem of human nature antecedently to, and independently of, Divine Grace.

29. ἵαται] has been healed. Not lātai, present, but the perfect tense, sanata est—marking the miraculous suddenness of the cure.

30. ἐπιγνοὺς τὴν—ἐξεληθούσαν] having perceived the virtue that had gone out of Himself. Christ's eye sees invisible grace in all its secret operations. He beholds the breath of the Spirit moving in the Word and Sacraments, and in the human heart of the recipient. We only see its effects. He sees the wind; we only perceive what is stirred by it.

—Τίς μου ἤψατο] Who touched Me? Christ puts a question here (as often), not in order to learn any thing from the answer, but that the grace which He had given to the woman might be made manifest to others, and so be conducive to the spiritual healing of many.

The word ἅπτομαι signifies something more than touch,—to fasten oneself eagerly to a thing, to cling to it with a desire to derive something from it. See John xx. 17.

Our Lord's question, with St. Peter's reply (v. 31. Luke viii. 45), serve together to bring out the truth, that the worldly crowd which familiarly presses on Christ's human body as Man, throngs Him; but it is only the hand of that Faith which believes in His Divine power to heal the soul and body, that touches Him, although it touch not His human body—His carnal substance—but only the hem of His garment; and that wherever there is such a touch, divine virtue will go out of Him by the Hem of His Garment, to heal.

This instruction may be applied to those who crave a carnal presence in the Holy Eucharist.

Christ says, "Tangentem quæro, non prementem; caro premit, Fides tangit. Erigite oculos fidei, tangite extremam fimbriam vestimentis; sufficit ad salutem." Cp. S. Aug. Sermon. lxii. 5; cxxlii. and cxxlii.

It was, indeed, a high degree of faith to believe in Christ's Deity, when He was in human flesh on earth, and that was the faith of this woman. This example shows that our Lord, when on earth, could be touched by faith, and virtue would go out of Him responsive to the touch. But it might be thought, that after His departure from earth by His Ascension into Heaven He could no longer be touched; and therefore our Lord provided an answer to that supposition after His Resurrection by another example. He does this in His words to another woman, Mary Magdalene (John xx. 17): "Touch Me not, for I am not yet ascended." The true trial of faith is not bodily presence, but bodily absence; "blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed" (John xx. 29); therefore the most exquisite touch of faith is that which is now to be exercised after the Ascension. Thus the case of Mary Magdalene comes in as supplementary to the case of the faithful woman before us. See on John xx. 17, μὴ μου ἅπτου.

Our ascended Lord, Who is now ministering in the heavenly Temple as our great High Priest, is described as clad in a long garment descending to His feet (Rev. i. 13); and Divine Grace descends from the Anointed One to the least and lowest of His members. As the precious ointment upon the head of Aaron, which ran down to the skirts of his clothing (Ps. cxxxiii. 2), so divine virtue goes out of Christ, our great High Priest, to all who touch Him by faith, in Prayer, and in His Word and Sacraments,—which are like the hems of His garment.

34. εἰς εἰρήνην] Something more than in peace. The Hebrew שָׁלוֹם (shalom), for peace. Gen. xlv. 17. Exod. iv. 18. 1 Sam. i. 17, and passim.

40. ἐκβαλὼν πάντας—μετ' αὐτοῦ] having excluded some, in order to discourage vain curiosity, and to teach a lesson of modesty in doing good, He admitted others, carefully chosen, as witnesses of the miracle. The manner in which Christ's miracles are done is exemplary to all, though they cannot imitate Him in the exercise of miraculous power.

41. Ταλιθὰ κοῦμι] Maid, arise: from τῆλιθα (talitha), puella; κοῦμι (cumi), imperative from κείμι (surgere). St. Mark alone gives the ipsissima verba uttered by Christ, and probably recited by St. Peter, an eye-witness of the miracle (v. 37), to the Evangelist.

43. εἶπε—φαγεῖν] He commanded that something should be given her to eat. To show that she was not only restored to life, but to perfect health,—a proof of the miracle. See on Matt. viii. 15. And also to show that divine operations in extraordinary circumstances are never intended to supersede human efforts in ordinary ones.

CH. VI. 1. πατρίδα] Nazareth.

3. Οὐχ οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ τέκτων;] Is not this the carpenter? A proof of the manhood of Christ. "Error hereticorum nostra salus." There is also a truth, more than they knew of, in their words. For οὐχ οὗτός ὁ τέκτων; Is He not the τέκτων of the Universe?

—ἀδελφός] cousin. See on Matt. xii. 46; xiii. 55.

5. ἠδύνατο] He was not able to do any miracle, because of their unbelief. οὐχ ὅτι ἐκεῖνος ἀσθενής, ἀλλ' ὅτι ἐκεῖνοι ἄπιστοι. (Theoph.) Observe therefore the power of Faith, and also of unbelief. Christ modifies the exercise even of His own Omnipotence, according to the disposition of those to whom He comes. Cp. iv. 24.

Cp. John vii. 7, of moral inability. 1 Cor. x. 21. Glass. Phil. Sac. p. 361.

To show the power and necessity of faith, our Lord regulated the exercise of His Omnipotence according to men's belief in it. See ix. 23, where He even vouchsafes to invest faith with His own Omnipotence, πάντα δυνατὰ τῷ πιστεύοντι. Cf. Matt. xiii. 58, and note on xvii. 17. In this expression is an evidence of inspiration. The Holy Spirit alone Who knows the mind of Christ, would have spoken thus of His power, and of the laws by which He is pleased to limit and control its manifestation.

6. ἐθαύμαζε] He was wondering. See on Matt. viii. 10.

7. δύο δύο] two and two; binos: a Hebraism, where the Greeks use ἀνά, Luke x. 1. Cp. Gen. vii. 2; xxxii. 16. See below, v. 39, 40, συμπόσια συμπόσια.

St. Mark alone relates here that the Apostles were sent forth in pairs. St. Matthew (x. 2—5) gives the names of the pairs,—an undesigned coincidence and evidence of truth.

As to the practical lessons to be derived from the example of Christ in sending forth the Apostles and seventy Disciples, two and two, see on Luke x. 1; cp. Matt. iv. 18.

8. εἰς τ. (ζώνην] into your girdle. St. Mark, writing for Romans, accommodates his language to Roman use. It was a Roman custom to carry money in the zona or girdle, which served as a purse: hence the words of the soldier of Lucullus in Horat. 2 Epist. ii. 40, "Ibit eo quod vis, qui Zonam perdidit."

St. Luke, and he alone, speaks of the Greek βαλλάντιον, x. 4; xii. 33; xxii. 35, 36; cp. next note.

— χαλκόν] brass. St. Mark, writing for Romans, uses this word, the Roman as, or copper, for money. St. Luke, writing for the Greeks, uses ἀργύριον, silver, ix. 3. St. Matthew (x. 9) has gold, silver, and brass. See below, xii. 41.

9. σανδάλια] See on Matt. x. 10.

11. χοῦν] dust. St. Matthew (x. 14) and St. Luke (ix. 5) have κομπορτόν here.

13. ἡλείφον ἑλαίῳ] they anointed with oil. The Apostles used oil to show by the application of an appropriate visible sign, that the healing was effected by their instrumentality, in the Name of Christ, the Messiah or anointed one of God (Ps. ii. 2; xlv. 7. Acts iv. 27; x. 38), and in His power Who had sent them; and because the oil itself was significant of God's mercy, of spiritual comfort, light, and joy (Euthym., Theophyl.), and of grace given to the soul and body in answer to fervent prayer. 2 Cor. i. 21. 1 John ii. 20. 27. ἔστιν ἑλαῖον πρὸς κόπους ὠφέλιμον, καὶ φωτὸς ἀτιον, καὶ ἰλαρότητος πρόξενον, καὶ σημαίνει τὸ ἔλεος τοῦ Θεοῦ. (Theophyl.)

For the bearing of this text on Extreme Unction, see note on James v. 14.

14. ὁ βασιλεὺς] the king: called the tetrarch by St. Matthew, xiv. 1, and by St. Luke ix. 7.

15. προφήτης ὡς εἷς τῶν πρ.] a Prophet, equal to one of the old Prophets.

17. Αὐτὸς γὰρ ὁ Ἡρώδης] For Herod himself. Here is a recapitulation; and it is observable that St. Matthew, in the same way, reverts, at this point, to the occasion of John's apprehension and death, see Matt. xiv. 3. In these parenthetic recapitulations there are evident marks of a studious repetition of the account of one Evangelist by another. Cp. note on the parenthesis i. 16.

18. Ἐλεγε] Dicebat. A repeated warning, which was met by Herodias with hatred and machinations against him (v. 19).

20. συνετήρει] was keeping him in custody. τήρησις, a prison. Acts iv. 3; v. 18. See 2 Pet. ii. 4. 9. See here v. 17. Perhaps also on a plea that his life was in peril from Herodias (v. 19), but also because he resented John's rebuke, and feared its effects on the people. Herod would have killed John before, but he feared the people. (Matt. xiv. 3. 5.)

Another proof of John's unwavering constancy and undaunted courage even unto death. Cp. on Matt. xi. 2—6.

— πολλὰ ἐποίει] used to do many things—but not the one thing needful. (Trench.)

— ἤκουε] used to hear—listened to him.

22. αὐτῆς τῆς Ἡρ.] of Herodias herself. The mother did not scruple to use her own daughter for this licentious and savage purpose.

25. μοί] to me, emphatic. Give it into my own hands. Such was her cruelty and thirst for the Baptist's blood.

— ἐξαυτῆς] immediately; lest Herod should relent.

— ἐπὶ πίνακι] in a charger—a large dish, then on the table at the banquet. Such was the savage cruelty of the daughter of that adulterous and bloodthirsty mother. She possessed the graces and accomplishments of feminine beauty, and yet at the dictation of her mother, who was doubtless present at the feast, and encouraged her to entangle the licentious passions of the king by her dissolute dancing, she asked for the head of the Baptist to be given to her immediately into her own hands, on a gold or silver dish, taken from the royal table, laden with costly dainties, in the presence of the princely guests; and, in her fiendish ferocity, she would not allow to the weak and wicked monarch, probably inflamed with wine, any respite for remorse, but took advantage of his rash oath, and peremptorily exacted a prompt execution of it. Such was the power exercised by Satan over the king, his paramour, and her daughter. John the Baptist is the Elijah of the Gospel, Herod is the Ahab, and Herodias is the Jezebel.

²⁶. περιλυτός] very sorry. He was not sorry for his sin, or for John's death, but because he feared the people, who held John as a prophet (see on v. 20, and Matt. xiv. 5); and perhaps with a sense of indignity in being entrapped by her willingness in a revel in which he sacrificed the prophet to the malice of Herodias, and exposed himself to the contempt and hatred of his subjects.

On the nature of false repentance see on 2 Cor. vii. 9, 10.

²⁷. σπεκουλάτορα] an executioner. σπεκουλάτωρ, δορυφόρος, Suidas, i. e. à spiculo; but other glossaries render it κατάσκοπος, à speculando. Executioners were called speculatores. Seneca de Benefic. iii. 25: "Speculatoribus occurrit, nihil se deprecari, quò minus imperata peragerent, dixit, et deinde cervicem porrexit." De Ira i. 16: "Centurio supplicio præpositus, condere gladium speculatore jubet." Julius Firmicus viii. 26: "Speculatores faciet, qui nudato gladio hominum amputant cervices." (Kuin.)

This word ('speculator') is one of St. Mark's Roman words, on which see vi. 8; xv. 39; and Introduction, p. 112.

²⁹.] See Matt. xi. 2; xiv. 12.

³². ἔρημον τόπον] a desert place, near Bethsaida Julias, N.E. of the Lake. See Luke ix. 10. Matt. xiv. 13.

³³. ἐπέγνωσαν αὐτόν] See below, v. 54. πεζῇ, i. e. not by water.

³⁴. ἐξελθὼν] having disembarked. See v. 54.

³⁵. ὥρας πολλῆς] See Matt. xiv. 15.

³⁷. Καὶ λέγουσιν αὐτῷ] And they say to him: this answer is recited by St. Mark alone.

⁴⁰. πρασιαί] "Nominativus Hebraicus." Glass. Phil. p. 286. The reduplication is for the Greek ἀνά. See Vorst. Hebr. p. 312; and above on v. 7.

The word πρασιά is derived by some from πέρας, terminus (Passow); by others from πράσον, porrum. It seems rather, like παράδεισος, to be of Oriental origin, and to be formed, by a metathesis of the letter ρ, from the root ρᾱ (paras), or ᾱᾱ (paras), to divide or portion out into compartments; whence pars, partior, and perhaps pratum, a field: πρασιαὶ are areolæ; viridaria, parterres (τὰ ἐν κήποις κόμματα, Theophyl.), in which, as in a garden, the seed of this food was sown by the Apostles, and ripened into an instantaneous harvest by the almighty power and divine benediction of Christ.

The Holy Spirit, by the use of this word πρασιαί, appears to call attention to the fact, that our Lord, Who then multiplied the five loaves to be food for five thousand, is the same Divine Person Who, in a manner less striking, because more gradual and regular, but certainly not less wonderful, ripens all the seeds in all the Gardens and Orchards, and in all the Vineyards and Meadows of this world, in successive seasons, ever since man dwelt in Paradise, to minister food to His creatures.

The πρασιαὶ are arranged in symmetrical order and beauty—and typify the different Churches which together make up the Catholic Church, and are all fed with the Word and Sacraments of Christ, ministered to them by Apostolic hands. See Balaam's sublime description of the Ancient Church in the wilderness, Numb. xxiv. 5, and Gregor. Moral. xvi. 55, and Bede.

Here also we may recognize a spiritual and prophetic representation of the Diocesan and Parochial system of the Christian Church. The miracle of feeding is a visible exhibition of Christ's dealings with the world. He feeds all of every age and country with heavenly nourishment by the ministry of the Word and Sacraments. But He does every thing regularly and in order. He commands the multitude to sit down in companies; He portions out the population of the world into spiritual Districts, and assigns a competent portion to the oversight of each of His ministers; and thus the whole multitude is filled with the bread of life.

⁴¹. κατέκλασε—ἐδίδου] He broke once, and was giving, in repeated acts, the loaves to His disciples to set before the multitude, but He ἐμέρισε, disparted by one act the two fishes to all. Cp. below, viii. 6. Matt. xiv. 19 has ἔδωκε τοῖς μαθηταῖς here; and John vi. 11 has διέδωκε τ. μ. concerning the loaves. But ἐίδου used by St. Mark, and St. Luke ix. 16, expresses something more than the act of giving, and the effect; it describes the manner of it.

This miracle was symbolical. Christ's body, the true Bread, was broken once for all on the Cross (1 Cor. xi. 24); but He is ever giving it to His disciples to distribute for the life and refreshment of the faithful.

Cp. on Matt. xxvi. 26, 27, with regard to the distribution of the elements at the Sacramental Supper.

45. Καὶ εὐθέως] See Matt. xiv. 22.

— Βηθσαιῶν] the other Bethsaida, on the west of the Lake.

48. ἤθελε παρελθεῖν] He designed, and was about to pass by them. Cp. Luke xxiv. 28, and Glass. Phil. pp. 699, 700. This idiomatic use of θέλω remains in the language of modern Greece; ἤθελε va, and more briefly by θεὶ va and by θεά.

Here is a silent note of Inspiration. The Evangelist says, that Christ intended to pass by them. But what uninspired man could say this? Who knoweth the mind of Christ but the Spirit of God? (Cp. 1 Cor. ii. 11.)

52. πεπωρωμένη] blinded with a dense and callous film. See iii. 5; viii. 17. John xii. 40. Rom. xi. 7. 2 Cor. iii. 14. παροῦσθαι = τυφλοῦσθαι. (Hesyc.)

It is affirmed by some that this word is derived from πῶρος, stone, and signifies the induration of bones, which produces callousness and insensibility; and not from πῶρος, blind. See Trench. p. 74.

55. τοῖς κραβάττοις] 'their beds;' i. e. the beds to which they were confined.

VOL. I.

— ὅπου—ἐκεῖ] On this Hebraism see Vorst. p. 558. Cf. Rev. xii. 14. The ἐκεῖ is emphatic.

CH. VII. 2. κοιναῖς] common; κοινὸς had been already used by LXX for Hebr. טמא (tamé), unclean, 1 Macc. i. 47. 62.

3. οἱ γὰρ Φαρισαῖοι κ.τ.λ.] for the Pharisees, &c. This detailed explanation of Jewish customs is a proof that this Evangelist did not write primarily for Jewish readers, but for others.

— πύγμῃ] properly, with the fist; as the LXX Version shows, Exod. xxi. 18. Isa. lviii. 4; the knuckles of one hand being applied to the palm of the other, so that by hard rubbing both may be cleansed. Cp. Kuin. who says, "πύγμῃ est prop. pugnis (Hesychius: πύγμῃ, ἡγουν τὸ συγκεκλίσθαι τοὺς δακτύλους) et in versione Alexandrinā respondet Hebr. עֲרִיצָה v. Exod. xxi. 18. Ies. lviii. 4, atque adeo πύγμῃ propriè significat manu in pugnum contracta: illud ipsum nomen עֲרִיצָה etiam de robore, fortitudine adhibetur, et homines robusti in scriptis Rabbīnorum dicuntur עֲרִיצָה בָּרָא, vid. Buxtorfius Lex. Talm. p. 483, hinc πύγμῃ commodè reddi potest, fortiter, accuratè et sedulò; certè Syrus interpres vertit,  quo adverbio Luc. xv. 8, expressit etiam adverbium ἐπιμελῶς. Cf. et Glassius Phil. S. p. 364."

4. ἀπὸ ἀγορᾶς] returning home from the market, where they may have come into contact with heathens, publicans, and others, whom they regard as unclean. So ἀπὸ δειλίου, Herod. i. 126.

— ἔστῳ] a Roman word, sextariorum; being $\frac{1}{2}$ of the Ephra, and $\frac{1}{4}$ of the Kab. See Joseph. Ant. ix. 4. This explanation of Jewish customs (vv. 3—5) is peculiar to St. Mark, and shows that he was not writing mainly for Jews; and the word ἔστῳ, with others of like origin in his gospel, suggests that he was writing specially for Romans. Cp. on ii. 4.

— χαλκίων] "Cautè dictum, nam testacea frangebantur." (Rosenm.)

5. περιπατοῦσι] walk, live. The Hebr. חָלַק.

9. Καλῶς] Well: said in irony.

11. Κορβάν] Corban, an offering to God. See on Matt. xxvii. 6, and xv. 5, and above, ii. 3, and Pococke, i. 251.

S. Ambrose (on Luke xviii.), applying the word to Christian times, well says, "Dicis te, quod eras Parentibus collaturus, Ecclesiae velle conferre. Non quaerit donum Deus de fame parentum."

"Multi ut praedicentur ab hominibus, Ecclesiae conferunt quae suis auferunt; cum misericordia à domestico progredi debeat pietatis officio. Sed ut pascendos Scriptura dicit parentes, ita propter Deum relinquendos parentes, si impediunt devotae mentis affectus."

19. καθαρίζον π. τ. βρώματα] cleansing all the food. Some (e.g. Meyer) read καθαρίζων, and connect it with ἀφεδρῶν; but this construction seems inadmissible. It appears rather to mean, "exitu suo puras relinquens omnes escas" (cp. Bede, à Lapide). Every thing that cometh in from without defecates and clarifies itself in its passage εἰς τὸν ἀφεδρῶνα, and so leaves pure πάντα τὰ βρώματα, i.e. every thing that is converted by man into food, and enters into his system.

The reading καθαρίζων is indeed found in many MSS., A, B, E, F, G, H, L, S, X, Δ, and in Lr., but the confusion between ὁ and ὦ is so common in MSS., that this variety is of little weight against the ordinary rules of grammatical construction. See on 1 Cor. xv. 49.

21. πορνείαι] See Rom. i. 29.

24. μεθόρια] the confines: he does not seem to have crossed the border.

25. ἦς—αὐτῆς] On this Hebraism, see Acts xv. 17. Gal. ii. 10.

26. Ἑλληνίς] a Greek. St. Matthew calls her Xanavalá (xv. 22), to show his Jewish readers that the mercies of the Gospel were for those whom their forefathers had extirpated. St. Mark calls her Ἑλληνίς, a Syrophenician, of Tyre, to assure his Gentile readers that Christ offers salvation to them, and to every nation of the world.

— Συροφονίκισσα] a Syrophenician. Φονίκισσα from φοινίκη, and Συροφ., as distinguished from the Libyan Phoenicians, of Carthage, better known to the Romans, and colonists from the Phoenicians of Syria, in the mother cities of Tyre and Sidon, whence Horat. ii. 2. 11, "utergue Pœnus serviat uni."

CH. VIII. 1—9. Ἐν ἐκείναις] See Matt. xv. 32—38.

— παμπόλλου] Some MSS. and Edd. have πάλιν πολλοῦ. But it is less likely that such a simple expression as πάλιν πολλοῦ should have been altered by Copyists into παμπόλλου than vice versa. On the confusion of παμ, and παλ, see Porson, Eurip.

Heb. 1169, and above, vii. 14, where B, D, L, Δ, have πάλιν for πάντα. At the same time it may be observed that St. Mark is wont to note transitions in his narrative by πάλιν. See iii. 20; iv. 1; x. 1. 10.

2. ἡμέραι τρεῖς—μοι] literally, there are now three days to them remaining (dat. plur. part.) with Me, and not having any thing to eat. See Matt. xv. 32. Acts xxiv. 11, οὐ πλείους εἰσὶ μοι ἡμέραι ἢ δεκάδυο, and cp. Matth. G. G. § 390. Soph. Philoct. 354, ἦν δ' ἡμᾶρ ἤδη δεύτερον πλέοντι μοι.

6. ἐδίδου] He was giving. See on vi. 41.

8. σπυρίδας] baskets, made of rushes and palm leaves. (Bede.) See on Matt. xvi. 9.

10. μέρη Δαλμανουθά] See Matt. xv. 39, ὅρια Μαγδαλᾶ. St. Mark adds therefore to St. Matthew's narrative, to show his independent knowledge of the fact. The conversation took place in the confines of Magdala, towards Dalmanutha. In Matt. xv. 21 we have μέρη Τύρου κ. Σ. In Mark vii. 24, μεθόρια T. κ. Σ.

12. ἀναστενάξας τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ] groaning deeply in His spirit. See John xi. 33.

22—26. Καὶ ἔρχεται] This miracle so minutely described is recorded by St. Mark alone. Cp. vii. 32.

— Βηθσαϊδάν] Supposed by many to be the northern Bethsaida, or Julias, concerning which see on Matt. xiv. 13. Luke ix. 10.

23. Καὶ ἐπιλαβόμενος—ἐξήγαγεν] And He took him by the hand and led him out of the town. A visible proof to the people that the man was blind. Compare our Lord's conduct in John ix. 6, 7.

24. Βλέπω τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, ὡς δ. ὁ, περιπατοῦντας] An abrupt expression, or rather three sentences, suitable to the case, in which new powers of vision suddenly succeeded; and characteristic of St. Mark's literal accuracy, cf. v. 23. I see men. I see them standing still, and dimly, as trees. I now see them walking.

The reason why our Lord worked this cure by degrees seems to be, that He thus brought forth from the man's own lips, for the benefit of the readers of the Gospel, words showing the process of the cure from darkness to glimmering light, and thence to perfect vision. Here also is a picture of the process of gradual illumination which sometimes takes place in the soul.

26. Μηδὲ εἰς τὴν κώμην] Our Lord had led the blind man out of Bethsaida to heal him, and tells him not to enter the village after he is healed, in order to warn the world, that if men will not attend to the evidence of the Gospel, and use the means of grace proffered to them, those blessings, slighted by them, will be withdrawn from them. The blind man is brought to Christ, and allows himself to be led by Christ out of the city, and recovers his sight. But the city itself was spiritually blind, and would not discern Christ; and is left in its darkness. Cp. John ix. 39—41.

If this miracle was wrought near the western Bethsaida, then cp. Matt. xi. 21.

27. μέ] Me—emphatic, and so placed.

29. Σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστός] It has been already observed on Matt. xvi. 18, that St. Mark, the disciple of St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 13. ἐρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου, Euseb. iii. 39; v. 8), does not record our Lord's words in reply to St. Peter.

The Divines of Rome in interpreting those words, Σὺ εἶ Πέτρος, καὶ ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ οἰκοδομήσω μὲν τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, build much on the supposition that our Lord used the same Syro-Chaldaic word ܥܦܪܐ (Cephra) for Πέτρος and πέτρα.

This supposition is improbable.

If our Lord had used the same word, it is not likely that the Holy Ghost would have used two different words, as He does in reciting our Lord's reply in Matt. xvi. 18.

It is remarkable that St. Matthew does use a Syro-Chaldaic word, ܕܒܪ, dar, in the verse immediately preceding—ܕܒܪ Ἰωάνᾱ. Why then did he not go on to write, Σὺ εἶ Κηφᾱ, καὶ ἐπὶ τούτῳ τῷ Κηφᾱ ο. μ. τ. ε. ? He ought to have done so,—with reverence be it said,—if our Lord used the same word in both members of the sentence, and if so much is to be grounded on this supposed use of the same word, as the Divines of Rome build from it, making it almost the fundamental doctrine of Christianity.

Besides, St. Mark, the disciple of St. Peter, as we have seen, is wont to introduce Syro-Chaldaic words into his Gospel (see above, ii. 3); he uses two such words in the preceding Chapter (vii. 11. 34), and he specially notices that two of St. Peter's brother Apostles were called Βοανηργῆς (a Syro-Chaldaic name), and explains what it means (iii. 17). If therefore any additional light was to be derived from a Syro-Chaldaic word, concerning so important a matter as the relation of his master, the Apostle St. Peter, to the other Apostles and the Church at large, St. Mark would have introduced here a Syro-Chaldaic word. And since he has not done so, we have additional proof from St. Mark's silence that St. Matthew's divinely inspired Greek (Matt. xvi. 18) gives a true and full representation of our Lord's words to St. Peter.

It is observable that St. Mark, and he alone, records our Lord's Saying to the Twelve when they afterwards argued among themselves who of them should be greatest: "If any one desires to be first, he shall be last of all" (Mark ix. 34, 35). They were not very likely to have debated that matter, if our Lord had already settled it by making St. Peter supreme over the rest.

33. Ὑπαγε—σατανᾶ] Get thee behind Me, Satan. Observe what it is to be ashamed of the cross of Christ. "Get thee behind Me, Satan," says our Lord to St. Peter.

St. Mark, the disciple of St. Peter, carefully records what tells to the disadvantage of Peter—a proof of his veracity, and of St. Peter's humility. Cp. Chrys. on Matt. xvii. 27, and the remarkable passages in Euseb. Theophan. (ed. Lee), pp. 220. 324, 325, and Introduction to this Gospel, above, p. 113.

34. Καὶ προσκαλεσάμενος] See Matt. xvi. 24.

35. καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου] and the Gospel. These words are found only in St. Mark. Cp. Matt. xvi. 25. Luke ix. 24; and see below, x. 29.

CH. IX. 1. Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν] See on Matt. xvi. 28.

11. Ὁ τι] = διότι, why. So used by LXX (Gen. xii. 18) for τί τοῦτο ἐποίησας; (See v. 28.)

— Ἡλίαν] Elias. See Matt. xvii. 10.

12. ἀποκαθιστᾷ] "præsens indefinitum, ut Matt. ii. 4," Bengel. He is not only the restorer,—but completes, consummates, brings up to the state designed by God according to His promise and ancient prophecy. See on Acts i. 6. On the form ἰστώ, for ἵστημι, see Winer, p. 72. Cp. Rom. iii. 31. 2 Cor. vi. 4; x. 18.

— καὶ πῶς] πῶς for ὅπως, how, as often in St. Mark. See ii. 26; v. 16; xi. 18; xii. 41; xiv. 1. 11; and so used by LXX, Deut. ii. 7, διάγνωθι πῶς διήλθες. The πῶς here depends on εἶπεν: "He declared to them how it is written." The sense is as follows:

The three disciples are in doubt,—How can Jesus be the Christ? For it is the received opinion of the Jews, that before the Coming of Christ Elias shall appear. If Thou art the Messiah, how is it, that "the Scribes say that Elias must first come?" We have just seen Elias in the Transfiguration; but he is not yet come into the world; and since he who is to be the forerunner of the Messiah is not yet come, how can it be said that the Messiah, whom he is to precede, is come? How is it that the Scribes have not acknowledged that either the one or the other is come?

Our Lord's reply is,—The Precursor is come. He has fulfilled the office of Elias in turning the hearts of the fathers to the children. See Luke i. 16, 17, from Malachi iv. 5, where, it is to be observed, the LXX have ἀποκαταστήσει,—the word here used by Christ.

He is come—and the Scribes have not known, have not recognized him; and what is more, Holy Scripture bears witness, that they will not know Him whose way the Elias of the Gospel has come to prepare; they will not acknowledge Christ. As is foretold in Scripture, He will be rejected and suffer many things at their hands.

Do not therefore be perplexed. Elias is come. Christ is come. The Scribes say true when they assert that Elias must precede Christ. But they have not known the Coming of Elias. And they do not know the Coming of Christ. Do not be surprised at this. It has been predicted by the Holy Ghost. In not knowing Elias and Christ, they prove the Coming of those whom they reject; for that rejection has been prophesied in the Scriptures, which the Scribes have in their hands. Cp. Isa. liii. 1. John xiii. 28.

13. καὶ] Elias also is come, and they have done to him what they listed—and so will it be with Christ, Who is come likewise.

— καθὼς γέγραπται] as it is written in the Scriptural records of the persecutions endured by Elijah: by which it was virtually prophesied and foreshown that his antitype the Baptist, who has come in his power and spirit, would suffer in like manner.

15. ἰδὼν αὐτόν ἐξεθαμβήθη] when they saw Him they were astonished. Perhaps by some remains of the Divine glory and heavenly splendour of the Transfiguration on His countenance; as the Israelites were dazzled by the appearance of Moses when he came down from the holy mount (Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30. 2 Cor. iii. 7, 13). See further below on x. 32.

17. Διδάσκαλε] This miracle also (17—27) is described much more fully and minutely by St. Mark than by any other Evangelist. See on ii. 3. Doubtless St. Peter was an eye-witness of it. See v. 5.

20. ἰδὼν αὐτόν—τὸ πνεῦμα] when the evil spirit saw Him.

The masculine participle (ἰδὼν) with the neuter noun (πνεῦμα) indicates more forcibly the personal vitality and agency of the Spirit, and refutes the notion that these evil spirits were mere qualities, or influences, or diseases. See above, v. 4—10, and below, v. 26, and Luke viii. 33. For another use of this combination, see Matt. xxvii. 52, 53, σώματα ἐξελθόντες.

23. εἶπεν αὐτῷ τὸ] He said to him this. The τὸ is used by the Evangelist to mark emphatically the reply of our Blessed Lord,—probably His very words. τὸ is used in this way Matt. xix. 18, ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπε τὸ, οὐ φοβεύσεις. See Gal. v. 14, ὁ πᾶς νόμος πεπλήρωται ἐν τῷ, ἀγαπήσεις τὸν πλ. σου. Luke i. 62, ἐγένεον τῷ πατρὶ αὐτοῦ τὸ, τί ἂν θέλοι καλεῖσθαι αὐτόν. ix. 46, εἰσῆλθε διαλογισμὸς τὸ, τίς ἂν εἴη μείζων. See also Luke xxii. 2. 23; and Winer, p. 99, who compares Acts iv. 21; xxii. 30. Rom. viii. 26; xiii. 9. See also note on I Cor. iv. 6.

24. βοήθει μοῦ τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ] Much more pathetic and expressive than β. τ. ἀ. μου. Cp. Matt. xvi. 18. John xxi. 22.

25. τὸ πνεῦμα κ.τ.λ.] Thou deaf and dumb spirit, hearken to what I say.

26. κράζας—σπαράζας] So B, D, L, Δ, and other MSS., and Griesb., Lach., Tisch., Alf., Tregelles, for Elz. κρᾶζαν—σπαράζαν. On the sense implied in the masculine participle, rendered more emphatic, and marked more strongly, by its combination with a neuter noun, see above on v. 20.

Christ allows the Devil to show his rage, in order that His own divine power in casting him out may be more manifest and glorious. So it will be in the latter days. See Rev. xii. 12.

31. ἐδίδασκε γάρ] for He was teaching now what He had not taught before.

35. Εἴ τις θέλει] See above on viii. 29.

38. ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί σου] in thy name. ἐν is omitted by A, E, F, G, K, M, S, V, X.

These words are important. The man was casting out Devils in and by Christ's Name; not in his own name. While the disciples cursed the man, they confessed that what he did was done by him in obedience to Christ's will, and for the promotion of His glory. Thus while they blamed him, they praised him. The only fault they could find was—"he followeth not us." Cp. Luke ix. 49, 50.

—ἐκωλύσαμεν] we forbade him. According to their own confession, they forbade the man to work miracles in Christ's Name, because he did not follow them. They do not say, that they forbade his separation, but that they forbade his use of miraculous powers exercised in Christ's Name.

40. Ὃς οὐκ ἔστι καθ' ἡμῶν] If a man is not against us—as those persons are who stand neutral, and are not with us when they ought to join us in our warfare against Satan and Sin (see Matt. xii. 30)—he is on our side; i.e. his actions tend to our honour, and he works in furtherance of our work.

Compare this saying with our Lord's words, "He that is not with Me is against Me" (Matt. xii. 30. Luke xi. 23),—words uttered when some were imputing Christ's miracles to the agency of Satan.

Observe, in that case our Lord used the pronoun Me, in the other, us; he who is not with Me, Who am present in My Church at all times and in all places, he is against Me. But he who is not against us (as every one who is not with Me) is on our side; he is on the side of you My Apostles as well as on Mine.

The complaint against the man was, "he followeth not us,"—us the Apostles; the complaint says nothing of following Christ. There was a spirit of envy and selfishness in this remark, which would have restrained Christ's favours to the persons of the Apostles and their immediate adherents.

But our Lord reminds the complainants, that the man wrought miracles in their Master's Name, as they themselves had owned (v. 38); i.e. he wrought miracles in conformity to Christ's will, and for the promotion of Christ's glory,—that is, in union with Christ,—and not for any private end; therefore the man was with Christ, though he did not personally follow in the company of the Apostles, just as St. John the Baptist was with Christ, though not in person; and as all the Apostles preaching the Gospel and administering the Sacraments of Christ in Christ's Name in all parts of the world were with one another and with Christ, after He had ascended into heaven.

The man was not neuter in the cause, and therefore was not against them; and their Master had authorized him openly by enabling him to work in His Name; and therefore the man was with Him, and consequently with His Apostles in heart and spirit, though not in person and presence, and was not to be forbidden or discouraged by them.

For ἡμῶν—ἡμῶν, we find ὑμῶν—ὑμῶν in A, D, E, F, G, H, K, M, S, V, and some other MSS.; and this reading is received by Matth., Griesb., Scholz, and Lachmann,—and if it is correct, it strengthens the above remarks. This man, though he does not follow you in person, yet is not against you, for he works miracles in your Master's name, and therefore in spirit is with you. See also on Luke ix. 50.

Thus our Blessed Lord delivered a warning against that sectarian spirit which is eager for its own ends rather than for Christ's; and would limit Christ's graces to personal communion with itself, instead of inquiring whether those whom it would exclude from grace are not working in Christ's Name,—that is, in obedience to His laws, and for the promotion of His glory; and in the unity of His Church, and in the full and free administration of His Word and Sacraments, and so in communion with Him.

Besides,—even if the man was separated from their communion, and worked miracles in separation (which does not appear to have been the case, for he worked in the Name of Christ); what they ought to have forbidden was the being in separation, and not the working miracles.

If a man, separated from Christ and His Church, preaches Christ, then Christ approves His own Word, preached by one in separation; but He does not approve the separation itself, any more than God approved the sins of Balaam, Saul, and Caiaphas, or Judas, when He prophesied and preached by their mouths. As S. Augustine says (de Consens. Evang. iv. 5, and elsewhere), the Church Catholic does not disapprove the Word and Sacraments in heretics and schismatics, but she condemns their heresy and schism; and she would bring them back to the unity of the Church, in order that the Sacraments and other graces, which do not profit them in schism, may begin to profit them in unity. Cp. Aug. c. Donat. iv. 24, "Salus extra Ecclesiam non est, et ideo, quæcunque ipsius Ecclesiæ habentur extra Ecclesiam, non valent ad salutem; aliud enim est habere, aliud utiliter habere;" and Tract. in Joan. vi., "Rem Columbæ (i.e. of the Church) sed præter Columbam habes" (i.e. Thou hast some privileges of the Church, but thou hast them not in unity with the Church). "Veni igitur ad Columbam, ut prodesse incipiat quod habes." So Bede here: "In hæreticis et malis Catholicis non Sacramenta communia, in quibus nobiscum sunt, et adversum nos non sunt, sed divisiones pacis veritatis contrarias, quibus adversum nos sunt et Dominum non sequuntur nobiscum, detestari debemus."

41. ἐν ὀνόματί μου] in My Name. These words form the connexion with what goes before. Not only do I command you not to forbid those who work miracles in My Name, for they are wrought in our behalf; but no one can do any thing, however small, in My Name,—i.e. in love and obedience to Me,—and lose his reward. (Theophyl.)

42. λίθος μυλικός] a millstone. See Matt. xviii. 6.—μύλος ὄνκος, an upper millstone, or (as some render it) a millstone turned by an ass, is the reading of B, C, D, L, Δ, Lach., Tisch., Alf., Tregelles.

Here is a double warning against σκάνδαλα, or offences. It is better to be cast into the sea, than into the lake of fire; of which He proceeds to speak as the place reserved for those who allow their own members to offend them, i.e. seduce them to sin; and is therefore reserved also for them who offend others, i.e. lead them into sin. It is better to have a millstone about our own neck than to put a stumbling-stone in the way of others, or of ourselves.

44. σκώληξ] where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched. See Isa. lxi. 24, where the LXX has ὁ σκώληξ αὐτῶν οὐ τελευτᾷ καὶ τὸ πῦρ αὐτῶν οὐ σβεσθήσεται. The word σκώληξ represents the Hebr. תולע (toleah), a worm (Exod. xvi. 20. Deut. xxviii. 39. Ps. xxii. 6. Jonah iv. 7), specially the worm kermes, used in dyeing tola or scarlet.

The σκώληξ, or worm, as applied to the torments of Gehenna, is described by the Christian Fathers as ἀπύστος ὁδὸν ἐκ σώματος ἐκβράσων, Hippolyt. (de universo i. 221, ed. Fabr.), and Philosphumen. p. 339, σώματος ἀπουσία (i. e. an excretion of the body), ἐπιστρεφόμενος ἐπὶ τὸ ἐκβράσαν σώμα.

Observe, Christ says, σκώληξ αὐτῶν, their worm, to intimate that as the instrument of punishment is eternal, so they (αὐτοὶ) who suffer it will exist for ever. See on 1 Cor. xv. 26.

In order to enforce this awful truth more solemnly, our Future Judge repeats it here three times.

On the duration of future punishment, see above, on Matt. xxv. 46, and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. xii. p. 592.

49. Πᾶς γὰρ πυρὶ ἀλισθήσεται] For every one will be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. In this world ye may look for offences. Ye are to expect severe trials and temptations; but these are exercises of your Christian virtues, and are designed to make you to be acceptable sacrifices to God.

The word ἀλισθήσεται, shall be salted, appears to be used for the same reason as πῦρ, or fire, on account of its double sense. Ἀλίω is the Hebrew מלח (malah), to salt. In the Old Test. this word is used,

First, for cleansing, seasoning, and preserving (Lev. ii. 13), and there spoken of sacrifices (cp. Ezek. xliii. 24). And so it is here appropriately applied to the fire of God's Spirit and of earthly trials, which are designed by God to season men, and render them acceptable sacrifices to Him. "Altare Dei cor electorum." Bede.

And, secondly, the word malah, to salt, is also used for what is perpetually barren and bituminous, and its effect on the earth is described by burning. Deut. xix. 23. Job xxxix. 6. Ezek. xlvii. 11. Jer. xvi. 6. Ps. cvii. 34. "Omnis locus, in quo reperitur sal, sterilis est" (Plin. N. H. xxxi. 7); and thence captive cities were sown with salt. Judges ix. 45. And the word malah is specially applied to the Dead Sea, the Lacus Asphaltites, which is called the Sea of Malah (i. e. of Salt), תהום מלח (yam hammelah). Gen. xiv. 3. Numb. xxxiv. 12, and Lot's wife became a pillar of salt (melah, Gen. xix. 26), a monument of an unbelieving soul. (Wisd. x. 7.)

The Dead Sea, or Sea of Salt, is an emblem of Gehenna, or the Lake of Fire (cp. Luke xvii. 29. 2 Pet. ii. 6. Jude 7).

Our Lord's meaning therefore is, If men will not be seasoned by the refining fire of God's Spirit, and of this world's trials, they will be salted with the fire of Tophet, "the fire and brimstone" (Rev. xx. 10), the Dead Sea, or Salt Sea, of Gehenna, the Lake of Fire (Rev. xxi. 8), that fire which has the property of salt, in that it does not consume but preserve its victims—even for evermore.

Hence the ungodly are often spoken of as ὀλοκαυτώματα, burnt sacrifices to God's justice, which is compared to fire. Heb. xii. 29. Isa. lxvi. 15, 16. Jer. xii. 3; xlv. 10. Ezek. xxi. 9, 10; xxxix. 6.

St. John the Baptist said of Christ, He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. (Matt. iii. 11.) And our Lord baptized His Apostles with fire at Pentecost, and He baptizes all Christians with the light and flame of divine knowledge, zeal, and love, which are gifts of the Holy Ghost.

Secondly, St. Peter says (1 Pet. iv. 12), "Think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you;" and (1 Pet. i. 7) "for a season ye are in heaviness through manifold trials; that the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ." Cp. Job xxiii. 10. Ps. lxvi. 10. Prov. xvii. 3. Isa. xlviii. 10. Jer. xxiii. 29. Zech. xiii. 9.

Hence the sense of this passage is, that men are to be baptized in this world with the Holy Ghost and fire, that is, with the purifying flame of love and zeal, cleansing and smelting away the dross of worldly and carnal affections, and with the sanctifying illuminations of the Holy Ghost; and they are also tried in this world in the furnace of suffering, in order that they may be presented a living and holy sacrifice acceptable to God, as of a sweet-smelling savour, Rom. xii. 1. 2 Cor. ii. 15. Ephes. v. 2. 1 Pet. ii. 5. And if this is not the result of God's grace, and of the temporary fire of the trials of this life, they will be reserved for God's severe and righteous judgment, for πῦρ ἄσβεστον, everlasting fire, in the world to come. "For our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 29). Cp. the words of St. Paul, 2 Cor. ii. 16.

50. Ἐχετε ἐν ἑαυτοῖς ἄλας] Have ye salt in yourselves. On account of the cleansing and purifying effect of salt, the Levitical sacrifices were to be seasoned with it (Lev. ii. 13. Ezek. xliii. 24); an emblem of that purity which is necessary to make a sacrifice acceptable to God. This spiritual salt is to be preserved in the heart, and to season the life and conversation (Col. iv. 6), so that nothing that is corrupt, σαπρὸν (σήπω, putrefacio), may proceed from the mouth (Eph. iv. 29); and so the disciples of Christ may be the salt of the earth. (Matt. v. 13.)

CH. X. 1. τὰ ὄρια] On this journey to Jerusalem by Peræa, see note on Luke x. 1; xvii. 11.

— διὰ τοῦ πέραν τ. Ἰ.] There does not seem any reason for altering this reading, which signifies, He comes to the borders of Judæa by Peræa. Cp. Matt. xix. 1. τὸ πέραν, the 'region beyond Jordan,' is of frequent occurrence in St. Mark, iv. 35; v. 1. 21; vi. 45; viii. 13. Our Lord was now on His last journey towards Jerusalem. He crosses the Jordan, and enters Peræa (see Luke xvii. 11), and descends by the left bank of the Jordan, and then crosses the Jordan again, and comes to Jericho and Bethany, and then makes His triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

10. τῇ οἰκίᾳ] the house, as distinguished from the public place where He had been teaching.

— πάλιν] again. This is explained by what St. Matthew relates; viz., that our Lord had already once stated the doctrine here taught to the Pharisees, Matt. xix. 3.

11, 12. Ὅς ἐὰν ἀπολύσῃ—μοιχᾶται] Whosoever shall put away his wife and marry another woman, committeth adultery upon her; and the Holy Spirit omits the clause "except for fornication," recited in St. Matt. xix. 9 ("una solummodo causa dimittendi, fornicatio." Bede). By this omission He appears to intimate that, although the permission contained in that clause is not revoked, yet it is only a permission, not a precept; and that Almighty God will be better pleased, if it is not used; and that the marriage union ought to be so religiously made and maintained that it may be indissoluble. For, as Hooker says (III. viii. 5), "God approves much more than He commands; and disapproves much more than He forbids." And this inference is strengthened by the fact, that no such permission of divorce and remarriage is granted in express terms to the woman, in case of unfaithfulness on the part of her husband; but it is said absolutely, If a woman putteth away her husband and is married to another man, she committeth adultery. See above on St. Matthew, v. 31; xix. 9.

The Jews did not allow a woman to divorce her husband (ἀπολύειν τὸν ἄνδρα). St. Matthew speaks nine times concerning a husband putting away his wife, but not once concerning a wife putting away her husband. But our Lord spoke to the World. And St. Mark wrote generally to the Gentiles, and specially the Romans, among whom such divorces were not rare. Cp. I Cor. vii. 11, and Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. 2.

13. παιδία] "Hast thou an infant? Let it be sanctified and consecrated by the Holy Ghost. Dost thou fear the seal of Baptism for it on account of its weakness? O faint-hearted mother and feeble in faith! Anna dedicated Samuel to God before his birth. You need no other safeguards; give your infant to the Holy Trinity, its best Protector." Greg. Nazian. (p. 703). The original has δὸς αὐτῷ τὴν ἁγίαν Τριάδα, where Gregory examines the pleas made by some for delay of Baptism, and considers the case of infants, dying without Baptism (p. 708).

14. Ἄφετε—αὐτά] Elz. has καὶ before μὴ, but the best MSS. have it not, and the sense gains in force by the omission.

VOL. I.

The following beautiful exposition, inculcating the doctrines of Original Sin, of Universal Redemption, and of Infant Baptism, is from S. Augustine (Serm. 174): "Commendaverim Charitati vestre causam eorum qui pro se loqui non possunt. Omnes parvuli tanquam pupilli considerentur, etiam qui nondum parentes proprios extulerunt.

"Omnis prædestinatorum numerus parvulorum populum Dei quærit tutorem, qui expectat Dominum Salvatorem. Universam massam generis humani in homine primo venenator ille percussit; nemo ad secundum transit à primo, nisi per Baptismatis sacramentum. In parvulis natis et nondum baptizatis agnoscatur Adam; in parvulis natis et baptizatis et ob hoc renatis agnoscatur Christus. Qui Adam non agnoscit in parvulis natis, nec Christum agnoscere poterit in renatis.

"Sed quare, inquit, jam baptizatus homo fidelis, jam dimisso peccato, generat eum qui est cum primi hominis peccato? Quia carne illum generat, non spiritu. Quod natum est de carne, caro est. (John iii. 6.) Et si exterior homo noster, ait Apostolus, corrumpitur, sed interior renovatur de die in diem. (2 Cor. iv. 16.) Ex eo quod in te corrumpitur, generas parvulum. Tu ut non in æternum moriaris natus es, et renatus es: ille adhuc natus, renatus nondum est. Si tu renascendo vivis, sine ut et ille renascatur et vivat; sine, inquam, renascatur, sine renascatur. Quare contradicis? Quare novis disputationibus antiquam fidei regulam frangere conaris? Quid est enim quod dicis, Parvuli non habent omnino vel originale peccatum? Quid est quod dicis, nisi ut non accedat ad Jesum? Sed tibi clamat Jesus, Sine parvulos venire ad me."

16. εὐλογεῖ] He blesses. Elz. has ἡλῶ. The best MSS. have εὐλόγει. The Present Tense gives more life to the picture, and is in St. Mark's style. See vv. 23, 24, 27, 42, 51, and xi. 3, 7.

Compare the Office for "Public Baptism of Infants" in the Book of Common Prayer.

17. προσδραμὼν εἰς] See Matt. xix. 16.

From St. Matt. xix. 20, 22, we learn that he was a young man, and St. Matthew calls him, with the definite article, ὁ νεανίσκος, being present, as such, to the Evangelist's own mind, who had probably seen him; and from St. Mark here we learn that he ran and kneeled. So each Evangelist contributes some incident of his own.

18. τί μὲ—ἀγαθόν;] Why dost thou call Me good? "Non se bonum negat, sed Deum significat." (Bede.)

21. ἡγάπησεν αὐτόν] He loved him. Perhaps he showed His love by some external sign, as the Rabbis did to their scholars when they answered well, by kissing the head. (See Lightfoot.) The same had been suggested by Origen (in Matt. tom. xv. 14; tom. iii. p. 356, ed. Lomm.), "dilexit eum, vel osculatus est eum."

²² στυγνάσας] scowling; with a sullen look. Cp. Matt. xvi. 3, οὐρανὸς στυγνάσων, a lowering sky.

²⁹ ἢ γυναῖκα] Omitted by B, D, and some Versions and Editors. St. Peter had not left his wife. 1 Cor. ix. 5.

— ἕνεκεν ἐμοῦ καὶ ἕνεκεν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου] for My sake and for the sake of the Gospel. See above, viii. 35, where the phrase καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου (not found in the other Evangelists, see Matt. xvi. 25. Luke ix. 24) is inserted similarly by St. Mark. Perhaps it made a greater impression upon his mind, because he had formerly shrunk from suffering ἕνεκεν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου. (See Acts xiii. 13; xv. 33.) St. Mark also alone here inserts our Lord's words, μετὰ διωγμῶν. He himself had been once affrighted by persecution from doing the work of the Gospel, and would desire to prepare others to encounter trials which for a time had mastered himself.

Only two of the Evangelists use the word Evangelium. St. Matthew employs it four times (iv. 23; ix. 35; xxiv. 14; xxvi. 13), and only once (xxvi. 13) without the adjunct τῆς βασιλείας. St. Mark uses it more frequently (i. l. 14, 15; viii. 35; x. 29; xiii. 10; xiv. 9; xvi. 15); and only once (i. l. 14) with the adjunct τῆς βασιλείας, which is not in some MSS.

The word εὐαγγέλιον was used by Greek Writers for "pretium boni nuntii;" and therefore St. Luke seems to have declined the use of it in his Gospel, written for well-educated Greeks. He employs the term εὐαγγελίζομαι, and not of κηρύσσειν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον. And it was probably not till some time after the Ascension that the word εὐαγγέλιον was generally current in the Church,—as it now is,—for the Gospel.

³⁰ οἰκίας—καὶ ἀδελφάς] houses and brethren and sisters, i. e. what is equivalent to them, in My presence and in My love. (See above, iii. 35.) Besides, if he loves Me, he will have many brothers and sisters and mothers in the affectionate regard of the faithful members of My Church, who will love him in Me and for My sake. Cp. Rom. xvi. 13. Our Lord does not repeat the word γυναῖκας, and thus shows that this is the sense of His saying, and precludes the infidel cavil of Julian, "Shall he have a hundred wives?" (See Theophyl.) And He adds μετὰ διωγμῶν to spiritualize the whole.

³¹ καὶ ἔσχατοι] Some MSS. (B, C, E, F, G, H, S, U, T) have οἱ before ἔσχα, but it is not found in A, D, K, L, M, V, X, Δ, and Lr., and the sense seems better without it. Many who are first will be last, and many who are last will be first.

— ἦν προάγων αὐτοὺς] He was going before them and leading them to the conflict, as an intrepid General leads his army to the battle.

— ἐθαμβοῦντο] they were amazed; perhaps by our Blessed Lord's majestic bearing, solemn manner, and awful aspect, now that He was approaching the end of His ministry, leading them up to Jerusalem, to offer Himself on the cross for the sins of the world. Though very little is said in the Gospels concerning our Lord's external appearance and deportment, yet there are frequent indications of its effects on others. We do not see His glory in itself,—it could not be described,—but we read the reflection of it in them. See on Matt. ix. 9, on the call of St. Matthew; and Matt. xxi. 12, on the purging of the Temple; and Mark ix. 15, on the feeling and behaviour of the crowd towards Him after the Transfiguration. The climax is at the betrayal (John xviii. 6), when at His utterance of those words—Ἐγὼ εἰμι—the soldiers start back, and fall to the ground.

was going up to Jerusalem in order to declare Himself King of the Jews. See Matt. xx. 20; and below, Mark xv. 40.

40. ἀλλ' οἷς] except to them for whom it has been prepared. It is His to give. See the parallel place in St. Matthew, xx. 23.

42. οἱ δοκούντες ἄρχειν] they who claim to rule. See on Matt. iii. 9. 1 Cor. xi. 16.

46. Βαρτίμαιος ὁ τυφλός] Bartimæus the blind man. The Evangelists do not often mention the names of those who were healed by Christ. See on John xi. 1. When they do, it is for some special reason. It is evident from St. Mark's words here that this person was celebrated. (Euthym. Cp. Aug. de Consens. Ev. ii. 65.) Perhaps he had declined from affluence to poverty, and was well known from his blindness and penury to the inhabitants of the great city Jericho (Aug.); and if he was well known, there was good reason why he should be brought forward as he is by the Evangelist.

Perhaps also he was instrumental in bringing to Jesus the other blind man, of whom St. Matthew speaks (xx. 30), in order to be healed; and so the healing of both may have been mainly due to his patience, constancy, charity, and faith. It would seem from the picturesque circumstances mentioned v. 50, that St. Mark was an eye-witness of the miracle, or heard the account from an eye-witness; and that there was something in the action and history of Bartimæus which had made a vivid impression on his mind, and led him to place him so prominently in the picture.

Some have imagined, that there are discrepancies in the several narratives of this miracle by the Evangelists. But this history may be illustrated by their similar treatment of the circumstances of our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem, which followed shortly after this miracle;

St. Matthew speaks of an ass and its colt (Matt. xxi. 2—7), and for a good reason, because there was a symbolic meaning in both (see note there); and this meaning nearly concerned the Jews, for whom especially St. Matthew wrote.

The other three Evangelists describe the Triumphal entry; and they all mention the Foal, but the Foal only. None of them mentions the mother. In their narratives the Foal occupies the chief place in the picture; because our Lord rode on it and on it alone; because also it was a type of the Gentile world (for whom they wrote), as yet untamed, never ridden by any, loosed by Christ's command, made subject to Him by the ministry of His Apostles, and ridden by Him to the gates of Jerusalem—the City and Church of the living God. (See below, xi. 2.)

There is no more discrepancy in the one case than in the other. The Colt is a principal figure in one case, and Bartimæus stands forth prominently in the other. The Evangelists who mention only one blind man, do not deny that there were two, as St. Matthew affirms; and in mentioning the Colt alone, they do not deny that the ass was with her, as the same Evangelist relates.

Again: in St. Matthew's and St. Mark's Gospels, it is said that this miracle was wrought by our Lord as He was going out (ἐκπορευόμενος) from Jericho toward Jerusalem (Matt. xx. 29. Mark x. 46). In St. Luke's Gospel it stands in connexion with the record of our Lord's entry into Jericho (Luke xviii. 35); that is, on the supposition that the blind man in St. Luke is the same as in St. Mark.

The reason of this seems to be, that this same blind man, Bartimæus, the son of Timæus, of whom St. Mark speaks, had commenced his appeal to Jesus on His entry into Jericho, and that our Lord had not immediately granted his prayer, but at first dealt with him as He did with the woman of Canaan (Matt. xv. 22), to exercise and manifest his faith, struggling with difficulties and surmounting them, and forming a beautiful and striking contrast—as the faith of the woman of Canaan did—to the language of the many who would have silenced the prayer to Jesus. Jesus foreknew that Bartimæus would wait for Him with another blind man. Jesus went out of Jericho, which, as St. Luke says (xix. 1), He was only passing through (διήρχετο). He postponed his cure till He had been with Zacchæus; and then, on His departure from Jericho, healed Bartimæus with another blind man, whom the faith and charity of Bartimæus had brought to await our Lord's exit at the western gate of Jericho; and so He rewarded him, with increase, for his faith and love.

If this is so, then we see why the blind man here is called so emphatically by St. Mark υἱὸς Τιμαίου, Βαρτίμαιος ὁ τυφλός. And it is observable, that St. Matthew and St. Mark furnish us here with an example of anticipation similar to that here supposed in St. Luke. For they proceed immediately after the record of this miracle to speak of our Lord's Triumphal Entry, which did not take place till He had been at the house of Simon at Bethany for a night,—an event which they do not record till a later period in the narrative. See Matt. xxvi. 6—13. Mark xiv. 3—9, compared with John xii. 1—8.

Probably all our Lord's Miracles were more or less figurative and prophetical. They were Parables and Prophecies in action: particularly those that were wrought at the close of His ministry; e. g. the Triumphant Entry on the Foal; and the withering of the Fig-tree.

The healing of the blind man may also be regarded in this light. The great city of Jericho is a Scriptural figure of this world. Christ leaving Jericho, is Christ about to quit this world; His healing of two blind men is His healing of the blindness of the two Nations,—that is, of the Jewish and Gentile world. St. Matthew speaks of both; St. Luke and St. Mark, writing specially for the Gentiles, speak of one; this one is the Gentile world, ὁ τυφλός, the Son of Timæus, a Greek name. The unbelieving Jews desired to check the Gentiles in coming to Christ (1 Thess. ii. 16. Acts xvii. 5. 13), as the crowd at Jericho rebuked Bartimæus, and sought to restrain him. But the Gentile world prays and perseveres; and not only is healed through faith, but it provokes the Jew to godly jealousy, so that the veil may be taken from his heart. "Blindness is happened unto Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and so all Israel shall be saved." Rom. x. 19; xi. 25.

The above remarks are further illustrated by those already made in the parallel case of the demoniacs of Gadara. St. Matthew mentions two, St. Mark and St. Luke only one; the reason for which is suggested in the note on Mark v. 2.

This note may be concluded with the remark, that there are certain rules of criticism, which appear to be of great value in reconciling (to use a common phrase) the seeming discrepancies of the Sacred Writers. "Nos non debemus accusatores fieri, sed typum querere," as S. Irenæus says in a somewhat similar matter (iv. 50). Let us endeavour to ascertain the final cause of the action related. Let us be sure that it has its own peculiar spiritual sense. Let us reflect, who the writer is, and for whom specially he is writing. Such considerations will generally lead to a probable account of the variety of circumstances under which the same act is presented by the same Spirit, directing and animating the Evangelists to other Writers of Holy Scripture.

⁴⁷ ἤρξατο κρᾶζειν] he began to cry out. He acknowledged Jesus to be the Son of David, and prayed to Him for mercy.

Thus the blind Bartimæus at Jericho, who labours under the disadvantage of bodily blindness, and yet sees Christ with the eye of faith, condemns, by a striking contrast, the great city of Jerusalem, which saw the miracles of Jesus with the bodily eye, and yet was spiritually blind, and was now about to reject and crucify Him, and could not see the things which belonged to its peace (Luke xii. 42). And he justifies God's judgments on that City and Nation.

CH. XI. 1. Καὶ ὅτε—εἰς Βηθφαγὴ καὶ Βηθανίαν] See Matt. xxi. 1; xxvi. 6. Luke xix. 29.

It seems that our Lord had spent the evening (Saturday before the Passover) at Bethany (see John xii. 1—14), and that He was now coming from Bethany to Jerusalem. He comes to "Bethphage and Bethany,"—that is, to the point where these two districts touched one another. Bethphage was the nearer of the two to Jerusalem. Indeed, Bethphage was generally reckoned as a suburb of Jerusalem. See Lightfoot, i. 252; ii. 36. 485, and note below on Acts i. 12.

The reason why Bethphage is here mentioned first, seems to be, that the term "Bethphage and Bethany" was one familiar to the Jews, as marking the point of contact between these two neighbouring regions; and they naturally mentioned Bethphage first, as being the nearest to the city.

Our Lord, having mounted the colt, is described as being "at the descent of the Mount of Olives" (Luke xix. 37). It would seem, therefore, that the point of contact between Bethphage and Bethany was on the western side of the mountain.

—Ἱεροσόλυμα] So B, C, D, L, Δ, and the Leicester MS. See on Luke ii. 25.

² ἐφ' ὃν οὐδεὶς] on which no man has ever sat. All the circumstances connected with the foal are significant (cp. Theophyl. and others here). Our Lord thus showed, that He would ride on the Gentile world, which as yet was untamed and untaught, and was standing bound by its sins outside the house, in the way; and was to be brought to Christ from the lanes and alleys of Heathenism (Luke xiv. 21); it was to be loosed by the hands of Christ's Disciples by the ministry of Baptism and Faith; and, whereas it was hitherto bare and naked, it was now to be clothed with Apostolic garments,—that is, with Christian graces and virtues, and to be ridden on by Christ, and to be guided by Him, with hosannas of triumph and praise, to Jerusalem, the city of God.

See further, x. 46; xi. 4. Matt. xxi. 5, and on John xii. 14. ³ ἀποστέλλει] He sends. So the best MSS. Elz. ἀποστελεῖ. This use of the present tense gives life to the saying; it speaks of the prophecy as already fulfilled in the Divine mind of the speaker.

⁴ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀμφόδου] in the road round the house. The colt was at the entrance of the village, Matt. xxi. 2. Luke xix. 30, tied at the door of a house, outside, ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀμφόδου. The word ἀμφόδος is interpreted ῥύμη, ἀγυῖα, δίοδος (Hesych.) and λαύρα (Epirh.). Hence two meanings have been assigned to the word in this passage,—

First, ambitus, or a way that went round the house; Secondly, bivium, a place where two ways meet. (Vulg.) The article τοῦ before ἀμφόδου seems to confirm the former of the two interpretations. The sense then is: They went and found a foal tied at the door, without, not in the high way, ἐπὶ τῆς ὁδοῦ, in front of the house, but ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀμφόδου, in the back way, which went round the house. These minute circumstances appear to be mentioned as signs of veracity, and also to show Christ's prescience.

The condition of the colt is specified; it had never been ridden: it would be found tied; not in the court-yard, but outside; at the door of the house; not in the highway, but in a back lane or alley skirting the house. And some persons would be near it; and the words which they would speak are predicted; and the answer is prompted which the Apostles were to make—minute incidents showing that the foreknowledge of Christ extends to the least circumstances of common life.

The Colt, untamed, and yet tied at the back gate (cp. Luke xiv. 21), as if ready for a rider, was a fit emblem of the Gentile World waiting for Christ. It appears from St. Matthew that the mother was tied also, by the side of the foal (Matt. xxi. 2), and that both were loosed by the Apostles, and both were brought to Christ. But though the mother had doubtless been broken in, and the colt had not, yet Christ chose the colt, and rode upon it to Jerusalem—a symbolical intimation, it would seem (as the Fathers suggest), that the Gentile world would first acknowledge Christ. See on x. 46.

8. ἐκ τῶν δένδρων] from the trees. Some MSS. (B, C, L, Δ) have ἀγρῶν, fields, which has been received into the text of some recent editions. But it is, probably, only a gloss in a corrupt form. What writer would say that they cut branches off the fields; and what fields were there?

ἀγρῶν may have arisen from arvorum, a corruption of arborum (as has been suggested by others), but it is more likely that (as Kuin. describes it) it is the conjecture of a sciolist, who did not understand the word στοιβάδας as used here for κλάδους (Matt. xxi. 8), but supposed it to mean grass, as στιβάς, the more common form, often does. Cp. Hesych. στιβάς, ἀπὸ ῥάβδων (i. e. boughs) καὶ χλωρῶν χόρτων στρώσις καὶ φύλλων, and Photius interprets it by δένδρων ἀκρέμονες, its meaning here. And Theophyl. rightly interprets these στοιβάδας, as branches, i. e. the palm branches (John xii. 13), the emblem of Christ's future Victory over the World.

9. Ὡσαννὰ] See Matt. xxi. 9.

12. ἐπείνασε] He hungered; showing His Humanity, as usual, when about to give a proof of His Deity; that we may believe Him to be both God and Man.

Thus, also, He showed that He longed to find fruit on the Jewish Church, signified by the Fig-tree.

13. οὐ γὰρ ἦν καιρὸς σύκων] for it was not yet the season for figs. The tree had no ripe fruit, but it had an exuberance of leaves, seen from afar (μακρόθεν). It had no ripe fruit, because it was not yet the season for fruit. But then neither was it the season for leaves; for it was now spring, and not summer, at the approach of which the Fig-tree puts forth leaves. Matt. xxiv. 32. Mark xiii. 28.

It had no figs, because it was not the season for figs. But why then had it such a show of leaves?

The fact of its having abundance of leaves and no fruit, is what is here brought out. And the sin of the fig-tree (so to speak), was, that while it had the power given it to bring forth leaves, it had not the will to bring forth fruit. It spent all its sap and strength in making a barren and ostentatious display of exuberant foliage, beguiling the hungry passer-by from a distance to quit the road and to come and look for fruit, and then baulking him with barrenness.

Again, the Evangelist relates, He found nothing but leaves, for it was not yet the time for fruit. Yet our Lord immediately says, Let no one eat fruit of thee for ever! Thus Christ cursed the tree for not bearing fruit, at a time when, by the laws of nature, of which He is the Author, it could not be expected that it would bear fruit. The use of this moral unfitness and injustice (so to speak), thus pointedly displayed by St. Mark, was, to show that the Tree was not the end of Christ's action, and that it was only the means to an end; and to lead the thoughts of the spectator and reader from the Tree to that which was represented by the Tree.

The end of all trees is to bear fruit to man; and the fig-tree, by its withered leaves, was designed by Christ to bear spiritual fruit to all ages in the reading of the Gospel. The end which He so designed was pointed out by Christ, Who had come from Jerusalem the day before, and Who, as St. Mark significantly observes, “looked round about upon all things” there (Mark xi. 11), that is, looked carefully about for fruit there. He went immediately from the Fig-tree to Jerusalem, and specially to the Temple. He went straight from the Type to the Antitype. He thus showed, that Jerusalem, especially in its Temple Services, was symbolized by the Fig-tree, luxuriant in leaves, but barren of fruit; therefore it would be cursed and withered by Him, Who now for three years had come seeking fruit upon it,—hungering for its salvation,—but found none. (Luke xiii. 7.)

Hence S. Augustine says (Serm. lxxxix.), Non istam arborem maledixi (i. e. this was not the final cause of Christ's action), non arbori non sentienti poenas inflexi, sed te terrui. And, again (Serm. xcvi.), Non erat illius pomi tempus, sicut Evangelista testatur; et tamen esuriens poma quæsit Christus. Christus nesciebat quod rusticus sciebat? Cum ergo esuriens poma quæsit in arbore, significavit se aliquid esurire, et aliquid aliud quærere. Arborem illam maledixit, et aruit. Quæ culpa arboris infecunditas? Illorum est culpa sterilitas, quorum fecunditas est voluntas. Erant ergo Judæi, habentes verba Legis et facta non habentes, pleni foliis, et fructus non ferentes.

Hoc dixi ut persuaderem, Dominum nostrum ideò miracula fecisse, ut aliquid illis miraculis significaret; et ut, excepto quod divina erant, aliquid inde etiam disceremus.

As S. Gregory (lib. viii. cp. 42) observes, “Per ficum Dominus in Synagogâ fructum quærebat, quæ folia legis habuit, sed fructum operis non habebat.” Eusebius Emisenus says well, “Dominus, qui nunquam sine ratione aliquid agit, quando sine ratione agere videtur, alicujus magnæ rei significatio est.” (See Chemnit. Harmon. ad loc.) When Christ has thus brought us from the Type to the Antitype—from the Tree to the Temple—we find that the moral injustice which led us to see in the Fig-tree something other than the Fig-tree, and typified by the Fig-tree, disappears. For (as the passage just quoted from St. Luke shows) it was the time for figs (καιρὸς σύκων), it was the season in which much fruit might have been expected from the spiritual Fig-tree, the Jewish Church; for it was now the end of Christ's ministry. He had been three years seeking fruit on it, and therefore, since on examination He found no fruit upon it, but only an hypocritical and ostentatious display of leaves, it was cursed and withered by Him! Let no man eat fruit of thee for ever!

A solemn warning to all Nations and Churches,—to all Societies and Individuals,—who make a profession of piety, but do not bring forth the spiritual fruits of Faith and Obedience in their lives.

here punished by our Lord was not carried on in the vads or sanctuary, but in the ἱερὸν, as distinguished from it; i. e. in the outer courts, or court of the Gentiles; and these three words πᾶσι τοῖς ἔθνεσι, not cited by St. Matthew, with those that precede from Isa. lvi. 7, appear to be quoted by St. Mark writing for the Gentiles, in order to assure them that the God of the Jews is represented even by the Jewish Scriptures as the God of all Nations, and that the Court of the Gentiles, which was treated with contempt by these Jewish traffickers, and had been profaned by these acts of Jewish profaneness, was holy to the Lord, and was an integral part of His House of Prayer. Cp. Mede, p. 44, Disc. xi.

²². 'Ἐχετε πίστιν Θεοῦ] Have faith in God. On the genitive, see Rom. iii. 22. Do not be staggered and perplexed, when ye see Me,—as ye are now in a few days about to see Me,—scoffed at, buffeted, and crucified. Have faith in God. The ungodly often seem to be in great prosperity, like a green bay-tree. But pass by, and in a short time their place will no where be found. (Ps. xxxvii. 36.) So the Jews, who are now about to revile Me, may appear for a time to flourish like this green Fig-tree, they may even seem to have withered Me. But here is the trial of your patience. Have faith in God. Believe in Me. In Mine own due time, they who now look so green will be withered by Me for their hypocritical show of leaves, and barrenness of fruit; and at last all Mine Enemies will be blighted with the breath of My anger, as I have withered this Fig-tree by a word. Therefore have faith in God.

The words of our Lord are applicable to all who may be perplexed by the prevalence of evil in the world, and by the oppression of the good. (Cp. Ps. xxxvii. 1—9.) "Fret not thyself because of the ungodly. . . . For they shall soon be cut down as the grass and wither as the green herb. Trust in the Lord, and be doing good, &c. For wicked doers shall be rooted out; and they that patiently abide in the Lord, these shall inherit the land." "As for me, I am like a green olive-tree in the house of God; my trust is in the tender mercy of God for ever" (Ps. lii. 9).

MATT. XXI. 37	LUKE. XX. 13	ἀπέκτειναν· καὶ πολλοὺς ἄλλους, τοὺς μὲν δέροντες, τοὺς δὲ ἀποκτείνοντες.
38	14	⁶ Ἔτι οὖν ἓνα υἱὸν ἔχων ἀγαπητὸν αὐτοῦ ἀπέστειλε καὶ αὐτὸν πρὸς αὐτοὺς ἔσχατον λέγων, Ὅτι ἐντραπήσονται τὸν υἱόν μου. ⁷ Ἐκεῖνοι δὲ οἱ γεωργοὶ εἶπον πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς, Ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ κληρονόμος· δεῦτε ἀποκτείνωμεν αὐτὸν, καὶ ἡμῶν ἔσται ἡ κληρονομία. ⁸ Καὶ λαβόντες αὐτὸν ἀπέκτειναν, καὶ ἐξέβαλον αὐτὸν ἔξω τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος. ⁹ Τί οὖν ποιήσει ὁ κύριος τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος; ἐλεύσεται καὶ ἀπολέσει τοὺς γεωργοὺς, καὶ δώσει τὸν ἀμπελῶνα ἄλλοις. ¹⁰ Οὐδὲ τὴν γραφὴν ταύτην ἀνέγνωτε; Δίθον ὃν ἀπεδοκίμασαν οἱ οἰκοδομοῦντες, οὗτος ἐγενήθη εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας· ¹¹ παρὰ Κυρίου ἐγένετο αὕτη· καὶ ἔστι θαυμαστὴ ἐν ὀφθαλμοῖς ἡμῶν. 34	28	(¹³¹ / _{VI}) ²⁸ Καὶ προσελθὼν εἰς τῶν Γραμματέων ἀκούσας αὐτῶν συζητούντων εἰδὼς ὅτι καλῶς αὐτοῖς ἀπεκρίθη ἐπηρώτησεν αὐτὸν, Ποία ἐστὶ πρώτη πάντων ἐντολή;
35

6. ἔσχατον] last of all. Therefore no other Revelation is now to be expected from God. (Cp. Heb. i. 2. 1 Pet. i. 20.) If Christianity as preached by Christ and His Apostles, is true, then all additions to it (in the way of new articles of faith) are anti-christian and false.

12. ἔγνωσαν] they perceived. Our Lord's later parables appear to have been designedly made clearer than the earlier ones; so that even they who were most blinded by prejudice could not fail to see their meaning; they were warned by Him even to the end. It is added here that "they left Him," not He them.

13. ἀποστέλλουσι] Matt. xxii. 16.

19. Μωϋσῆς ἔγραψεν] Moses wrote. So St. Luke xx. 28; but St. Matthew has here (xxii. 24) Μωϋσῆς εἶπεν, Moses spake to the forefathers of those for whom St. Matthew specially wrote, and Moses spoke to them in their synagogues, "being read there every Sabbath day" (Acts xv. 21); but he was only known to the Gentiles by his writings.

24. μὴ εἰδότες τ. γ.] because you do not know the Scriptures. Ignorance of them is the root of error.

26. ἐπὶ τοῦ Βάτου] at the Bush,—the section so called. St. Mark mentions the book of Moses (cf. Luke xx. 42), and a particular section of it, which may perhaps have been called ὁ Βάτος, or the Bush, from its subject, Exod. iii.; as a particular song of David seems to have been called the Bow, from its subject. (2 Sam. i. 18. See there, ver. 22.) Some compare Rom. xi. 2, ἐν Ἠλίᾳ—the section concerning Elias.

—Ἐγὼ ὁ Θεός] See Matt. xxii. 32.

28. Καὶ προσελθὼν] See Matt. xxii. 36.

—πρώτη πάντων ἐντολή] Elz. πασῶν, but πάντων has been restored from the best MSS., and means not only, what is the first of the commandments (ἐντολῶν), but something more than that,—viz. what is the first commandment, and principal of all things? Cp. Lucian, Pisc. 13, μία πάντων ἢ γε ἀληθὴς φιλοσοφία. Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 160.

29. Ἄκουε, Ἰσραήλ] Hear, O Israel. Deut. vi. 4, a remarkable text, which was recited twice a day by every Israelite; and called, from its first word, שמע (shema), i. e. 'hear.' (Goodwin, Moses, p. 92. Buxtorf, Syn. c. 9.) Perhaps our Lord in saying this pointed to the Tephillim, or Phylacteries, of the Scribe, on which the words were written.

32—33. Καὶ εἶπεν—θυσιῶν] This remarkable declaration of the truth, by a Jewish Doctor of the Law, is recited by St. Mark alone. It shows what effect had been produced on some minds by our Lord's Teaching and Ministry, now drawing to a close (cp. Matt. ix. 13; xii. 7); and that those persons were without excuse who did not understand and profit by it.

36. ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ] by the Holy Spirit—a divine assertion of the inspiration of the Psalms. Cp. Matt. xxii. 43.

38. ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ] in his doctrine, or teaching, publicly; or, as St. Luke says (xx. 45), ἀκούοντος παντὸς τοῦ λαοῦ. At the commencement of His Ministry He spake in parables of a general import (cp. iv. 2); but His warnings were more solemn and clear at the close of His Ministry (xii. 12).

—ἐν στολαῖς] in long robes. "Vestibus promissis ad talos et fimbriatis." See Matt. xxiii. 5. 1 Tim. ii. 9.

40. οἱ κατεσθίοντες] those devourers of widows' houses—they shall receive greater damnation. A common use of the article with the Votive. (Winer, p. 165.) Matt. vii. 23; xxiii. 24, οἱ διυλίζοντες. Luke vi. 20. 25. James iv. 13; and the use of it here places them before the eye, and indeed they seem to have been present. Cp. Matt. xxiii. 14.

41. ἐθεώρει] He was observing. Christ notes our gifts to His Treasury, and reads the heart of each giver.

—τοῦ γαζοφυλακίου] the Corban, of which there were several, for several uses; probably in the court of the women, beyond which this widow would not have gone. See Lightfoot.

—χαλκόν] brass, or copper, here used for money generally. St. Luke xxi. 1, says τὰ δῶρα, and here πολλά. St. Mark, writing particularly for the Romans, uses here χαλκόν, the Roman as for money generally of whatever metal; as others use the Greek ἀργυρος, and French Argent. See above, vi. 8.

42. κοδράντης] A Roman word, quadrans. See on ii. 4, one-fourth of the as. This explanation of the Roman value of the λεπτὸν is peculiar to St. Mark. Cp. Luke xxi. 2.

43. πλεῖον—βέβληκε] 2 Cor. viii. 12. "Ubi est nummus à parvo, quàm thesaurus à maximo; quia non quantum detur sed quantum resideat, expenditur." (Ambrose.)

CH. XIII. 1. Καὶ ἐκπορευομένου] See Matt. xxiv. 1.

3. κατέναντι τοῦ ἱεροῦ] opposite the temple: a local characteristic specified only by St. Mark. Cp. Matt. xxiv. 3.

32. οὐδὲ ὁ Υἱὸς] nor yet the Son. A sentence perverted by the Arians and Agnosts, affirming that Christ's knowledge, not only as Son of Man (cf. Luke ii. 52), but as Son of God, was limited.

The sense appears to be,—the Son, Who is the Eternal Λόγος, or Word, the 'Dei Legatus,' and so the only Minister and Messenger of Divine Revelation to man, does not know it so as to reveal it to you; it is no part of his Prophetic office to do so. August. de Trin. xii. 3, "Non ita sciebat, ut tunc discipulis indicaret; sicut dictum est ad Abraham (Gen. xxii. 12), Nunc cognovi, quod times Deum, quia et ipse Abraham sibi in illa probatione probatus innouit." And in Ps. vi., "Hoc ideo dictum est, quia per Filium hominis hoc non discunt; non quod apud seipsum non noverit, sed secundum illud locutionem Tentat nos Deus ut sciat, hoc est,—scire nos faciat." Cf. Glass. Philol. p. 102, and see note on Matt. xxiv. 36, and Maldonatus here.

Our Lord says that "the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son" (John v. 22. 27). And yet He says that to sit on His right hand is not His to give, except to those for whom it has been prepared of His Father. (See on Matt. xx. 23. Mark x. 40.) And so, while in a certain sense the Father does not judge the world, but the Son judges it, yet it is also true that the Father will judge the world (Acts xvii. 31), because He will do it ny the Son.

So it is also true that the Son, as Son, knoweth not the Day of Judgment, because the Father "hath put the times and seasons in His own power" (Acts i. 7), and the Father will reveal them when He thinks meet; and therefore it is no part of the office of the Son to know, i. e. to determine and to declare the Day of Judgment.

And yet in the Son absolutely (though not relatively to us) are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col. ii. 3). He is the Power of God and the Wisdom of God (1 Cor. i. 24). It pleased Him, that in Him should all fulness dwell (Col. i. 19). And the Father sheweth Him all things that Himself doth (John v. 20).

Therefore, as S. Ambrose says, on Luke xvii. 31, "Quomodo Filius nescire potest quod Pater novit, cum in Patre Filius sit? sed cur nolit dicere ostendit alio loco," viz. Acts i. 7. And see also the passage of St. Luke (x. 22) cited by Athanas., p. 472, and 1 Cor. i. 24. As S. Augustine says, "in Patre Filius scit;" though it is no part of His office to reveal it "à Patre."

Christ is the One Divine Teacher of the World (see Matt. xxiii. 8—10), and He teaches by silence as well as by eloquence; He instructs us by concealing certain things as well as by revealing others. He thus exercises our faith and hope. As Aug. says (ad Ps. xxxvi.): "Quia Dominus noster Jesus Christus Magister nobis missus est, etiam Filium hominis dixit nescire illum diem, quia in magisterio ejus non erat ut per Eum sciretur à nobis.

Neque enim aliquid scit Pater quod Filius nescit, cum ipsa scientia Patris illa sit quæ sapientia Ejus est: est autem Sapientia Ejus, Filius Ejus, Verbum Ejus. Sed sicut quia nobis scire non proderat quod quidem Ille noverat, qui nos docere venerat non tamen hoc quod nobis nosse non proderat; non solum sicut Magister aliquid docuit, sed sicut Magister aliquid non docuit."

37. Γρηγορεῖτε] Watch ye. On the date of St. Mark's Gospel, as far as it may be determinable from these prophecies, see on Matt. xxiv. 22.

CH. XIV. 3. Καὶ ὄντος] And when He was in Bethany in the house of Simon the leper—probably on the Saturday before His crucifixion. See Matt. xxvi. 6.

—γυνή] a woman. Mary of Bethany. John xii. 3.
 —ἀλάβαστρον μύρου] a vase of alabaster, containing ointment. See Luke vii. 37. Both forms, ἀλάβαστρον and ἀλάβαστρος, are in use; and ἀλάβαστρον is explained by Hesych. by μυροθήκη, a box or vase for unguent. Hence Theocr. xv. 10, Συρίῳ δὲ μύρῳ κρίσει' ἀλάβαστρα: and Euthym. renders it by ἀγγεῖον μυροδόχον (cp. on Matt. xxvi. 7); and Bede says here, "Est alabastrum genus marmoris candidi, quod ad vasa unguentaria cavari solet, eò quod optimè servare ea incorrupta dicitur;" lest the virtue of the aromatic nard, which was probably of a volatile quality, should escape. Hence we may explain συντρίψασα in this verse; see note on that word, v. 3.

The word ἀλάβαστρον signifying the material (alabaster) is used with the genitive μύρου, in the same way as the word a glass with us (and so v. 13, κεράμιον ὕδατος); it was probably a vase scooped out of alabaster, white and almost transparent, and closed up with the same substance.

—πιστικῆς] genuine: ἀδόλου, καὶ μετὰ πίστεως κατασκευασθείσης. (Theophyl.) And in this sense it is rendered in the Syriac and other Versions; and so Winer, G. G., p. 89. Observe, it is the nard, the "frutex aromatica" (see Bede), and not the μύρον, or unguent, which is here described by this epithet (cp. John xii. 3); and this consideration seems to exclude the interpretation potable, liquid (from πίνα, πιστός, Æschyl. Prom. 488); νάρδος πιστικὴ is contrasted with pseudonardus (on which see Plin. N. H. xii. 26). Eusebius (Dem. Ev. 9) describes the Gospel as the εὐφροσύνη τοῦ πιστικοῦ τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης κράματος.

There were many kinds of nard: "Sunt multa ejus genera sed omnia hebetiora præter Indicum quod pretiosius est" (Bede), and it was often adulterated (Dioscor. Mat. Med. i. 6. Meyer). Therefore it is not without good reason that the Evangelists, St. Mark and St. John (xii. 3), observe that this nard was πιστικὴ, genuine, unadulterated.

Perhaps also, as the action had a spiritual meaning, being, as our Lord declares, of a prophetic character, the word πιστικὴ may be designed to serve as a memento, that offerings (προσφορὰ) to Christ should be not only costly (πολυτελεῖς), but should also be πιστικά, genuine, sincere; the fruits of a lively and loving πίστις, or faith, in Him. It is observable, that a faithful woman is called γυνὴ πιστική (Artemidor. ii. 33); and, as Bede says, "devotio hæc Mariæ Domino ministrantis fidem et pietatem designat Ecclesiæ."

Herod's offerings to the Temple were πολυτελεῖς, but they were not πιστικά. But the offering of this faithful woman was both costly and sincere.

— συντρίψασα] having broken, or crushed the vase; thus showing that the nard was genuine and unadulterated, and as imported from its native land. This action was like that of breaking the seal, by which a vessel containing aromatic liquids has been secured by those who made them.

There seems also to be something significant in the act described by συντρίψασα. Some Expositors, indeed, suppose that the nard was contained in a flask, and that only the neck of the flask was broken off, and a portion of the contents poured out. But the verb συντρίβω means more than this. It is used by the LXX for the Hebrew שִׁבַּח (shabhar), to shiver in pieces. Gen. xix. 9. Exod. ix. 25. Lev. vi. 28. See also the passages where it is used in the New Testament, Matt. xii. 20, of a reed; Mark v. 4, of fetters; John xix. 36, of a bone; Rev. ii. 27, of potter's vessels.

In fact, συντρίβω indicates, that the affectionate Mary, in the devout prodigality of her love, gave—not a part—but the whole of the precious contents, and did not spare the vase itself, in which they were held, and which was broken in the service of Christ. She gave the whole to Christ, and to Him alone.

Thus also she took care, in her reverence for Christ, that the spikenard and the vessel (things of precious value, and of frequent use in banquets and festive pleasures of this world for man's gratification and luxury) having now been used for this sacred service of anointing the Body of Christ, should never be applied to any other less holy purpose.

This act of Mary, providing that what had been thus consecrated to the unction of Christ's Body, should never be afterwards employed in secular uses, is exemplary to us; and the same spirit of reverence appears to have guided the Church in setting apart, from all profane and common uses, by consecration, places and things for the service of Christ's mystical Body, and for the entertainment of His presence; and this same reverential spirit seems also to animate her in consuming at the Lord's Table what remains of the consecrated elements in the Communion of His Body and Blood.

The word συντρίψασα, here used by the Holy Spirit, can hardly fail to suggest another reflection. It corresponds exactly to the Latin term contorto, to bruise together; whence the word contrition is derived,—and is applied specially, in a spiritual sense, to the heart, both in the Old and New Testament. Thus Isaiah (lxi. 1) and St. Luke (iv. 18) declare that Christ came to heal the contrite, or bruised, or broken in heart,—τοὺς συντρυμμένους τὴν καρδίαν.

In this respect the alabaster vase in Mary's hand, broken, and pouring out in loving abundance and unsparring effusion the whole of its precious contents on Christ's Head, is a beautiful emblem of the contrite and broken heart, pouring out itself in acts of penitential love on Christ and His members, and thinking nothing too costly for that holy and blessed service. The Church says to Christ in the Canticles (i. 12), "While the King sitteth at His table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof." She imitates Mary; and every pious soul imitates her, when by its offerings of love to Christ, especially at His table, it pours forth "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God." (Eph. v. 2. Phil. iv. 18.)

4. τινες] certain persons: particularly Judas Iscariot, as is mentioned by St. John, xii. 4.

4—6.] On these three verses see the Sermon of Bp. Andrewes, ii. 37, who enlarges on the contrast between the two tempers and characters represented respectively by Mary and Judas.

5. δηναρίων τριακοσίων] three hundred denarii. These words of Judas afford the clue to the reason for the transfer of this incident (which took place on the day before the triumphal entry described chap. xi. 2—11) to this place in the Evangelist's narrative. See on Matt. xxvi. 6, where the contrast is similarly marked by the juxta-position of Mary and Judas; and the loving prodigality of the one in her care for the body of Jesus, and the hard-hearted covetousness of the other, betraying his Master for money; and by the mention of the three hundred pence and the thirty pieces of silver.

Thus Christ is justified in His divine dealings with the traitor His Apostle, "one of the twelve" (v. 10), whose sordid sin is silently condemned by the large and liberal love of this faithful woman. And while speaking in praise of her, our Lord addressed silently and indirectly a rebuke and warning to Judas, without publishing the traitor's evil thoughts; and thus the spirit of Christ's love strove with him tenderly to the last.

9. ὅπου ἂν κηρυχθῇ] A prophecy that the Gospel would be preached throughout the world. Therefore its propagation is a proof of His truth, and of its truth.

10. Καὶ] And Judas Iscariot one of the twelve went &c. Notwithstanding what he had seen done by Mary, and heard from Christ concerning her, and notwithstanding that he was one of the twelve. How much is suggested by these words,—how little expressed!

12. τῇ πρώτῃ ἡμέρᾳ τῶν ἀζύμων] on the first day of unleavened bread. The 14th of Nisan or Abib, as appears from what follows here, ὅτε τὸ πάσχα ἔθνον, and from St. Luke (xxii. 7), ἐν ᾧ ἔδει θεῖσθαι τὸ πάσχα. Cp. Exod. xii. 6. 15—17. Deut. xvi. 1—6. Levitic. xxiii. 5. Numb. ix. 3; xxviii. 16.

The paschal lambs were to be slain on the 14th day of Abib, "in the place which the Lord should choose,"—i. e. at Jerusalem, in the Temple, "between the two evenings," בֵּין הָעֶרְבַּיִם (bein haarebayim), at "the going down of the sun." Exod. xii. 6; xvi. 12; xlix. 39. Levitic. xxiii. 5. Deut. xvi. 6, 7. They were to be eaten in the night,—i. e. on the 15th of the month before sunrise; the commencement of the 15th being dated from the sunset of the 14th. Joseph. Ant. iii. 10; xi. 4; ii. 15.

The Evangelists (Mark xiv. 12. Luke xxii. 7) distinguish between θεῖν τὸ πάσχα and φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα,—the paschal lamb of each household was sacrificed on the 14th in the Temple; but it was eaten on the 15th in private houses, by their several households. Cp. above on Matt. xxvi. 2.

13. δύο τῶν μαθητῶν] two of His disciples: viz. Peter and U 2

John, as appears from St. Luke xxii. 8. The graphic precision of this narrative in St. Mark is probably due to the dictation of St. Peter.

— κεράμιον ὕδατος] An earthen vessel containing water. The Fathers consider this as symbolical of the water of baptism, as manuductory to the Christian Passover or holy Eucharist. See Cyriil, in Caten., Euthym., Theophyl., Bede, here; and S. Ambrose on Luke xxii. 13.

The grace given in the water of baptism is contained in earthen vessels (2 Cor. iv. 7), and therefore it is to be guarded carefully. Cp. Luke xxii. 10. But it leads us on to other graces, —even to the Communion of Christ's Blessed Body and Blood, which makes us to dwell in Him, and gives a gracious pledge of a glorious Resurrection, when, if we have guarded it aright, our earthen vessels, our vile bodies of clay, will be made like unto His glorious body, according to the mighty working by which He is able to subdue all things to Himself. (Phil. iii. 21.)

The promise of a glorious Resurrection to the body is specially connected with the reception of the Holy Eucharist, which is the Communion of the body of Christ, Who is our life, 1 Cor. x. 16. See on John vi. 54. 1 Cor. x. 16—20.

15. ἀνάγειον] an upper room. So the best MSS. here for the Attic form ἀνώγειον: see the quotations in Schleusner. The ancient etymologists derive the word from ἀνά or ἄνω τῆς γῆς.

Observe, it is called μέγα here, and by St. Luke. There seems to be something significant in this mention of its being large; for it need not have been so for thirteen persons; and this may perhaps be explained by the circumstance stated by ancient authorities (see on Acts i. 13; ii. 2. 46; v. 42) that this ἀνάγειον or ἀνώγειον, belonging as is probable to one who was or became a disciple of our Lord's, and would give such a place for holy uses, was no other than the upper room, ὑπερφῶν, οἶκος, or chamber, where our Lord appeared after His Resurrection, and where the Apostles met after the Ascension, and where the Holy Ghost descended on the Day of Pentecost, and where they met for Prayer and for the celebration of the Holy Communion, and which became afterwards well known as a Christian Church,—the Mother Church of Christendom. See Joseph Mede's Works, p. 321, 322; and below on Acts ii. 44; iv. 32. 34, 35.

— ἐστρωμένον] furnished with couches, στράματα, &c., for reclining at table.

19. καθ' εἷς] For καθ' ἕνα; or as Winer observes (p. 223), the preposition seems to be used adverbially, as ἀνὰ εἷς ἕκαστος, Rev. xxi. 21. Cp. John viii. 9. Rom. xii. 5.

22. λαβὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἄρτον] Jesus took bread. See Matt. xxvi. 26. He changed the Levitical Sacrifice into an Evangelical Sacrament; taking bread and wine, and thus showing the abolition of the Aaronical Priesthood, and that He is a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek. See Gen. xiv. 18. Ps. cx. 4. Heb. v. 6—10; vi. 20.

— ἔκλασε] He brake the bread with His own hands,—showing that His own death was voluntary. (Bede.)

24. Τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ αἷμά μου] See Matt. xxvi. 28.

— πολλῶν] See Matt. xx. 28; xxvi. 28.

30. σήμερον ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ταύτῃ] to-day, even in this night. St. Mark, writing for Roman readers, adds the words in this night, because, as midnight intervened, it might otherwise have been alleged that the prediction was delivered in one day and not fulfilled till another. He thus takes care to explain the sense in which our Lord said, "To-day."

32. Καὶ ἔρχονται] See Matt. xxvi. 36.

36. Ἀββᾶ ὁ Πατήρ] Abba Father. Ἀββᾶ, Syro-Chaldaic or Hebrew = Πατήρ, Greek and Latin. Christ, the Second Adam, cries to God in the name and in the language of the whole human family both Jew and Gentile; which receives the spirit of adoption and sonship (υἱοθεσία) in Him, and is enabled thereby to cry Ἀββᾶ, ὁ Πατήρ, to God, i. e. to cry to God in the same words as those which were addressed to Him by Christ in His agony. See Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iv. 6. Heb. v. 7.

37. Σίμων, καθεύδεις;] Simon, sleepest thou? The address is specified here by St. Mark only, cp. Matt. xxvi. 40, where it is in the plural number. St. Mark takes care to show that St. Peter had all necessary warning from Christ before the denial. Cp. vv. 29—31.

39. τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον εἰπών] This incident, as well as the use of the word Ἀββᾶ (v. 36), is mentioned only by St. Mark, who thus shows his own independent knowledge here, while in other respects he adopts the narrative of St. Matt. xxvi. 36—51, and thus gives a testimony to St. Matthew's accuracy. See above, p. 112.

Christ teaches us, by His example, in our agonies of mind and body, to pray; and He will have mercy on us, though from human weakness we can do no more than repeat the same words.

40. ὑποστρέψας] having returned. B, D, L, have ἐλθὼν, or πάλιν ἐλθὼν, or ἐλθὼν πάλιν. On the infrequent use of ὑποστρέψας in all the Gospels except St. Luke's, see Luke i. 56.

41. ἀπέχει] it is enough. ἀπόχρη, ἔφαρκε. (Hesych.)

44. Δεδώκει] On this form for ἐδεδώκει, see Winer, p. 67.

Cp. Mark xv. 7, πεποιήκεισαν: xvi. 9. Luke vi. 48, τεθεμελιώτο. Acts xiv. 8.

51. εἰς τις νεανίσκος ἠκολούθησεν] This young man could not have been St. John or St. James the Less, as some have conjectured, or any Apostle, for the Apostles had fled, v. 50.

If this young man who followed our Lord was St. Mark himself, as some suppose, and as seems probable, then this incident affords evidence of St. Matthew's accuracy; for St. Mark, with one or two additions of his own, adopts here St. Matthew's narrative of these transactions, which this young man, supposed to be St. Mark himself, must have witnessed. This probably is the reason why an incident otherwise seemingly so unimportant, is introduced by the Evangelist.

Suppose also that the young man was not St. Mark, yet it is certain that only a person well acquainted with the scene from personal knowledge, probably as an eye-witness, would have introduced into his account of it so slight and seemingly so trivial an incident as this, which has no bearing on the course and issue of the events described.

And since such an incident would only have been introduced by one very familiar with the scene, we have therefore here a testimony to St. Matthew's accuracy, whether we suppose the young man to have been St. Mark or not.

— νεανίσκοι] for נַעֲרִים (nearim), young men, soldiers (2 Sam. ii. 14. Gen. xiv. 24). The attendants in Acts v. 10 are also called νεανίσκοι.

51, 52. γυμνός] i. e. without any upper garment (ἱμάτιον), and

53. τὸν ἀρχιερέα] the High Priest Caiaphas. See on Matt. xxvi. 57, and for notes to the end of this Chapter.

54. φῶς] the fire. By which his countenance was more easily recognized.

56. ἴσαι] consistent; thus ἴσοι is used by LXX for תִּמְיָם (tammim), twins, pairs (Exod. xxvi. 24). Two witnesses at least were necessary (Deut. xvii. 6; xix. 15).

62—64. τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου—βλασφημία] Our Lord, it would appear, spoke δεικτικῶς, identifying Himself with the Son of Man (as described by Daniel, vii. 13), and confessing Himself to be the Christ, the Son of the Blessed One. Thus, in the opinion of the High Priest, He was guilty of blasphemy, that is, of arrogating to Himself what belonged to a Divine Person. For this sense of βλασφημία, see note on Matt. xxvi. 65.

This passage, where Christ thus speaks of Himself, confirms the exposition given above of Matt. xvi. 18.

On the sense of the word Εὐλογητὸς, Blessed, only applied to God, and applied by St. Paul to Christ, and thus affirming Christ to be God, see Rom. ix. 5.

72. ἀνεμ.—τὸ ῥῆμα ὅ] So D, E, F, G, H, K, and others,—a stronger expression than ἀν. τοῦ ῥήματος, the reading of Elz.; ἀναμνησσκομαι is used with the accusative 2 Cor. vii. 15. Heb. x. 32. It is something more than remembered; he called to mind, and dwelt upon in his thoughts. An act of godly sorrow, and true repentance.

—ἐπιβαλὼν ἔκλαιε] The meaning seems to be, Peter did not delay his repentance, but immediately, although in the presence of persons who were thirsting for his Master's blood, he made public profession of sorrow and shame for his sin. He did not dismiss the thought of it from his mind (οὐκ ἀπέβαλε), but on the contrary he gave his mind to it; he, as it were, threw his whole mind and soul upon his sin; and he threw himself into a deep and earnest act of godly sorrow for it, and was weeping (ἔκλαιε) for it.

The word βάλλω is used in this reflective sense, Acts xxvii. 14, ἔβαλε κατ' αὐτῆς ἀνεμος, and Mark himself has (iv. 37), τὰ κύματα ἐπέβαλλον εἰς τὸ πλοῖον. So πασαδῶ (sc. ἐαυτὸν), Mark iv. 29. So Acts iv. 15; xvii. 18, συνέβαλλον, and Acts xxvii. 43, ἀπορρίψαντας, i.e. having cast themselves out (of the ship). So ἔστρεψε Θεὸς (Acts vii. 42), God turned Himself, and ἀναστρέψαντες (Acts v. 22). And so ἔγειρε is used often by St. Mark (ii. 9. 11; iii. 3; v. 41; x. 49) for arise.

Thus St. Peter presents an instructive example of public penitence for a public sin; and commends the duty of earnestly considering our sins, and of cherishing a lively sense of them in our hearts, and of endeavouring to feel their guilt more and more deeply, instead of attempting to stifle the recollection of them, and to harden our hearts against the motions and strivings of Conscience and God's Holy Spirit within us.

In the word ἐπιβαλὼν may there not also be a contrast of St. Peter's case with that of Judas? the one an encouragement to true repentance (μετάνοια), the other a warning against mere μεταμέλεια. (Cp. 2 Cor. vii. 10.) St. Peter ἐπιβαλὼν ἔκλαιε. Judas ρίψας τὰ ἀργύρια ἀπήγγελετο (Matt. xxvii. 5), he threw down the silver—and cast himself down, πληρὴς γενόμενος, ἐδάκρυσε μέσος (Acts i. 18). The one was godly dejection and sorrow unto life; the other was worldly sorrow and self precipitation unto death.

The following summary of interpretations of this much controverted expression is from Meyer, p. 171. It will be observed, that after reciting them all he adopts that which has been received by the English Authorized Version: "ἐπι. ἔκλαιε nicht: cæpit flere (Vulg., Syr., Euth., Zig., Luther, Castal., Heins., Beng., Loesn., Mich., Kuinoel u. M.), da ἐπέβαλε κλαίειν stehen müsste, und dieses heissen würde: er warf sich darauf, betrieb es, zu weinen (vgl. Erasm. u. Vatabl.: "prorupit in fletum"); auch nicht: cum se foras projecisset (Beza, Raphael, Vater u. M.), da ἐπιβαλὼν wohl heissen könnte: als er darauf los gestürzt war, nicht aber, als er hinausgestürzt war, zu welcher Alteration Matth. 26, 75. Luk. 22, 62 keinesweges berechtigen; auch nicht: veste capiti injecta flevit (Theophyl., Salmas. de fen. Trap. p. 272, Calov., L. Bos, Wolf, Elsn., Krebs, Fischer, Rosenm., Paulus, Fritzsche u. M.), was eine im Contexte nicht berechnete und bei ἐπιβαλὼν beispiellose Suppletion voraussetzt; auch nicht, und zwar aus demselben Grunde: nachdem er die Augen auf Jesum geworfen (Hammond, Palair.); auch nicht: addens, i. e. præterea (Grot.), was sprachwidrig ist, oder repetitis vicibus flevit (Cleric., Heupel, Münth.), was ein schon vorhergegangenes Weinen voraussetzen würde (*Theophr. Kypke, Glückl., De Wette, Bornem. (in d. Stud. u. Krit. 1843, p. 139): als er darauf gemerkt hatte, nämlich auf dieses ῥῆμα Jesu, als er seine Erwägung darauf gerichtet hatte (S. d. Beispiele zu diesem unzweifelhaften Gebrauch von ἐπιβάλλειν mit und ohne τὸν νοῦν oder τὴν διάνοιαν b. Weist. p. 632 f. Kypke i. p. 196 f.). Letztere Fassung erscheint contextmässiger, weil ἀνεμνήσθη etc. vorhergeht, so dass ἐπιβαλὼν dem ἀνεμνήσθη als die sich daran knüpfende weitere geistige Thätigkeit, die nun das Weinen zur Folge hatte, entspricht. Petrus erinnert sich des Wortes, sinit nach darüber, weint."

— ἔκλαιε] he was weeping; he continued weeping; something more than ἐκλαυσε, and much stronger than ἐδάκρυσε: see Luke xix. 41.

CH. XV. 1. πρῶτ[ον] See Matt. xxvii. 1.

— τῷ Πιλάτῳ] to Pilate, the Roman Governor. Yet it is observable, St. Mark never adds to Pilate's name the title ἡγεμὼν, or Governor, nor does St. Luke, though he used τοῦ ἡγεμόνος (the Governor) once, as equivalent to Pilate (xx. 20), nor does St. John; whereas St. Matthew says (xxvii. 2) Pilate, the Governor, and repeats the word the Governor frequently (xxvii. 11, 14, 15, 21, 23, 27; xxviii. 14); nor do any of the other Evangelists except St. Luke once, as above mentioned, use the term the Governor as a synonym for Pilate. Cp. Matt. xxvii. 11, with Mark xv. 2, where Mark has changed St. Matthew's ἡγεμὼν into Πιλάτος, and the same is done in Mark xv. 5, compared with Matt. xxvii. 14, and in Mark xv. 12, compared with Matt. xxvii. 21, and in Mark xv. 14, compared with Matt. xxvii. 23. In other places St. Mark omits St. Matthew's ἡγεμὼν. Cp. Mark xv. with Matt. xxvii. 15, and Mark xv. 16, with Matt. xxvii. 27.

The title "the Governor" was identified with Pilate, at the time in which, and by the persons for whom, the Gospel of St. Matthew was written; and afterwards, when the other Evangelists wrote, it was universally known by Christians, that Pilate was the Roman Governor at the Crucifixion.

8. ἀναβοήσας] B and D have ἀναβᾶς here, which has been received by some Editors.

18. Χαῖρε, ὁ βασιλεὺς] Thou that art the King—the reading of A, C, E, F, G, and other MSS.—a stronger expression than Χαῖρε, βασιλεῦ (Elz.), and a more remarkable confession of the truth; though they who uttered it knew it not.

25. ὥρα τρίτῃ] the third hour; nine o'clock in the morning. See on John xix. 14, and here v. 33.

26. ἡ ἐπιγραφή] the inscription. As to the varieties in the Evangelical accounts of the Inscription on the Cross, see on John xix. 19.

28. μετὰ ἀνόμων] with transgressors. Isa. liii. 12, where the LXX has ἐν τοῖς ἀνόμοις ἐλογίσθη. Ἐν τοῖς ἀνόμοις is the Hebr. בְּשִׁפְחֵי (elh-posheim), from root שָׁפַח (pasha), to revolt or rebel. (Cp. Gen. xviii. 23 25.) The sense therefore is, He who was a perfect example of obedience to Law, was counted a rebel against it, and was punished as such.

29. Καί] See Matt. xxvii. 39.

33. ὥρας ἑκτῆς] St. Mark had related above (xv. 25), that He was crucified at the third hour, nine o'clock; the darkness began at noon and continued till three o'clock (Matt. xxvii. 45. Mark xv. 33. Luke xxiii. 44), when our Lord expired.

34. Ἐλωὶ] St. Mark uses the Syriac or vernacular form, Hebr. 'HAL. See Matt. xxvii. 46. Glass. Phil. p. 150. "Even to His last breath," says Theophyl., "Christ honours the Hebrew Scripture."

39. κεντυρίων] centurion. St. Mark uses the Latin form of this word; but St. Matthew (xxvii. 54) and St. Luke (xxiii. 47) have ἑκατόνταρχος there. Cf. vv. 44, 45. See above, ii. 4.

40. τοῦ μικροῦ] the less. This epithet is added by St. Mark only (cp. Matt. xiii. 55; xxvii. 56), and appears to show that the other James, the son of Zebedee, had been made generally known to the Church in some remarkable manner when St. Mark wrote—probably by his martyrdom (Acts xii. 2); and perhaps St. James, the son of Alphaeus, when elevated to be Bishop of Jerusalem (see Acts xii. 17; xxi. 18. Gal. ii. 12), had taken the name ὁ μικρὸς, the less, in humility to distinguish him from the other Apostle of the same name. Cp. James i. 9.

— Σαλώμη] Salome. St. Matthew has here (xxvii. 56) μῆτηρ τῶν υἱῶν Ζεβεδαίου, the mother of the sons of Zebedee. When St. Mark wrote they were known more generally by their own names; and it is probable that their mother's name was then commonly known to be Salome. He mentions her here by name in this honourable office of waiting at the cross, and as having followed Christ and ministered to Him. Before (x. 35) he had used the more paraphrastic expression (viz., the "Sons of Zebedee"), as on a less creditable occasion, and because her sons were concerned in, and parties to, the ambitious request, which was made by her in their behalf. See Matt. xx. 20.

a John 20. 14.

42. παρασκευή] the preparation, i. e. for the Sabbath; and therefore St. Mark, writing for other readers besides Jews, explains the word by προσάββατον, which St. Matthew, specially writing for Jews, does not.

Parasceue is the name by which Friday is now generally known in Asia and Greece. This Friday, or προσάββατον (i. e. the preparation for the Sabbath), is called παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα by St. John (xix. 14); where see note.

43. Ἀριμαθαίας] See Matt. xxvii. 57.

— ὃς καὶ αὐτὸς] Who also himself (as well as the devout women and other faithful Israelites) was waiting for the kingdom of God, although, as a counsellor and member of the Sanhedrim, he had been hitherto influenced by political considerations, and had made no open avowal of his faith. But now, such was the force of the conviction produced by the circumstances of the Crucifixion on his mind, he takes courage (see next note), even when others falter for fear, and goes boldly to Pilate, and craves the body of Jesus.

— τολμήσας] having taken courage. For a similar use of τολμάω, see Phil. i. 14. Rom. x. 20. Up to this time he had only been a Disciple of Jesus in secret, for fear of the Jews (see John xix. 38); but now, when even the Disciples had fled, he, struck by the wonderful circumstances of the Crucifixion, took courage, and went boldly to Pilate.

44. ἐθαύμασεν εἰ] wondered that,—with a feeling of doubt, whether—. So Joseph. Ant. ix. 9. 2, θαυμάζειν ἔλεγεν, εἰ τοῦτους ἡγείται θεός. (Kuin.)

46. ἀγοράσας] having bought. The mention of buying here and in xvi. 1 seems to be made to mark the time, i. e. to intimate that in the former case the Sabbath had not begun, and that in the latter it was over. See on Luke xxiii. 56.

47. Μαρία Ἰωσή] Mary (the mother) of Joseph, and of James the Less. See v. 40; xvi. 1. She was the wife of Cleophas, and sister of the Blessed Virgin (John xix. 25), and is called "the other Mary" by St. Matthew (xxvii. 61).

— ἐθεώρουν] were looking; cp. xii. 41; xv. 40.

CH. XVI. 1. καὶ διαγ. τ. σ.] See Greg. M. Hom. in Ev. xxi. p. 1527.

2. λίαν πρῶτ'] See Matt. xxviii. 1.

4. καὶ ἀναβλέψασαι] and when they had looked up, they see that the stone has been rolled away. It had been rolled away, in order that they might enter into the sepulchre, and see the place where the Lord had lain, and from which He had raised Himself before the stone was rolled away. See Matt. xxviii. 2.

— ἦν γὰρ μέγας σφόδρα] for it was very great. The greatness of the stone was a reason why even in the dimness of the morning (λίαν πρῶτ') they could see that the Stone had been rolled away from the mouth of the cave, and that the Sepulchre was open. They then go forward and see the bright raiment of the Angel shining in the darkness of the cave at that early hour.

6. τὸν Ναζαρητὸν τὸν ἐσταυρωμένον] the Nazarene, Him who has been crucified. The Angel is not ashamed of the Cross (see Gal. vi. 14), nor of the ignominious name Nazarene. The tree of shame had become a netser or branch of glory blossoming with heavenly bloom, that will never fade. (See Matt. ii. 23.) "Radix amara crucis evanuit, flos vitæ cum fructibus surrexit in gloriâ." (Gloss.) Cp. Acts xxii. 8, where our Lord, speaking from His seat of heavenly glory, calls Himself Jesus of Nazareth; and see Rev. v. 5.

7. τῷ Πέτρῳ] to Peter. These words of the Angel are in St. Mark only, and confirm the primitive statement, that his Gospel was due in great measure to St. Peter (see above, viii. 29, and p. 112—4). And this recital of these words of Christ, treasured up by the thankful Apostle, and recorded here by his son in the faith, St. Mark, seems like the thankful acknowledgment of a contrite heart, overflowing with love for the Divine tenderness to him after his denial. (See xiv. 72.) And they beautifully illustrate our Lord's saying, that there is joy among the Angels of God over one sinner that repenteth (Luke xv. 10).

9—20. Ἀναστὰς] The genuineness of this, and the remaining verses of this Gospel, has been questioned by some. It is said that S. Jerome affirms (ad Hedib. iv. 172), that almost all the Greek MSS. are without this portion of the Gospel. See Davidson's Introduction, p. 164, and Tregelles, on the printed Text of N. T. pp. 246—261, where are some excellent remarks on this subject. But this allegation appears to be erroneous.

S. Jerome is writing to Hedibia, a lady living in France, who asks him a question concerning the time of our Lord's Resurrection, and His appearance to Mary Magdalene, and he is explaining in what manner the account in St. Mark's Gospel may be reconciled with that of the other Evangelists. Even suppose there be a discrepancy, he observes, then we may say that "non recipimus αὐτοῦ γενομένοις, πενθοῦσι καὶ κλαίουσι (²³⁴/_x) ¹¹ κἀκεῖνοι ἀκούσαντες ὅτι ζῇ

Marci testimonium, omnibus Græciæ libris pene hoc capitulum in fine non habentibus?"

But perhaps the word 'capitulum,' as here used by S. Jerome, does not mean any thing more than the section, consisting of three verses, in which our Lord's appearance to Mary Magdalene is described; and S. Jerome's meaning may be, that this 'capitulum' or κεφάλαιον, at the close of St. Mark's Gospel, is absent from many MSS.

But this sentence of S. Jerome ought not to have been construed to mean that the whole of the remaining portion of the Gospel, containing twelve verses (9—20), was not found in those MSS. Indeed, S. Jerome himself affirms that v. 14 is found in the Greek MSS. He says (adv. Pelagian. ii. 6), "In quibusdam exemplaribus et maximè in Græcis codicibus juxta Marcum in fine ejus Evangelii scribitur, Postea, cum accubuissent undecim apparuit eis Jesus, et exprobravit incredulitatem et duritiam cordis quia his qui viderant eum non crediderunt." See v. 14.

The fact is, that the whole of this portion (9—20) is found in all the extant Greek Manuscripts of St. Mark, with one or two exceptions, particularly Codex B. or Vaticanus.

It is found in almost all the Versions of the Gospel; in the very ancient Curetonian Syriac Version lately discovered, verses 17—20 are preserved; the rest of the Version of this Gospel being lost.

It was also known to S. Irenæus, who quotes v. 19, and says (iii. 10, 6), "In fine Evangelii ait Marcus, 'et quidem Jesus postquam locutus est eis, receptus est in cælos et sedet ad dexteram Dei.'" And a confirmation of this testimony has been recently discovered and published by Dr. Cramer, Caten. in Marc. p. 449, δ μὲν οὖν Κύριος μετὰ τὸ λαλῆσαι αὐτοῖς—Θεοῦ. Εἰρηναῖος δ τῶν Ἀποστόλων πλησίον, ἐν τῇ πρὸς τὰς αἰρέσεις γ' λόγῳ τοῦτο ἀνέγραψεν τὸ ῥητὸν ὡς Μάρκῳ εἰρημένον.

On the other hand, we have the assertion of Eusebius in the fourth century, endeavouring to solve a difficulty concerning the time of the Resurrection (Quæstion. ad Marinum, in Mai's Collec. Vatic. iv. p. 254, ed. Rom. 1847), and saying that the verses describing the Resurrection are not found in all copies (ἐν ἅπασιν ἀντιγράφοις) of the Gospel of St. Mark; and that the most accurate copies end at ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ. And he adds, "that portion which follows, being merely read in some copies, and not in all, may be regarded as superfluous, especially if it is found to contradict the testimony of the other Evangelists."

"This solution (adds Eusebius) may be offered, and so the question may be disposed of."

But, as Cardinal Mai has shown (p. 255), this testimony as to the copies is controverted by other evidence; and, as if this way of removing the difficulty did not quite satisfy his own mind, Eusebius then proceeds to offer another solution.

It appears, also, that the Ammonian Sections and the Eusebian Canons were not originally continued beyond verse 8.

But the remarks of Eusebius (it may be observed) are by no means of the same force, as a direct testimony would be, which affirmed that this portion (vv. 9—20) is not found in the MSS. of this Gospel.

They are offered in reply to an objection, and in order to solve a difficulty; and it is evident that neither the testimony of Eusebius nor Jerome,—who seems to have copied Eusebius,—can be extended very far; they can only be applied to the MSS. which happened to come under their own personal observation.

But, if the verse itself had been absent from the MSS. generally in other parts of the world, the question proposed to Eusebius and Jerome would never have arisen. The mention of the difficulty in these verses is itself a proof that the verses were found in MSS. in other parts of the world, particularly in the West. And, inasmuch as St. Mark's Gospel was in all probability written in the West, and particularly for the use of the West, the testimony of the West is of more value than that of the "libri Græciæ," to which S. Jerome refers; and the evidence of S. Irenæus in the West, early in the third century, must outweigh that of Eusebius and that of S. Jerome in the East, in the fourth; particularly that of S. Jerome, which is not in harmony with itself, and may have been borrowed from Eusebius.

Besides, if it had been true, that these verses were not found in the MSS. generally in the fourth century, how is it, that of the many hundreds of MSS. which exist now, there should be only one, of any note, in which these verses, and the whole of the residue, to the end of the Gospel, are not found? How is it that they exist also in almost all Versions of the Gospel? The circumstance that Eusebius and others appeal to the absence of these verses (9, 10) from some MSS. in order to get rid of a difficulty, suggests the belief that some copyists might be disposed to conclude the Gospel with verse 8, ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ, and so the omission might be propagated; and it also leads to a belief that these verses, supposed to contain a difficulty, were not very likely to be added to the Gospel of St. Mark by an unauthorized hand, or to be received, as they have been received, in almost every extant Manuscript and Version of the Gospel.

There is a testimony also, coming from the East, which deserves particular notice. Victor of Antioch (or, as some say, S. Cyril of Jerusalem; see Cramer's Catena, p. xxvi), in his Comment on St. Mark, says thus:—

"Since these verses ('Having risen on the first day of the week,' v. 9, &c.) are added in some copies to the Gospel of St. Mark, and since this account seems to disagree with that of St. Matthew, we will say that it might be answered, that this conclusion, which is found in some copies of St. Mark, is spurious. But, in order that we may not seem to take refuge in a plea made ready for the occasion, we will read the verse thus,—'Having arisen,' and then put a comma, and so introduce the words, 'early on the first day of the week,' &c." (Matthæi, N. Test. ii. p. 269.) "But although" (cp. Cramer's Catena, p. 447), he adds, "the words 'having arisen,' &c., are not found in very many copies, because some thought them spurious, yet we have found them in very many of the accurate copies; and according to the copy of the Gospel received in Palestine (κατὰ τὸ Παλαιστιναῖον Εὐαγγέλιον Μάρκου), we have added them, as the true original of St. Mark has them, and according to the account therein contained of the Resurrection of our Lord,—that is, from the words 'having risen,' down to 'signs following. Amen.'" (vv. 9—20.)

Besides, it may be added, this portion is acknowledged by S. Hippolytus (scholar of S. Irenæus), Bishop of Portus, near Rome; and so the Roman Church, for which this Gospel was specially written, bears witness to it. (See Apost. Const. in Hippolyt. ed. Fabric. i. 245.) See also the xxixth Homily of Gregory the Great, Bishop of Rome, cited below, v. 17. It is acknowledged by S. Augustine (de Cons. Ev. iii. 24), and is commented on as authentic by Bede (p. 257), Theophylact (p. 263), and Euthym. (p. 116), and in the Catena Aurea.

Further, it is improbable that the Gospel ever ended with ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ, v. 8. Such a conclusion is very abrupt, and, in this respect, without a parallel in the New Testament. Again; all the Gospels, and indeed all the Books of the New Testament (as might be expected), end happily. This note of fear is very unlike the consummation of the Gospel, which communicates "glad tidings of great joy."

Besides, if the portion beginning with the word Ἀναστὰς had not been a continuation of what precedes, but an independent pericope, it is probable that the word Jesus would have been found in the first sentence.

There is, however, internal evidence, which would seem to intimate that this portion is not from the pen of St. Mark himself. Many expressions occur in this section which are not found in any portion of St. Mark; e. g. πορεύομαι used thrice (10, 12, 15), and in no other place of St. Mark; δεδομαι used twice (11, 14), and in no other place of St. Mark; ἕτερος used v. 12, and in no other place of St. Mark; ἐκεῖνος, put absolutely without a substantive three times (10, 13, 20), and in no other place of St. Mark; and ὁ Κύριος used twice for Christ (19, 20), and in no other place of St. Mark; and the less common words, παρακολουθεῖν, ἐπακολουθεῖν, συνεργεῖν, βεβαίω.

In a word,—if we were to be called upon to determine this question on internal evidence alone, we might be disposed to conjecture that this portion was due rather to St. Luke or St. John, than to St. Mark.

However, arguments derived from the style of authors inspired by the Holy Ghost, are to be used with great caution. The same Spirit Who prompted and enabled them to write, might also prompt and enable them to write in different styles on different occasions, and thus show more clearly their dependence on Himself. How different is the style of the two Epistles of St. Mark's master—St. Peter! How different the style of the Apocalypse, and the Gospel of St. John!

So great a change as that wrought by the Resurrection of Christ might suggest a change of style; as changes are made in music to mark changes of action and feeling.

But, after all, the question of authorship is comparatively of little moment. It is sufficient to know that this portion of the Gospel is received by the Universal Church, bearing witness to it in the great body of Manuscripts and Versions, and that it is received and read by her as Holy Scripture; in short, that it is received as the WORD of GOD, by the SPIRIT of GOD, in the CHURCH of GOD.

Let us add, that the fact to which reference has been made, viz. the uncertainty of its authorship, is one which is suggestive of very instructive reflections.

This portion may not have been penned by St. Mark himself. This very doubt brings before our minds the important question—“On what grounds do we receive the Scriptures as the Word of God?”

We do not know who was employed by the Holy Spirit to write the Book of Job, or the conclusion of the Books of Deuteronomy, or of Joshua, or many of the Psalms; but we receive them as Canonical Scripture, and as the work of the HOLY GHOST.

If we knew, by whose hand every book of Scripture was penned, we might be tempted to imagine that the Inspiration of Scripture depended on the writers, by whose instrumentality Scripture was written, and not on the Holy Ghost, who employed them.

Our ignorance of the human instrument raises our eyes to the Divine Agent; it leads us to consider, why we receive the Books of Scripture as Scripture? We do not receive them because they were indited by Moses or by David, by St. Matthew or by St. Paul,—but because they are inspired by the Holy Ghost, and have been received as such by the Voice of Christ speaking in His Body, the Church, to which He has promised His own presence and guidance for ever.

Let, therefore, this portion of the Gospel not have been written by St. Mark, still it is as much a part of the Gospel as what was written by him; and it serves to bring out forcibly the great truth, that though all the Books of Scripture were anonymous, they would be no less Scripture than they are now. It reminds us of our duty to distinguish, in sacred things, the human channel from the Divine Source. It speaks of the solemn obligation under which we are, to receive the Scriptures and the Sacraments,—not because they are ministered to us by the hands of this or that man,—however holy he may be,—but because they flow from the one fountain and well-spring of all Truth and Grace,—the Wisdom and the Love of God.

12. ἐν ἐτέρᾳ μορφῇ] in a different form. Cp. Luke xxiv. 16. 15.] S. Jerome (contra Pelagian. ii. 6, vol. iv. p. 520, see on v. 9 above) quotes a remarkable answer as here made by the eleven to Christ, “Et illi satisfaciebant dicentes, sæculum illud iniquitatis substantia (al. sub Satanâ) est, quæ non sinit per immundos Spiritus veram Dei apprehendi virtutem, idcirco jam nunc revela justitiam Tuam.”

— τὸ εὐαγγέλιον] See above, x. 29. — πάσῃ τῇ κτίσει] to the whole creation. תְּבִיאָה (col biryah), equivalent to all men, that is, not to Jews only and Samaritans, but Gentiles. (Rosen.) Cp. Rom. viii. 21, 22.

16. ὁ πιστεύσας] οὐκ εἶπε, ὅτι ὁ πιστεύσας μόνον, οὐδὲ, ὅτι ὁ βαπτισθεὶς μόνον· ἀλλ' ἀμφότερα συνέζυξε· θάτερον γὰρ θάτερον χάρις οὐ σώζει τὸν ἄνθρωπον. Euthym., and cp. Theophyl. here.

He does not say καὶ μὴ βαπτισθεὶς after ἀπιστήσας. This would have been superfluous. For he who does not believe will not consent to be baptized. Cp. Bp. Lonsdale here.

17. Σημεῖα] Signs. On the continuation of these miraculous gifts to the Christians of the second century, see Tertullian, de Spectaculis, 26, and ad Scapulam, c. 2, “dæmonas de hominibus expellimus, sicut plurimis notum est,” and Ireneus, v. 6.

The objection that such miracles as these, wrought in the primitive times by the faithful, in evidence of the truth of Christianity, are not now seen in the Church as signs of belief in Christ, is considered by Greg. M. in Ev. hom. xxix., whose words deserve to be carefully read, especially by members of the Church of Rome, who contend that the presence of Miracles is a Note of the Church. His words will perhaps have more weight with them, as coming from one of the greatest of the Bishops of Rome;

Signa autem eos qui credituri sunt, hæc sequuntur. In nomine meo dæmonia ejicient; linguis loquentur novis; serpentes tollent; et si mortiferum quid biberint, non eis nocebit; super ægros manus imponent, et bene habebunt. Num quidnam, fratres mei, quia ista signa non facitis, minime creditis? Sed hæc necessaria in exordio Ecclesiæ fuerunt. Ut enim fides cresceret, miraculis fuerat nutrienda: quia et nos cum arbusta plantamus, tamdiu eis aquam infundimus, quousque ea in terrâ jam convalescere videamus; et si semel radicem fixerint, in rigando cessamus. Hinc est enim quod Paulus dicit: Lingue in signum sunt, non fidelibus, sed infidelibus. (1 Cor. xiv. 22.)

He then proceeds excellently to show, how, in a spiritual sense, the miracles specified here by Christ are still wrought daily in the Church; and he admirably compares their value with the miracles of primitive times;

Habemus de his signis atque virtutibus quæ adhuc subtiliùs considerare debeamus. Sancta quippe Ecclesia quotidie spiritaliter facit quod tunc per Apostolos corporaliter faciebat. Nam sacerdotes ejus cum per exorcismi gratiam manum credentibus imponunt, et habitare malignos spiritus in eorum mente contradicunt, quid aliud faciunt, nisi dæmonia ejicient? Et fideles quique qui jam vitæ veteris secularia verba derelinquunt, sancta autem mysteria insonant, Conditoris sui laudes et potentiam, quantum prævalent, narrant, quid aliud faciunt, nisi novis linguis loquuntur? Qui jam bonis suis exhortationibus malitiam de alienis cordibus auferunt, serpentes tollunt. Et dum pestiferas suasiones audiunt, sed tamen ad operationem pravam minime retrahuntur, mortiferum quidem est quod bibunt, sed non eis nocebit. Qui quoties proximos suos in bono opere infirmari conspiciunt, dum eis totâ virtute concurrunt, et exemplo sue operationis illorum vitam roborant qui in propriâ actione titubant, quid aliud faciunt, nisi super ægros manus imponent, ut bene habeant? Quæ nimirum miracula tantò majora sunt quantò spiritalia; tantò majora sunt, quantò per hæc non corpora, sed animæ suscitantur; hæc itaque signa, fratres carissimi, auctore Deo, si vultis, vos facitis. Ex illis enim exterioribus signis obtineri vitæ ab hæc operantibus non valet. Nam corporalia illa miracula ostendunt aliquando sanctitatem, non autem faciunt; hæc verò spiritalia, quæ aguntur in mente, virtutem vitæ non ostendunt, sed faciunt. Illa habere et mali possunt; istis autem perfrui nisi boni non possunt. Unde de quibusdam Veritas dicit: Multi mihi dicent in die illâ, Domine, Domine, nonne in nomine tuo prophetavimus, et in nomine tuo dæmonia ejecimus, et in nomine tuo virtutes multas fecimus? Et tunc confitebor illis, quia non novi vos; discedite à me qui operamini iniquitatem. (Matt. vii. 23.)

Nolite ergo, fratres carissimi, amare signa quæ possunt boni cum reprobis habere communia, sed hæc quæ modò diximus, caritatis atque pietatis miracula amare; quæ tantò securiora sunt, quantò et occulta; et de quibus apud Dominum eò major sit retributio, quò apud homines minor est gloria.

close of this Gospel is not reconcileable with the assertion of St. Luke (Acts i. 3), that our Lord remained on earth forty days after His Resurrection. See, for example, Meyer, pp. 191, 192, who admits the fact of the Ascension, but yet, on such grounds as this, rejects the Evangelical account of it. Cp. note below on Luke xxiv. 50.

But it is certain that the word λαλεῖν = Hebr. דרש has a very wide signification in the N. T. It signifies to teach, to instruct, by preaching and by other oral communication; and when spoken of Christ, by Divine Revelation. Thus John ix. 29, Μωσῆς ἐλάληκεν ὁ Θεός, God has revealed Himself to Moses. John xv. 22, εἰ μὴ ἦλθον, καὶ ἐλάλησα αὐτοῖς, if I had not come and preached to them. See also its use in Mark xiii. 11, three times; and Acts v. 40.

Therefore, inasmuch as one of the purposes of our Lord's remaining on earth after His Resurrection, was to instruct His Apostles in the things pertaining to the kingdom of God (Acts i. 3), the present passage may be illustrated by that statement, and may be construed to mean that (μετὰ τὸ λαλῆσαι αὐτοῖς) after He had fully instructed them by His oral teaching, He ascended into heaven. On the probable reasons for our Lord's sojourn on earth for the term of forty days before His Ascension, see on Matt. iv. 2. Acts i. 3.

It is observable that the fact of the Ascension is gradually revealed in the Gospels.

St. Matthew does not mention it at all at the close of his Gospel; St. Mark only briefly notices it; but St. Luke, whose special purpose it was to display Christ as the Great High Priest of the Church, blessing and praying for His people, fully describes it in his Gospel (xxiv. 50—53), and in the Acts of the Apostles (i. 3—11), throughout which book he leads his readers to contemplate Christ as ascended into heaven, and as sitting at God's right hand, and as ruling the Church and the World from his heavenly throne of glory. See the Introduction to St. Luke's Gospel, p. 163, 164, and the Introduction to the Acts of the Apostles.

St. John adds nothing to the description of the Ascension given by his predecessors, but takes the fact for granted, and assumes it to be well known to his readers (John vi. 62; xx. 17); and thus by his silence testifies his approval of that account, and intimates that it is sufficient.

INTRODUCTION

TO

ST. LUKE'S GOSPEL.

It is affirmed by some ancient Christian writers, that St. Luke¹ was a native of Antioch², the capital of Syria; and that his Gospel was written with a special view to the spiritual benefit of the Gentile world, particularly of those who inhabited Greece³; that it was composed by him when an associate in the missionary labours of the Apostle St. Paul⁴, by whom, as seems probable⁵, he is called “the brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the Churches,” and “Luke the beloved physician⁶,” and perhaps also “true yokefellow⁷.”

In a word, as St. Paul in his oral teaching, and in his Epistles, was eminently the Apostle of the Gentiles, so his friend, fellow-labourer, and companion St. Luke, may be entitled the Evangelist of the Heathen World.

It is probable, as has been already observed, that St. Luke was born at Antioch. Antioch was the Metropolis of the Seleucid Dynasty, and it had been much beautified and enlarged by Antiochus Epiphanes, the Syrian monarch, who was the persecutor of the ancient people of God, and who has been generally regarded by the Christian Church as a type of Antichrist.

But, under God's good Providence, Antioch became the centre of Gentile Christianity; in it the disciples were first called Christians⁸; there the Apostle of the Gentiles, St. Paul, was ordained to the Apostolic office⁹. This was the starting-point and goal of his first and second missionary tours. From that city the Christian Name sounded out into all the earth. From that city the Gospel went forth, preached by St. Paul and St. Luke, to the Gentile World; and thus the city of that King who was the fiercest persecutor of the ancient people of God, became, as it were, the Capital of Christendom, and displayed a prophetic representation of the future triumphs of the Gospel over all the opposition of its adversaries.

The statements of Christian Antiquity concerning St. Luke's connexion with St. Paul, and the relation of his Gospel to Greece and to Hellenistic Proselytes,—who formed a bond of union between Jews and Gentiles, and were the seminary of the Gentile Church¹⁰—and to the Gentile world, are confirmed by the internal evidences presented by the Gospel of St. Luke.

If we open that Gospel, and examine its contents in regular order, we find, in its peculiar characteristics¹¹, a succession of proofs in corroboration of this statement.

¹ On the name Luke, Λουκᾶς, Lucas, an abbreviation of Lucanus, see Bentley, Epist. ad Mill. p. 82. Winer, G. G., p. 93. Compare Ἀπρεμᾶς for Ἀπρεμίδωπος, Δημᾶς for Δημήτριος, Ζηνᾶς for Ζηνόδωπος. See below on Acts xv. 22, and on Titus iii. 13. It is not correct to say that “Lucas was formed from Lucanus, as Silas from Silvanus:” for Silas was evidently the original Hebrew name, and was afterwards Latinized into Silvanus.

² Euseb. iii. 4, Λουκᾶς τὸ γένος ὦν τῶν ἀπ’ Ἀντιοχείας κ. τ. λ. Hieron. (Proem. in Matth.) “Tertius Lucas medicus natione Syrus, Antiochenus,” and (in Cat. Script. Eccl. 7) he says, “Lucas medicus (Coloss. iv. 14) natione Syrus Antiochenus, cujus laus in Evangelio (2 Cor. viii. 18), qui et ipse discipulus Pauli Apostoli in Achaïæ Boeotiæque partibus volumen condidit.” Compare Chrys. in Matth. i., and pp. 5, 6. 46. Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclésiast. ii. p. 60.

There seems no reason to dispute, with some modern critics, the testimony of Eusebius, that St. Luke was born at Antioch. Eusebius, himself a native of Syria, and resident all his life in that country, was surely a competent witness on this subject.

¹¹ The distinguishing characteristics of St. Luke's Gospel may be seen by a reference to the canons of Eusebius and Ammonian sections prefixed to this Volume; which exhibits as peculiar to St. Luke the paragraphs marked in the text of the present edition, with the following numbers, 1, 3, 5, 9, 18, 20, 22, 29, 31, 50, 51, &c., as specified in the above tables, which present 72 such sections as special to this Evangelist.

1. At the beginning of this Gospel we see the Priest Zacharias ministering according to the Levitical Ritual in the Temple at Jerusalem; an Angel announces to him when offering incense at the golden Altar in the Holy Place, that he, a Priest of the order of Aaron, is appointed by God to be the father of the forerunner of the promised Messiah; and that he should call his name John, a name significant of grace. The Priest does not credit the glad tidings, and is struck dumb for unbelief. But when the child is born, and he writes on the tablet "his name is John," then his mouth is opened, and his tongue unloosed, and he is filled with the Holy Ghost, and blesses God, and recognizes the Child as the Prophet of the Highest, who would "go before the face of the Lord to prepare His ways¹."

By this introductory narrative, as was observed by ancient Expositors, the Levitical Law and Ritual are represented as preparatory and ministerial to the Gospel and Priesthood of Christ.

The Priest Zacharias, while ministering in the Temple, is struck dumb, because he does not believe the heavenly Promise; but he recovers his speech when he writes the name of him who was to be the "Voice of one crying in the Wilderness," proclaiming the approach of the Incarnate WORD.

2. The appearance of the Angel Gabriel to Zacharias² in the Temple, and to the Virgin Mary at Nazareth³; and the announcement of the Angel to the Shepherds at Bethlehem⁴; and the glorious light, and the joyful song of the Angelic quire singing the Nativity of Christ, were all very significant, and full of consolation and instruction to the Gentile world.

Christianity proclaimed to the Greeks, that there is but "one God; and though there be many that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, yet to us there is but One God the Father, of Whom are all things, and we in Him, and One Lord Jesus Christ, by Whom are all things⁵."

This declaration announced to them the forfeiture of what was most dear and fair in their eyes. The Mountains and Woods, the Streams and Fountains of their native land, were peopled by their imaginations with beautiful visions of unseen beings, who were worshipped by them as Patrons of their cities, and as the Benefactors and Protectors of their country; and whose ideal forms, sculptured by the hands of the most accomplished masters of statuary, met their eyes in consecrated Groves and magnificent Temples in the sequestered glens of their Hills and Valleys⁶, and in the streets and fortresses of their Cities⁷.

It must have required a severe effort of self-denial and self-sacrifice on the part of such a people as that of Greece, gifted with a lively fancy, a fervid imagination, and a retentive memory; and clinging with patriotic pride to all the local and historical traditions of their native land, to surrender at once their faith in the existence of those deities, which they had hitherto regarded with reverence, and which had been endeared to them by national and social recollections, and had seemed to impart a sanctity to the soil of Greece, and to the Elements themselves, and had inspired those beautiful creations which the Art of Greece had been enabled to produce.

It must therefore have been an unspeakable consolation to such a People as this, to learn from the preachers of the Gospel, that when Christianity demolished the fabric of the Pagan Pantheon, and swept away all its ideal associations, it did not substitute a blank in the place of this fair imagery. It must have been a joyful thing for them to hear, that while there is but "One God, the Father, of Whom are all things and we in Him, and One Lord Jesus Christ,"—yet around the Throne of that one God there are myriads of heavenly beings, far more pure and beautiful than any creation of man's art or device: and that these heavenly beings are messengers of God, and are sent by Him from heaven on embassies of love to man.

This glorious truth is declared with special fulness and clearness by St. Luke, the Evangelist of Greece, both in his Gospel, and in the Acts of the Apostles⁸; and doubtless such a revelation as this would commend those writings to the thankful acceptance of the heathen world.

3. If we proceed further in this Gospel, we find that the Genealogy of Christ, which is inserted in it, is traced upwards through David to Abraham and Noah to Adam, and through him to God.

Thus the Evangelist St. Luke proclaims a truth which was very necessary for the Greeks to learn, and which would be very consolatory to them.

⁵ Such was St. Paul's language to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. viii. 5, 6. Compare also his sermon at Athens, Acts xvii. 29.

⁶ As at Bassæ and Ægina, and in the Heræum near Argos.

⁷ As in the Acropolis at Athens, and numerous other cities described by Pausanias in his tour in Greece.

⁸ See note below on i. 11.

They were to be taught, that Nations were not indigenous, as was supposed by some, and did not grow up from different stocks in separate clans and families, but all sprang from one root; that God "made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth¹;" that all are brethren of one household, children of one earthly Parent, and of one heavenly Father.

These truths were preached by the great Apostle of the Gentiles at Athens, the intellectual metropolis of Greece. "We are His offspring. Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device²." Here was a corrective of pagan Idolatry. And in the Genealogy of Christ, recorded in St. Luke's Gospel, the Gentile, who had been incorporated by Baptism into the mystical Body of Christ, Who had taken the common nature of all mankind in the womb of the blessed Virgin, enjoyed the blessed privilege of reckoning all the Hebrew Saints of the Old Dispensation—such as David and Abraham—among his own spiritual Ancestry. He thus saw himself admitted into the Commonwealth of Israel. He recognized the first Adam as the parent of Mankind by Nature; and he acknowledged Christ, the second Adam, as the Author of the new Creation by Grace; and in the filial relation of Adam to God, and in the everlasting Sonship of Christ, the Incarnate Word, he learned to adore God as the Universal Father and Saviour of all, and as infinitely gracious to all, and as making all men His children by adoption in His beloved Son Jesus Christ; so that all Mankind is now able to raise its eyes to heaven, and join in an universal prayer, and cry, "Abba, Father³."

4. The Greeks needed instruction concerning the origin of Evil. In their systems of Mythology they were conversant with malignant influences; they heard of Titanic powers warring against the gods, and piling up mountains of earth in proud defiance of heaven; and some of them supposed their deities themselves to be bound by the rigid laws of a fatal necessity.

The History of the Temptation in the fourth chapter of St. Luke's Gospel revealed to them the true doctrine on these mysterious matters.

It showed to them a spiritual Power, a Personal Agent, opposing the beneficent operations of Christ. It revealed that Power and Person in his proper light, and with his genuine titles, as Satan, the Adversary, the Devil, the Author of evil, physical and spiritual⁴. But it also revealed him as vanquished by Christ⁵. It manifested Christ casting out unclean demons⁶, and giving power to His disciples to expel them⁷.

The Evangelist St. Luke is careful to distinguish between ordinary diseases and demoniacal possessions⁸; and while he represents Satan as an agent from without in the former cases⁹, he displays his associate spirits as in-dwelling, and energizing from within, in the latter.

Thenceforth the Greeks became familiar with the true doctrine of the cause of Evil, and with the relation of the Powers of Darkness to God,—a subject on which they had sought for illumination from their schools of Philosophy, but in vain.

5. In connexion with the things of the invisible world, it may here be relevant to observe, that the state of the disembodied soul was a question on which the mind of the Greek world had indulged in many inquisitive speculations, and on which it needed instruction.

The terrors of Tartarus and the joys of Elysium, which had been displayed in the writings of their Poets, exercised a dominant influence on the imagination and practice of Heathendom; and, in the Apostolic age, they had a strong hold on the popular mind, and alarmed it with superstitious fears, or mocked it with illusory hopes. Men, indeed, of a more philosophical temper, looked on with sceptical indifference, and treated these representations as legendary fables, and denied the Resurrection of the Body, and the doctrine of future retribution.

Therefore the healing art of the beloved Physician¹⁰, St. Luke, might well be employed in providing a remedy for this spiritual malady.

Accordingly, we see that he has taken care to record two sayings of our Blessed Lord which reflect the clearest light on this mysterious subject; the state of the soul immediately after death, and during the interval of its dissolution and the Day of Resurrection and of Judgment.

He has done this in his recital of the history of the rich man and Lazarus¹¹, and in the speech of our Lord to the penitent thief on the Cross, "To-day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise¹²."

¹¹ See on Luke xvi. 22.

He, also, alone of the Evangelists, in his recital of the miracle of the raising of the daughter of Jairus, has taken care to specify the fact that her spirit came back to her again ¹.

He thus corrected the erroneous notions of popular belief and philosophical incredulity, and revealed to the Greeks the great doctrinal and practical truth, that the human soul, on its separation from the body by death, passes immediately into a place of joy or of sorrow; and that it remains there until the Last Day, when it will be reunited to the body, and be admitted to the full fruition of heavenly bliss, or be consigned to the bitter pains of everlasting woe.

These intimations in this Gospel, concerning spiritual and invisible things and beings, and the attestations to the divine power of Christ over diseases and demoniacal possessions, would receive additional value, in the eyes of Gentile readers, from the fact, that this Gospel is written by one who was led and qualified by his professional studies and occupations to examine carefully, and to analyze scrupulously, the characteristics of physical phenomena, especially in relation to the organization of the human frame; and it must ever be a matter of satisfaction, and a ground of assurance, to the Christian reader, to remember, that the Gospel which deals most with the operations of spiritual agencies, is from the pen of "Luke the beloved Physician ²."

6. Let us pass to another point, concerning the commerce of the heart with the unseen world.

The Jews had their Synagogues ³, in which forms of Prayer were used three times a week: and they had also their Proseuchas ⁴, or lesser Oratories. These religious edifices existed in almost all parts of the world, wherever the Jews were dispersed; and on the three great Annual Festivals they flocked to the Temple at Jerusalem, which had its stated hours of prayer ⁵.

But such was not the case with the Greeks. Their Temples were not houses of prayer. Their worship consisted mainly in sacrifices, or in religious pomps and processions, or in theatric shows. But no Ritual or Liturgy of Heathenism has been preserved to us. They had no Common Prayer; no supplicatory Litanies or eucharistic ascriptions of praise, at least in ordinary use. The secular Odes, and musical Hymns to their Deities, may be regarded rather as poetic effusions produced on special occasions, or as exercises of metrical skill, than as expressions of popular feelings of piety. In a word, the Greek mind and heart was to be schooled in the duties of devotion. Greece was to be taught to fall down upon her knees and pray.

This work has been performed by the Holy Ghost speaking in the Gospel of St. Luke. He is specially studious to inculcate the duty, and to record the privileges, of Prayer.

Here Christ is presented to the world as an example of Prayer. He prays at His Baptism, and the heaven is opened, and the Holy Ghost descends upon Him ⁶. He retires to the wilderness and prays ⁷. He prays and chooses His Apostles ⁸. He prays and is transfigured ⁹. He prays in His agony, and is strengthened by an angel ¹⁰. Christ's prayer for His murderers ¹¹, and His last prayer at His death ¹², are recited by St. Luke alone. His admonition that men ought always to pray is inserted twice in this Gospel ¹³. And the blessed effects of urgent Prayer are represented here in two Parables; in that of the man coming at night to his friend ¹⁴, and in that of the Poor Widow and the Unjust Judge ¹⁵.

St. Luke is careful also to teach how to pray; as, for example, in the Parable of the two men who went up to the Temple to pray ¹⁶, which presents as in a glass those sins that are to be avoided, and those good dispositions which are to be cherished, in all devotional approaches to the Throne of grace ¹⁷.

The duty and blessedness of Thanksgiving to God for benefits received from Him, supplied another subject on which the Gentile world needed instruction. "They glorified Him not, neither were they thankful," is the sentence pronounced upon them by St. Paul ¹⁸. A beautiful picture of Gratitude, and of its reward, is displayed by St. Luke, and by St. Luke alone, in the record of our Lord's miracle of mercy wrought upon the Ten Lepers who stood afar off ¹⁹. The blessing pronounced upon the one, who returned, and with a loud voice glorified God, and fell down at His feet, giving Him thanks, is made more striking and emphatic by its juxtaposition with the divine command, "Go, show yourselves to the Priests ²⁰;" and brings out more prominently the paramount obligation and exceeding felicity of the moral act of Thanksgiving, because it is put in contrast with an express command to discharge a ritual duty of the Levitical Law. That also was to be done; but the first thing to be done was to *glorify God*¹.

7. St. Luke, the Evangelist of the Gentiles, displays also the true character of the Gospel, as a message of grace and glory to all Nations.

The Presentation of Christ, as a Child, in the Temple of Jerusalem, had been accompanied, as St. Luke relates, by a prophetic announcement from the aged Symeon that He was "a light to lighten the Gentiles," as well as the glory of His people Israel². And the first sermon recorded by this Evangelist as preached by Christ Himself in a Jewish Synagogue, contains a proclamation of grace to the Gentile world³. And the treatment which Christ received, when making that declaration, from His own countrymen at Nazareth, was like a prelude and rehearsal of that contumelious usage, with which the same message was afterwards received by the Jews, when it was delivered by St. Luke and St. Paul in their missionary tour in Asia and Greece, as is fully described by St. Luke in the book of the Acts⁴, and by St. Paul in his Epistles, where he says that the Jews "are contrary to all men, and forbid us to speak to the Gentiles that they may be saved⁵."

If we advance a little further in the Gospel of St. Luke, we meet with an incident, recorded by him alone, which displays in striking colours the compassionate tenderness of our blessed Saviour toward penitent sinners, in contrast with the censorious hard-heartedness of the self-righteous Pharisee. "Seest thou this woman? I came into thine house; thou gavest Me no water for My Feet; but she hath washed My Feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. Thou gavest Me no kiss; but this woman, since the time that I came in, hath not ceased to kiss My Feet. Mine head with oil thou didst not anoint, but this woman hath anointed My Feet with ointment. Wherefore I say unto thee, her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much. And He said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven . . . thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace⁶."

Here was a comfortable assurance to the Gentile world. It might see in this Woman a picture of itself coming to Christ, with repentance, faith, and love; and consecrating its most precious things to Him, and presenting its members, once the servants of sin, as instruments of righteousness unto God⁷. And in Christ's words of mercy to this woman, it might hear a gracious message to itself,—"Thy sins are forgiven thee—thy faith hath saved thee—go in peace."

The Universality of Man's apostasy from the Primeval Law of God; the Universality of the Guilt of Mankind; the Universality of the Misery in which the Human Race lay; the Universality of their need of a Redeemer and a Saviour; the Universality of the Redemption accomplished by Christ dying upon the Cross for the sins of the World; the Universality of the Christian Church, constituted by Him to be the Dispenser to all Nations of all the means of grace flowing from His Sacrifice; and the preparatory and transitory character and function of the Levitical Law and Priesthood,—these were solemn topics on which all men needed to be instructed, particularly the Gentile World.

For this purpose St. Luke's Apostolic fellow-labourer, St. Paul, wrote his Epistle to the Romans⁸.

But the Gospel of St. Luke shows, that the way had been prepared for the teaching of the Apostle on this great argument, by the Teaching of CHRIST Himself.

The substance of the Epistles of St. Paul to the Romans and to the Galatians, may be said to be summed up and exhibited to view, in the liveliest and most graphic manner, by two Parables of Christ, as presented by the hand of the Evangelical Painter⁹ (if we may be allowed to adopt the title)—St. Luke.

The wretched condition of Human Nature, straying from God's presence, and swerving from obedience to His Law, is displayed in the person of the Traveller, going forth from Jerusalem, the Holy City, to Jericho, the City of this world¹⁰.

In its way it falls among thieves. Human Nature was encountered by the Arch-thief, Satan, and was stripped of its original righteousness, and was left half dead. The Priesthood came by, and the Law came by¹¹, and cast a transitory glance upon it; but they only showed its misery, and evinced their own inability to heal it, by leaving it where it was, and passing by on the other side.

But at last the Samaritan came. He had compassion on it, and bound up its wounds, pouring in the oil and wine which he had with him, and laid it on his own beast, and brought it to the inn and took care of it. Christ, the good Samaritan, came from heaven on a blessed journey and saw Mankind lying helpless in the road of this world, stripped and naked, full of bruises and putrifying sores. He bound up its wounds, and poured in the oil and wine of His own cleansing and sanctifying blood, and lifted it up from the ground, and put it on His own beast. He Himself bore our griefs and carried our sorrows¹. He Himself bore our sins in His own body on the tree². He brought us to the Inn, and has given us into the keeping of the host, with a charge to take care of us; and at His departure he provided for us; and He has promised to come again and demand an account of our treatment. He has brought us to the spiritual Inn and general Refectory, the Catholic Church, happily called *Pandochœum*³, or universal receptacle of all Nations of every age, as distinguished from the Jewish Church open only to a few; and as dispensing the Means of Grace to all; and there He has given us in charge to the Christian Ministry, with a solemn warning to the stewards of His Mysteries in His Household that they will be required to render to Him a strict account of their stewardship when He shall come again at the Great Day⁴.

The truths which are shadowed forth in this Parable, are also displayed, with some important additions, in that other Parable of our Lord—also peculiar to St. Luke's Gospel—the Parable of the Prodigal Son⁵.

“A certain man had two sons.” The Gentile, no less than the Jew, is here expressly represented by Christ as a son of God. The Gentile was nurtured in his Father's house, under His tutelage and care. This is a truth of which St. Paul reminded the Gentiles, in their moral degeneracy and degradation, by declaring that having a Law—the Law of Conscience and of Reason—they were *without excuse*⁶.

But the younger son wilfully left his paternal home and went away into a far country, and wasted the share he had received of his father's substance, in riotous living. He gave himself up to the vice and misery, which is portrayed in such dark colours by the Apostle of the Gentiles in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, where he describes the moral and social condition of the Heathen world⁷.

But Almighty God, in His mercy to the Heathen, made them conscious of their misery. He gave them the spirit of remorse. They reflected on what they had lost. They came to themselves, and were touched with godly sorrow, and resolved to return, and repented, and confessed their sins. Their heavenly Father saw them at a distance, and hastened to be gracious to them. He received the Heathen World and clothed it with the best robe, the robe of Christ's righteousness, and joined it, as it were, in spiritual espousals to Him⁸, Who married our Nature, and united to Himself the Universal Church, called from the Gentile World to be His Bride⁹, which He purchased with His own blood¹⁰; and at those spiritual nuptials God killed the fatted calf, and fed His spouse with heavenly food, even with the precious body and blood of Christ sacrificed for her sake¹¹.

This Parable of Christ was also prophetic. It represented two events which the beloved friends and fellow-labourers, the Apostle St. Paul and the Evangelist St. Luke, often witnessed in their missionary journeys in Greece and Asia, with mingled joy and sorrow.

They beheld there the younger son's return to his Father's house, in the joyful alacrity with which the Gentiles received the glad tidings which they preached of Universal Redemption, and Justification through Faith in Christ's atoning blood. It was the privilege of the Apostle and of the Evangelist, both faithful servants in God's house, to proclaim the saving efficacy of Christ's Death, as a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world; and to clothe many returning prodigals in the best robe of Christ's Righteousness; and to wed many loving souls to Him in Holy Baptism; and to feed them with the heavenly food of the fatted calf, in the Holy Eucharist¹².

But they saw also with sorrow the truth of the other part of the picture displayed in this Parable. They saw the elder brother remaining in the field, grieved by the glad sound of the music and dancing which celebrated his younger brother's return. In almost every great city which they visited, St. Paul and St. Luke saw the countenance of the Jew clouded over with a malignant scowl of envy and rancour, because the privileges of the parental home were now restored to the Gentiles; and refusing to enter his father's house because his brother was there. They heard his self-righteous eulogies of his own imaginary impeccability, and his ungrateful murmurs against his Father, in return for all His gracious dispensations of love. "I never transgressed thy commandment, and yet thou never gavest me a kid." They heard him repining against his Father on account of his paternal pity to his penitent son: "When this thy son came, who devoured thy living with harlots, thou killedst for him the fatted calf¹."

The Apostle and the Evangelist themselves were animated by the Holy Ghost with that loving spirit which was shown by the Father in the Parable going out and entreating the elder brother to come in; and the sacred flame of fervent charity and intense desire for the salvation of the Jews, which burns so brightly in St. Paul's Epistles, especially in his Epistle to the Romans², and displays itself in affectionate yearnings for their incorporation with their brethren the Gentiles in the spiritual home of the common Father of all, seems to be kindled at the fire of the tender love of God, displayed in this divine Parable by His Ever Blessed Son.

St. Luke is called by St. Paul the *beloved Physician*³, and he is described by him as the "brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the Churches"⁴. And it has been well said by an ancient writer, S. Jerome⁵, that his heavenly doctrine is the medicine of the drooping soul; and that as long as St. Luke's writings are read in the Churches of Christendom, so long will the beloved Physician continue to exercise his healing art.

The sovereign remedy which he applies to the maladies of the human soul, is the blood of the Lamb of God. St. Luke is the Evangelist of the Gentile world; and the great doctrine which he preaches as a balm for its wounded spirit, and as a restorative of its palsied frame, is the Doctrine of the Atonement. It is his special purpose and fixed resolution, as it was of his fellow-traveller and fellow-labourer, St. Paul, in his mission to the Churches of Greece, to preach Christ crucified⁶. Christ the Sacrifice, Christ the Priest of the world, is the central figure of his Gospel. Hence the ancient Church, in assigning the symbolical emblems of the Four Living Creatures, which are displayed in the prophecy of Ezekiel and in the Apocalypse of St. John⁷, unanimously specified the Sacrificial animal, the *Calf*⁸, as the appropriate characteristic of St. Luke⁹.

8. It has been already observed, that St. Luke's Gospel opens with a reference to the Levitical Priesthood and Ritual in the Temple of the earthly Jerusalem, as typical of, and preparatory to, the Ritual and Priesthood of Christ, ever presenting the one sacrifice of Himself, and ministering in the Holy of Holies of the heavenly Jerusalem.

The inauguration of that everlasting Priesthood took place at Christ's Ascension into Heaven.

This great event, the Ascension, is not mentioned by the Evangelist St. Matthew, and it is only slightly noticed by St. Mark¹⁰. They had been studious to establish the fact of Christ's Resurrection from the Dead, and to imprint it indelibly on the mind of the Church. But St. Luke, the Evangelist of the Atonement, who had commenced his Gospel with a description of the figurative adumbrations shadowed forth by the Levitical ministries of the Temple, is careful to exhibit their consummation in Christ's sacrifice, and in its perpetual exhibition by the Great High Priest, Who passed through the outer courts of this worldly Tabernacle, and entered within the veil into the inmost shrine, where He ever liveth to make intercession for us. Here the Evangelist finds himself again in company with his beloved friend and fellow-labourer the Apostle St. Paul, unfolding these

See the passages quoted above in the Introduction to the Four Gospels.

⁹ It is remarkable that these Four Living Creatures, mentioned by Ezekiel and St. John, are identical with the heraldic ensigns on the Four Banners or Standards stationed on the Four sides of the Tabernacle of the Congregation in the Wilderness—the type of the Church Universal in its pilgrimage through the world. Cp. Num. ii. 2—31, and the Jewish Tradition. See Mede's works, p. 594, cited above in the Introduction to the Four Gospels.

The standard on the Western side bore the ensign of a calf or ox; and this ensign was the badge of the tribe of Ephraim, with whom was associated the tribe of Manasseh, the brother of Ephraim the son of Joseph, and the tribe of Benjamin, the brother of Joseph.

Ephraim and Manasseh were not born in Canaan, but in the gentile land of Egypt; and the reason is obvious why the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph, were encamped under the same standard with the tribe of Joseph's brother Benjamin, born in Judæa.

St. Paul was the Benjamin of the Apostolic company (see notes on Acts ix. 1 and 1 Cor. xv. 8), and he was associated with St. Luke in preaching the Gospel to the Gentile Western World. They were encamped under the same standard, bearing the same ensign of Christ, the all-sufficient Sacrifice and Victim slain for the whole world.

divine mysteries of the Heavenly Temple in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Thus the Apostle and Evangelist are ever fellow-travellers, walking side by side in the paths of righteousness and peace.

St. Luke's Gospel closes with a description of the Ascension of Christ. Christ leaves His Apostles while He is engaged in performing a priestly function, an act of benediction. "He lifted up His hands and blessed them. And it came to pass, while He blessed them He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven ¹." And at this same point, the Ascension, where the GOSPEL of St. Luke ends, there his second treatise, the ACTS of the APOSTLES, begins ². Thus he prepares us in his GOSPEL for the contemplation of Christ's Kingly power and majesty, which He acquired for Himself by His meritorious sacrifice as Priest, and which He manifested in His Church by the working of the Holy Spirit, Whom He sent from heaven, and by the instrumentality of the Christian Ministry, as is fully displayed in the ACTS of the APOSTLES ³, and which He Who is the Priest, the King, and Prophet of the Church, will never fail to manifest, even to His second Coming, when He will put all enemies under His feet.

The following Observations on the design of St. Luke's Gospel, and on some of its leading characteristics, are from an unpublished Academical Lecture, delivered by the present Editor many years ago in the University of Cambridge.

They commence with a reference to the beginning of St. Luke's Gospel, ἐπειδήπερ, κ.τ.λ.

Equidem tria potissimum in hoc loco indaganda esse statui,

Primum, quinam fuerint illi multi, qui, ante Lucæ Evangelium conditum, commentarios con-textere adorti sunt earum rerum de quibus apud Christianos certissimè constat;

Deinde, quo tempore et loco, quis, quali demum consilio, hujus Evangelii Scriptor ad opus suum pangendum accesserit;

Postremò, quorumnam potissimum in usum annales suos confecisse putandus sit?

Jam verò, quod ad primam attinet earum rerum de quibus disceptationem instituimus, uno ore Antiquitas Christiana proficitur πολλοὺς illos, de quibus loquitur Evangelista, minimè fuisse divino instinctu afflatus; nedum Sanctos illos Duumviros, Evangelistæ nostri decessores, Matthæum et Marcum, hîc intelligi debere; ita ut eorum opera, quorum mentionem Lucas fecerit, ad nostram memoriam haud pervenisse, non adeo sit deplorandum.

Verè enim dixisse videtur Ambrosius ⁴, Origenis, ut solet, vestigia premens, πολλοὶ ἐπεχείρησαν, "Multi sunt conati, sed Dei gratiâ destituti sunt; multi Evangelia scribere sunt adorti, quæ boni nummularii non probarent. Contrà verò ii, qui Spiritu Sancto imbuti sunt, non tam conati sunt efficere, quàm, gratiâ Dei tantùm non cogente, opus omni numero absolutum executi. Non conatus est Matthæus, non conatus est Marcus, non conatus est Joannes; sed divino Spiritu ubertatem dic-torum rerumque omnium ministrante, sine ullo molimine cæpta sua compleverunt." Hæc fere ille. Cui quidem sententiæ adstipulantur interpretes à Græcis, ut alios taceam, Euthymius ⁵ et Theophylactus, Chrysostomi, ut jure suspicemini, verba exscribentes, οἱ τοιοῦτοι ἐπεχείρησαν, οὐ μέντοι ἐτέλειωσαν, ἐπεὶ χωρὶς θείας χάριτος ἤρξαντο οἱ μέντοι ὀλίγοι, οἷον ὁ Ματθαῖος, ὁ Μάρκος, οὐκ ἐπεχείρησαν μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐτέλειωσαν, τὸ γὰρ τελειοποιὸν πνεῦμα εἶχον.

Quare illud, quæso, animadvertite, ex his Evangelistæ nostri verbis insigne testimonium ad fidem Evangelistarum corroborandam existere. Unde enim jam factum est, ut multi illi, de quo agit Lucas, vix fando tenus nobis innotescant; pauci autem illi,—quatuor Evangelistas dico,—nusquam non integri et incorrupti legantur, tractentur, audiantur, summâ cum hominum veneratione celebrentur, nisi quoddam ab ipsis Christianæ Religionis primordiis Ecclesia Christi judicium suum de utrisque pronuntiaverit; ita ut illorum interitus, horum verò non conservatio tantùm, sed publica et universa acceptio, duplici eâque validissimâ probatione divinam Evangeliorum auctoritatem confirmet.

Quod ad tempus jam spectat in quo hoc Evangelium confectum fuisse existimemus, satis liquet, utriusque operis præfatione inter se collatâ, ante ACTA APOSTOLORUM conscripta Lucam ad EVANGELIUM exarandum accessisse. Jam verò, quum Acta in anno post Christum natum sexagesimo primo, si calculum Dionysianum sequamur, subsistant, Nerone jam septimum annum imperante, hinc colligi potest Evangelii nostri scriptionem decimo fere ante capta Hierosolyma anno non esse posteriorem. Cui quidem supputationi suffragatur satis locuples auctor Hieronymus ⁶.

Sed ut ad ipsum scriptorem redeamus. Eum à sacro Apostolorum Collegio non fuisse exinde apparet, quòd in hoc Evangelii exordio se ex oculatis testibus suos annales hausisse profitetur, et quòd, venerabundo in eos affectu commotus, haud rarò duodecim viros illos præclaro illo titulo ¹ τοὺς ἀποστόλους designet, id quod ipsi Apostoli Matthæus et Joannes (quibus addimus Petrum, Divi Marci ore loquentem), quæ erant modestiâ, nunquam fecisse reperientur; et quòd, si quandò illi præ humanâ infirmitate titubaverint, vel in officio suo claudicaverint quum ipsi suas vacillationes cum sedulâ et anxîâ quâdam commemoratione literis consignaverint, ille, satis jam ab aliis consultum esse veritati videns, vel silentio presserit, vel benigno sermone mitigaverit.

Nec minùs eum ex Palæstinâ non esse oriundum plurima declarant indicia. Oratio pura, simplex, inaffectata, elegantiam fere Atticam redolens; et ab eo loquendi genere longè remota quod vernaculum erat Judæis; id quod vobis magis mirandum videbitur, cùm, quòd Jesus in sermonibus suis linguam Syro-Chaldaicam usurpaverit, is, qui, quod Ille dixisset narrando vellet exprimere, verborum colorem et habitum non minùs quàm rerum ordinem et seriem inde esset mutuaturus. Lucam igitur deditâ operâ hanc dicendi rationem declinâsse, jure, ut opinor, fateamini.

Et quemadmodum aliâ regione quàm Palæstinâ editum fuisse, ita ad alios quàm Palæstinæ incolas præsertim scripsisse, testem maximè idoneum, ipsum Evangelistam, licet excitare. Nam lectores suos in Chorographiâ sacrâ planè hospites videtur cogitâsse, et ad talium captum orationem suam accommodâsse.

Hinc Mons Olivarum, notissimus ille Judæis, Lucæ est ὄρος τὸ καλούμενον ἐλαιὼν². Hinc Capernaum, florentissimum illud et nobilissimum oppidum in Galilæâ esse situm indicare non supersedit; quod quis quæso Judæus³, ad Judæos scribens, operæ pretium esset existimaturus? Hinc Gadarenos è regione esse Galilææ monere non otiosum putavit⁴. Hinc in ipso Hierosolymorum nomine à cæteris variavit. Nam quum cæteri Evangelistæ vix uspiam, urbem illam Judææ primariam, Ἱερουσαλὴμ, sed semper Ἱεροσόλυμα dixerint, contrà Lucas veritus fortasse, ne Ἱεροσόλυμα à Græco fonte derivari videretur, illam triginta fere in locis Ἱερουσαλὴμ appellavit.

Ut ad Hebræos Lucam non scripsisse liquet, sic (ut ad illam quæstionem pergamus, quam in Theophili nomine tractandam accepimus) in Græcorum præcipuè usus, Evangelium suum elucubrâsse, si internam operis formam et dictionem scrutamini, haudquaquam, ut opinor, estis dubitaturi.

Nam ut hanc non modò tutissimam sed etiam proximam et maximè compendiarîam argumentandi viam insistamus, ut ad ipsam Evangelistæ, inquam, dictionem provocemus, et quædam exempla ex hoc fonte delibemus, dum cæteri Evangelistæ omnes uno ore Dominum Nostrum voce Παῖσι et Παῖσιν salutent, Lucas ex composito hujus appellationis usum videtur detrectâsse; et eam Hellenicâ dictione Ἐπιστάτης⁵ reliquis tribus nusquam adhibitâ permutavit. Hinc et illud ὥσαννὰ⁶, à cæteris omnibus usurpatum, circumloquendo defugit. Hinc, cùm homo paralysi affectus apud Matthæum et Marcum octies παραλυτικός⁷ vocetur, Lucas videtur sensisse activam hanc formam parùm Græcè passivo sensu efferri, eamque nunquam adhibuit, sed ejus in loco vocem παραλελυμένος cæteris Evangelistis planè ignotam reposuit; hinc quum ille hoc morbo laborans apud cæteros Evangelistas⁸ reclinatus in κραββάτω, quòd Romanum vocabulum est, inducatur, apud⁹ Lucam Græco κλινιδίω bajulatur; cùm apud¹⁰ illos tributum κῆρσος Latinè, idem apud illum φόρος Græcè nuncupatur; si illi vocem παιδίον frequentant, ille aliquantum varietatis amantior hujus vice paulò elegantius βρέφος¹¹ sæpissimè usurpat, quod illi ne in uno quidem loco adhibuisse invenientur. Hinc denique aqua illa Galilææ sive Tiberiadis in historiâ sacrâ decantatissima, quam cæteri Evangelistæ semper θάλασσαν et ne semel quidem λίμνην appellant, ab illo contra ad Græcos scribente, maris aperti gnarissimos, et rerum nauticarum peritissimos, semper λίμνη tantùm, nunquam verò θάλασσα appellatur.

Minimè vos latet, quod ab auctoribus idoneis et venerandæ antiquitatis accepimus, Marcum quidem suum Evangelium Petri operâ exarâsse, et in usum Ecclesiæ Romanæ potissimùm literis consignâsse. Satis erit Hieronymum¹² hujus rei testem appellâsse, cui diù apud Damasum commoranti historia Ecclesiæ Romanæ probè erat perspecta. Cujus quidem testimonio adstipulantur plurima et luculenta indicia in ipso Evangelio passim sparsa. Sed, ut cæteros missos faciamus, unicum tantùm è Marci Evangelio locum citâsse non pœnitebit, qui cùm Divi Lucæ de eâdem re verbis collatus id, quod suprâ memoravimus, Marcum Latinis, Lucam verò Græcis, scripsisse, unâ eâdemque ratione, declarabit. Rem ipsam videamus.

Apostolis jam ad suum munus designatis, eos præceptis instruit Jesus, quomoddò se in officio administrando gerere debeant. Id verò in memoriam vestram revocetis, eandem divini Magistri hortationem, à duobus illis Evangelistis, levi quidem si vultis inter se varietate, sed quæ haudquam parvi momenti existimanda sit, esse enunciatam. Recordamini igitur, quæso, Marcum præceptum dominicum, ne secum Apostoli nummos portarent, ita extulisse, *μὴ αἴρετε εἰς ζώνην χαλκὸν*¹, Lucam verò, verbis leviter immutatis, *μὴ αἴρετε ἀργύριον*². Apud Romanos enim, ut nemini non est cognitissimum, nummi non argentum (quod iis res ferè alia) sed æs vulgo audiebant; et nummos, quod ex uno illo Horatiano satis liquet, “Ibit eò quòd vis qui zonam perdidit,” inquit, in zonam conicere erat usitatissimum. Hinc igitur illa Marci ad Romanos scribentis μὴ αἴρετε εἰς ζώνην χαλκόν. Quæ omnia apud Græcos longè secus erant. Nam primùm pecunia iis neque χρυσὸς neque χαλκὸς, sed quod hîc Lucas posuit, ἄργυρος vel ἀργύριον vulgo vocabatur, eò quòd Græcia, et præsertim Attica, argenti erat feracissima, auri verò non item; ita ut ante Alexandri M. tempora aurum signatum rarissimè Græcorum manibus tereretur; deinde iis familiare erat nummos in sacco asservare quem illi βαλλάντιον nominabant, de quâ voce operæ pretium erit admonere, eum quatuor in locis à Lucâ³ ad Græcos scribente usurpari, nusquam verò alias, ne uno quidem in loco, in Sacro Codice apparere.

Veniam mihi detis, si pauca alia huc pertinentia adnotavero. Lucernam accendi, si actionem ipsam spectatis, res est sanè minimi momenti; sed videte, quæso, in verbis quibus describitur quantum insit ponderis ad id quod volumus demonstrandum. Nam cùm cæteri Evangelistæ καλεῖν λύχρον dixerint, Lucæ id genus loquendi se probare non poterat, ut Græcorum suorum religiosis auribus displiciturum, quibus consulens id in *ἄπτειν λύχρον*⁵ semper reformavit. Et, ut in argumento tenui, sed haud aspèrando, paulò diutiùs immoremur, illud eodem consilio factum videtur, quod cùm cæteri Evangelistæ *ἄλλος*⁶ pro ἕτερος, rariùs ab illis usurpato adhibuerint, Lucas solus huic voci ἕτερος passim ab eo adhibitæ, rerum diversitatis cum oppositione quâdam sensum reservaverit; et cùm vocula ἅπας pro πᾶς, omnis, vix septies in cæteris Evangelii reperiatur, et in Joannis Evangelio ne semel quidem, à Lucâ varietatis et elegantiae imprimis studioso quadragies et ampliùs usurpetur.

Neque verò,—ut hoc quoque animadvertamus,—puriora tantùm et exquisitiora vocabula quàm cæteri consecratus fuisse videtur, sed verborum quoque formas venustiores adamasse. Ne longè abeam; apud illos *ἐγάμησα*⁷ reperiatur, apud hunc autem ἐγγημα; et plurima alia sincerioris Atticismi exempla. Neque illud vos præterit apud nullum Sacræ Scripturæ auctorem quàm apud Evangelistam nostrum tam crebrò legi, vel in Actis vel in Evangelio, composita illa *ἀτενίζω*⁸, ὁμοθυμαδόν, ἐνώπιον, ἰσάγγελος, et similia; quæ si nihil aliud, certè illud demonstrant, eum scribendi varietate, vi, et venustate, non mediocriter valuisse. Quamobrem rectissimè ab Hieronymo dicitur ad Damasum scribente, “Inter omnes Evangelistas Græci sermonis eruditissimus.”

Videtur jam ut opinor, quorum potissimùm commodis studere voluerit divinus noster annalium conditor. Neque abs re fuerit, si aliam quandam rem, ad institutum nostrum pertinentem, non intactam prætermisero. Hodiernam Græciæ linguam ut ad Septuaginta Interpretum Versionem explanandam magnæ esse utilitatis, ita Novi quoque Fœderis dictioni illustrandæ magnoperè inservire, pauci sunt reperiendi qui vel infitientur vel ignorent. Sed illud quoque additum velim, dictu esse difficile, quot loquendi usus peculiare Evangelista noster frequentaverit, qui à majoribus suis rarissimè inter scribendum adhibiti ab incolis Græciæ nunc quàm creberrimè usurpantur: cujus quidem rei nulla probabilior reddi ratio potest, quàm dictionem Evangelii, ad Græcorum usus destinati, in eorum quasi linguâ inveteravisse.

Ut brevi rem præcidam, ὁμιλέω colloquendi sensu à Lucâ positum⁹ eandem hodie vim obtinet, nunquam ab alio quoquam Scriptore N. T. usitatum.

familiari Græcorum sermone, eodem sensu, usurpantur, vocibus quæ antiquitûs has significationes obtinebant, pænè jam in oblivionem lapsis. Utrûm ille quas diximus locutiones à vernaculâ Græcorum oratione sumpserit, an aliunde hauserit, in medio relinquimus; id verò conjici potest, à publicè lectitato in synaxibus Ecclesiasticis hoc Evangelio, hoc commodum manavisse, ut non modò hæ dictiones conservatæ sint, sed ut lingua ipsa Græca, post tot annorum lapsus, et tot rerum publicarum vicissitudines, adhuc in Græciâ vivat et vigeat.

Non injucundum erit observatu, hanc quam ab ipso Evangelio de auctoris consilio sententiam eruimus, externis testimoniis confirmari. Jam verò, ad hanc opinionem amplectendam, de Evangelistæ consilio, philologicis rationibus adducti, moralia quædam huc pertinentia attingere velimus. Primùm, quod ad civilem rerum conditionem spectat, fieri non poterat, quin Græciæ populi cum tristi quodam desiderio respicerent pristinum illum rerum suarum statum, in quo ipsi imperio florentissimo poterentur, et pænè totius Europæ principatum obtinerent; neque sanè erat mirandum, si fasces Romanos in ipsâ Athenarum Arce laureatos, et aquilas Latinas in apice Acrocorinthis dominantes, cum tacitâ quâdam indignatione, — ne dicam frementes gementesque, — viderent.

Quem quidem mentis affectum divinus ille medicus animorum, Lucas, mitibus verbis et divinæ philosophiæ lenimentis mulcere et sedare conatus est. Videte modò, quàm ad rem accommodatè Græciæ incolæ externo jugo tum subditos imagine illâ recreaverit, quâ CHRISTUM ipsum, tanquam alterum Imperatorem, induxit, venientem à longâ regione ut principatum sibi adscisceret⁹, et deinde in patriam reverteretur, et sempiternis præmiis omnes afficientem, qui, modestè legibus parentes, officio suo satisfecissent; videte quomodò Noster, ut Græcorum vel impatientiam ferocientem frænaret, vel desultoriam levitatem corrigeret, Christum Ipsum, Regem Regum, et Dominum Dominorum, ab ipsâ nativitate Cæsari obsequentem et morigerum exhibuerit¹⁰, et divinum Christi præceptum, ut “Dei Deo, ita Cæsari Cæsaris” tribuenda, sine ullâ tergiversatione declaraverit¹¹.

Sed domestica videamus. Quàm durâ et indignâ fortunâ, Evangelistæ ætate, apud Græcos uterentur mulieres, et quantæ æque teterrimæ pestes ab hoc fonte manantes hominum vitam inquinaverint, profectò habetis compertius, quàm ut nostrâ egeat commemoratione. Hos jure discipulos suos nominaverit Evangelista Noster Sanctus Lucas; hi sunt ejus alumni; hi discipuli; hi Theophili.

On the Date of St. Luke's Gospel.

St. Luke relates in the ACTS of the APOSTLES⁷, that when St. Paul was at Troas a vision appeared to him by night; “There stood a man of Macedonia and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia and help us.”

On this, he proceeds to say, “We endeavoured to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us to evangelize them⁸.”

These words are remarkable. The vision appeared to Paul; but the message was deemed by St. Luke to be designed for himself also; and the Holy Spirit, in the Acts of the Apostles, authorizes that opinion.

Therefore, St. Luke also, as well as the Apostle, was called by the Holy Ghost to preach the Gospel in Greece; where, as yet, St. Paul had never been.

Accordingly, we find that St. Luke crossed over with St. Paul to Neapolis, and thence came to Philippi⁹. We do not find that he proceeded with St. Paul at that time beyond that city; but he appears to have remained there¹⁰.

There are many reasons which may induce us to believe that his Gospel was written and published before, or at, that time,—i. e. not later than A.D. 53¹¹.

Paul's journey from Philippi, the person is changed from we to they.

He was probably left by St. Paul at Philippi to maintain and advance the work of evangelization which had been commenced there. See below on Acts xvi. 4; xx. 5, and on 1 Thess. i. 9; iii. 6. Phil. iv. 3.

¹¹ See Chronological Tables prefixed to the Acts and to St. Paul's Epistles: and compare Tillemont, Mémoires ii. p. 253.

The grounds of this opinion may be stated as follows ;

It is affirmed by ancient Christian Authors, that St. Luke was a native of Antioch in Syria¹, the city in which the disciples were first called Christians ; and in which St. Paul was ordained to the Apostleship of the Gentiles² ; and in which he spent much time³, and which was, as it were, the centre of Christianity to the Gentile world.

If St. Luke resided in his native city, he had frequent opportunities of intercourse with St. Paul there, and had abundant means of preparation for composing an Evangelical History of our Lord's Ministry upon earth.

Certain it is, as he himself states, that he had followed up the whole course of the Evangelical History from the first, and had been conversant with those "who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the Word"⁴.

St. Paul, as was just now stated, having preached for a short time in Macedonia, left St. Luke there ; and having arrived at Corinth, the capital of Achaia, he wrote two Epistles to the inhabitants of Thessalonica, the principal city of Macedonia.

It is most probable that in his Apostolic care for the Macedonian Churches, St. Paul had taken care to provide for them some narrative of the Birth, Teaching, Miracles, and Sufferings of Him Whom he preached to the Gentiles, when they turned from dumb idols to serve the Living God⁵.

The Holy Spirit, Who inspired St. Paul to write Epistles to the Greeks, would, we may believe, have also inspired an Evangelist to write a Gospel for their use ; without which, the teaching of the Apostle in his Epistles would have scarcely been intelligible to them.

Christian Parents and Teachers are accustomed to instruct their children and scholars in the historical narrative of the Gospels, before they proceed to expound to them the doctrinal teaching of the Epistles ; and this practice seems to afford a presumption, that a Gospel would have been provided for the Heathen world, before they were regarded as qualified to profit by the Epistles of St. Paul.

In fact, we find, that St. Paul even in his earliest Epistles to the Gentiles—the two Epistles to the Thessalonians—supposes them to be acquainted with the leading facts of the Gospel, and with the principal articles of the Christian Faith⁶.

Further, in the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, when describing the circumstances of Christ's Second Advent, he appears to be referring to our Lord's words, as recorded by the Evangelist St. Luke. He states, that what he there says, is well known to them⁷. How could this be ? If they had St. Luke's Gospel, the answer is clear. If they heard it publicly read in their religious assemblies they would be familiar with what he is stating, and they would at once acknowledge its truth ; for it had been spoken by Christ Himself, and was recorded by the Holy Spirit for their learning in the Gospel of St. Luke⁸.

St. Paul solemnly adjures the Thessalonians to read his own Epistle to the brethren ; that is, to read it publicly in the religious assemblies of the Church, as the Hebrew Scriptures were read in the Synagogues by the Ancient People of God⁹.

The Apostle who gives such an earnest charge that his own writings should be publicly read, may be reasonably presumed to have been no less desirous to provide for the public reading of some Evangelical Narrative of the Miracles, Teaching, Death, Resurrection, and Ascension of Christ ; on which all the doctrine of his own Epistles was grounded, and which would impart divine authority to what he there taught.

The Gospel of St. Luke was specially designed for the Greek and Gentile Churches, to which St. Paul wrote his Epistles ; and it would afford the best illustration and confirmation of those Epistles.

The Evangelist St. Luke was the fellow-traveller of St. Paul in Greece ; and the Gospel of St. Luke would be the best commentary on St. Paul's Epistles circulated in that country.

About three years after the date of St. Paul's Epistles to the Church of the capital of Macedonia, Thessalonica, St. Paul himself came to Macedonia, and there he wrote his Second Epistle to another great Christian Church, that of the Corinthians.

⁷ 1 Thess. v. 2, αὐτοὶ ἀκριβῶς οἴσate, ye yourselves well know ;

ye have exact and accurate knowledge of what I am now saying. This could hardly be, unless they had some written Evangelical document with which they were all familiar ; such as a Gospel, multiplied by means of copies, and read in religious assemblies. See on 1 Thess. v. 2.

⁸ See note on 1 Thess. v. 2.

⁹ See note on 1 Thess. v. 27.

That Epistle was sent to Corinth by the hand of a person whom he describes as having been chosen, together with himself, by the votes of the Churches, to carry the alms collected in Greece to Jerusalem: and he describes this person as "the brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the Churches ¹."

The opinion that this brother is no other than the blessed Evangelist St. Luke, is grounded on internal evidence, and is confirmed by the testimony of ancient writers, and is adopted by the Church of England in her Collect for his Festival, and appears to rest on a sound and solid foundation, as will be shown in another place ².

Suffice it here to say, that it is not easy to understand, how the praise of any one could be said to be "in the Gospel throughout all the Churches" at that time, except by the circulation of some written document, by means of which the Author of it would be generally known by the Churches as an Evangelist. But the matter is fully cleared up, if we accept the statement, which is almost demonstrably evident from St. Paul's own words written in Macedonia, and addressed to the Corinthians, that the brother here mentioned as chosen by the Churches to be his companion and coadministrator of the alms which they had contributed for the relief of the poor Saints at Jerusalem, is St. Luke; and if we also admit that the Gospel of St. Luke, who had come with St. Paul into Greece, in obedience to a divine call to evangelize that country ³, and who appears to have remained in Macedonia when St. Paul had proceeded southward to Corinth, had now been circulated among the Churches, and had been publicly read in them for several years.

This would explain his election by the Churches to be their delegate and representative at Jerusalem in conjunction with St. Paul; and this honourable testimony on their part to the Evangelist, and this praise of his labours through all the Churches, and this record of it by the Apostle St. Paul writing from Macedonia to Achaia, affords the best evidence of St. Luke's faithfulness and zeal in labouring together with the Apostle of the Gentiles, and supplies a significant proof of the happy effects produced by his Gospel in the Churches of Greece.

In harmony with these statements, we find St. Paul quoting from St. Luke's Gospel in his other Epistles, in one of which he designates that Gospel as Scripture ⁴.

If the premises here stated are sound, the publication of this Gospel was not later than A.D. 53, twenty-four years ⁵ after the death of Christ.

This result is also important, as enabling us to approximate to the dates of St. Matthew's and St. Mark's Gospels. The former was certainly written before the Gospel of St. Luke, and probably the latter also ⁶.

² See the note on 2 Cor. viii. 18, where the evidence on this point is stated.

³ See Acts xvi. 8—10.

⁴ See Luke x. 7, and on 1 Tim. v. 18.

⁵ The subscriptions at the end of some ancient MSS. of St. Luke's Gospel assign even an earlier date, i. e. fifteen years after the Ascension: viz. A.D. 45. See Tischendorf, p. 546. In the Arabic Version published by Erpenius it is said, that the Gospel of St. Luke the Physician was written in a city of Macedonia, twenty-two years after the Ascension of our Lord into heaven, and in the fourteenth year of Claudius Cæsar. This assertion is probably very near the truth.

ΕΥΑΓΓΕΛΙΟΝ ΚΑΤΑ ΛΟΥΚΑΝ.

Ι. ¹ ἘΠΕΙΔΗΠΕΡ πολλοὶ ἐπεχείρησαν ἀνατάξασθαι διήγησιν περὶ τῶν πεπληροφορημένων ἐν ἡμῖν πραγμάτων, ² καθὼς παρέδωκαν ἡμῖν οἱ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτόπται καὶ ὑπηρέται γενόμενοι τοῦ λόγου, ³ ἔδοξε καμοὶ παρηκολουθηκότι ἄνωθεν πᾶσιν ἀκριβῶς καθεξῆς σοὶ γράψαι, κράτιστε Θεόφιλε, ⁴ ἵνα ἐπιγνώσῃς περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης λόγων τὴν ἀσφάλειαν.

CH. I. 1. Ἐπειδήπερ πολλοὶ ἐπεχείρησαν] Forasmuch as many have taken in hand. On the genuineness of this Preface, and of the earlier Chapters of St. Luke, which have been rejected by some recent critics (see Routh, R. S. iv. 15, ed. 1818), Dr. Routh says, quoting the very ancient Canon Muratorianus, "A nativitate Joannis incipit dicere, etc. Hinc firmantur priora illa Evangelii Lucæ Capita, quæ ei abjudicare hæretici cùm veteres tùm recentiores gestierunt. Est quoque notatu dignum agnovisse hanc Evangelii partem non tantùm omnes quos memorabo Scriptores, Just. Mart., Iren., Clem. Alex., Tertullian., Julium African., Origen., Cyprian., &c. Victorin., Petrum Alexandr., sed etiam Celsum, apud Origen. ii. 32."

Many have taken in hand. St. Luke does not approve them. The use he makes of ἐπεχείρησαν in Acts ix. 29; xix. 13, seems rather to suggest a silent censure upon them. It implies want of ability or authority. They have taken in hand, of their own accord, without any special call or qualification, and without any successful result. "Conati sunt (says S. Ambrose) qui implere nequiverunt." And they are numerous (πολλοί), and therefore may distract you with their variety.

St. Luke does not allude here to St. Matthew and St. Mark. "Matthæus et Marcus (says Origen) non sunt conati scribere, sed Spiritu Sancto pleni scripserunt Evangelia." οὐκ ἐπεχείρησαν (says Theophyl.) ἀλλ' ἐτελείωσαν: and S. Augustine says (de Consensu Evāg. i. 1), "Cæteri homines (i. e. besides the Four Evangelists), qui de Domini actibus aliqua scribere conati vel ausi sunt, non tales suis temporibus extiterunt, ut eis fidem haberet Ecclesia, atque in Auctoritatem Canonicam sanctorum librorum eorum scripta reciperet." And similarly, S. Jerome, vol. iv. p. 2, Matt. i. Cp. Patrit. de Evāg. lib. iii. diss. i. See above, Introduction to this Gospel, p. 164.

— τῶν πεπληροφορημένων ἐν ἡμῖν πραγμάτων] of the things that have been fully accomplished in us. The beginnings of these glorious events of the Gospel were revealed of old to the Patriarchs and Prophets, but their full consummation is now seen by us Christians, and in us.

πληροφορία is said of a ship, "quæ pontum secat et plenis subit ostia velis." Hence it is applied to describe the state of the mind when fully persuaded and convinced. See below on 1 Thess. i. 5. Heb. vi. 11; x. 22.

It is also said of things so full and complete as to give assurance and satisfaction.

Here the events themselves seem to be compared to a ship impelled by the wind swelling its sails, and wafting it to the harbour: see 2 Tim. iv. 5, τὴν διακονίαν σου πληροφορήσον: ibid. 17, ἵνα δὲ ἐμοῦ τὸ κήρυγμα πληροφορηθῇ. And therefore τὰ πεπληροφορημένα πράγματα are the things that have been fulfilled ('res manifestissimè ostensæ,' says Origen; 'complete,' Ambrose),—brought, as it were, after a long voyage, to the shore and harbour of perfect consummation and rest,—so as to assure us (βεβαιῶσαι) of their truth, ἐν ἀληθείᾳ καὶ πίστει βεβαίᾳ, says Theophyl.

Some interpret these words, "the things fully believed among us;" but the other sense seems better supported by usage, and therefore preferable.

2. καθὼς παρέδωκαν] as they delivered. This clause does not depend on διήγησιν, but on πεπληροφορημένων.

— ἀπ' ἀρχῆς] from the beginning, i. e. of Christ's Ministry, see iii. 23, ἀρχόμενος.

— τοῦ λόγου] the Word. Probably, Christ, the Incarnate Word. So Iren. (Ep. ad Florin. Euseb. v. 20), αὐτόπται τῆς ζωῆς τοῦ λόγου. Origen, Ambrose, and Cyril, p. 115 Mai, p. 1, ed. Smith. Cp. on 1 John i. 1. Heb. ii. 3. Acts i. 21. And the words ὑπηρέται and αὐτόπται seem to confirm this interpretation. See also Hammond's note here. St. Paul has ὑπηρέτας Χριστοῦ, 1 Cor. iv. 1.

On the words λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, used by St. Paul (Heb. iv. 12), as well as by St. John, for the Eternal Word, the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity, see Dr. Jackson on the Creed, Book xi. ch. 12, vol. x. pp. 216—225. Also Book xi. ch. 47, vol. xi. pp. 393—406.

See also the note below on Heb. iv. 12, and on Titus i. 3. Valck. points out the propriety of the expression ὑπηρέτας, "remiges in navi, sc. Ecclesiâ." See also on Acts xx. 32.

3. παρηκολουθηκότι] The participle here contains one reason for St. Luke's writing; i. e. because I have accompanied the events side by side, even from the beginning; since I have walked, as it were, by the side of the stream, even from the fountain head. See the use of the word by St. Paul, 1 Tim. iv. 6. 2 Tim. iii. 10.

Perhaps also St. Luke here refers to the perfect understanding he had from St. Paul, who was instructed by divine revelation, 2 Cor. xii. 7. Gal. i. 12. 1 Cor. xv. 3. Eph. iii. 3. See Iren. iii. 1. Tertullian, adv. Marcion. iv. 2 and 5. S. Jerome, Script. Eccl. c. 7.

— καθεξῆς σοὶ γράψαι] to write to thee, who hast been hitherto taught orally (κατηχηθεὶς), and to write καθεξῆς, to narrate the events consecutively in a connected series, and methodical order. The word καθεξῆς is peculiar to St. Luke, viii. 1. Acts iii. 24; xi. 4; xviii. 23.

It can hardly here mean specially order of time, see on xi. 14. — κράτιστε Θεόφιλε] O most excellent Theophilus. The name Theophilus indicates his Greek origin, the title κράτιστος (in Latin optimus) applied to magistrates, to Felix, Acts xxiii. 26; xxiv. 3; to Festus, Acts xxvi. 25, shows his official rank and station.

Here is a reason why St. Luke was inspired to write a Gospel, in addition to those of St. Matthew and St. Mark. They had provided specially for the wants of Jewish converts, and of the middle class among the Romans. Some provision of a particular kind was now to be made for the higher and more educated classes among the Greeks and Asiatics, and of the Gentile world generally, who were conversant with the Greek tongue, as the language of the higher classes of society throughout the world. St. Luke writes for them.

Hence no argument can be derived from these words (as some in recent times have supposed, e.g. Olshausen, Schleiermacher, and others) to invalidate the conclusion, that the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark had been already written, and that St. Luke was familiar with them, and adopted much from them in his own Gospel. No such argument can be drawn from St. Luke's silence. He wrote the Acts of the Apostles, in which he narrates the history of St. Paul, and yet he never once mentions that the Apostle St. Paul, whose companion he was, and whose actions he there narrates, wrote any Epistles.

Dr. Townson (on the Gospels, p. 214) has proved that St. Mark was conversant with St. Matthew's Gospel, St. Luke with St. Matthew's and St. Mark's, and St. John with those of the other three. It is there also shown (pp. cxxiii—cxlvi) that the Holy Spirit, in writing the Old Testament, embodied in later books portions of earlier ones; i.e. He reiterates by later writers what he had already spoken by earlier. So it was in the Old Testament; so it is in the New. See above, p. 112—4.

4. ἵνα ἐπιγνώσῃς] in order that thou, and such as thou, who have been catechized and baptized, mayest now have additional knowledge (ἐπι-γνώσις), from a written history accommodated to thy use, on the certainty of those things concerning which thou wast catechized, or instructed by word of mouth. "Diversa sunt γιγνώσκεις ἐπὶ ἐπι-γνώσκειν," says Valck., who illustrates this use of ἐπὶ in composition, signifying 'accuratius quiddam.'

The whole Proœmium may be paraphrased as follows,—

Since many have attempted to draw up a narrative concerning the actions and sufferings of Christ, which we have received from those who beheld Him, and ministered to Him from the beginning, and since some may be perplexed by the multitude and variety of these attempts; it seems good to me, who have been called by the Holy Ghost to write, and who have followed the course of those events from the commencement; and who from my birth and education at Antioch, the second Gentile city in the world, and in which the disciples were first called Christians (Acts i. 26); and from my friendship and association with Paul the Apostle of you Gentiles (Rom. xi. 13) in his travels and sufferings, as I will show in the second part of my history (δεύτερος λόγος, Acts i. 1), have special qualifications and a special commission for this holy work of providing a written Gospel for you, noble Greeks and Gentiles—for you, Theophili—who by your name proclaim your love of God, and God's love for you; as written Gospels have been already provided by my brother Evangelists, for the Hebrews and Romans; in order that you, who have been baptized, and instructed orally in the Creed of Christendom, may have further knowledge of the certainty of those things wherein you have been orally instructed.

It may be further observed on this Proœmium, that by its polished Greek diction (as contrasted with the Hebraizing style of St. Matthew and St. Mark), St. Luke appears to have designed to declare the class for whom his Gospel is specially intended; and by the use of words peculiar to himself and St. Paul (e.g. ἐπεχειρήσαν—πεπραροφορημένων—κατήχησιν—ἀσφάλειαν), to mark his connexion with the Apostle to the Gentiles, in his evangelical mission and ministry.

Almighty God, by His Providence over the Church, and by His Spirit in it, has given a practical explanation of this Proœmium. All the διηγήσεις of the πολλοὶ are lost; and only Four Gospels, those of St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. John, have been received by the Church as Writings Inspired by the Holy Ghost. "In his omnibus," says Origen, "nihil aliud probamus, nisi quod Ecclesia; id est Quatuor Evangelia."

St. Luke's connexion with St. Paul is thus described by Irenæus, adv. Hæres. iii. 1, Λουκᾶς δ' ἀκόλουθος Παύλου, τὸ ἐπ' ἐκεῖνον κηρυσσόμενον εὐαγγέλιον ἐν βιβλίῳ κατέθετο" cp. Euseb. H. E. v. 8. iii. 4. Tertullian, adv. Marcion. iv. 15, Luceæ digestum Paulo adscribere solent. Origenes ap. Euseb. vi. 35, τρίτον, τὸ κατὰ Λουκᾶν, τὸ ὑπὸ Παύλου ἑταιροῦμενον εὐαγγέλιον. See above, the Introduction to this Gospel, p. 167. 168.

5. ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις Ἡρώδου τ. β.] in the days of Herod the King of Judæa. By this sovereignty of Herod, and by the enrolment in Judæa under Cæsar Augustus (ii. 1), he shows that the sceptre had now departed from Judah, Gen. xlix. 10. Cp. Cyril.

— ἱερεὺς τις] a certain priest. One of the special purposes of St. Luke's Gospel is to display the sacerdotal office and sacri-ficial efficacy of Christ, the true Priest, and victim of the whole human race (see the Introduction, p. 163, 164): and he aptly begins his Gospel by showing that the Levitical Priesthood and sacrifices were imperfect and transitory, but had a sacred purpose as preparatory and ministerial to the Priesthood and Sacrifice of Christ.

— Ζαχαρίας] Zacharias. On the etymology of this word see on Matt. xxiii. 35.

— ἐξ ἐφημερίας Ἀβιά] of the course of Abia; the eighth in order of the twenty-four courses in which the Priests were arranged by David, i. e. sixteen courses of the family of Eleazar, and eight of Ithamar (1 Chron. xxiv. 3—19. 2 Chron. viii. 14; xxxi. 2; xxxv. 4; xxxvi. 24).

Though only four classes returned from the Babylonish exile, they were distributed into twenty-four with the ancient names. Ezra ii. 36. Neh. vii. 39; xii. 1. Josephus, de Vitâ suâ, § 1. Antiq. vii. 15. 7. Jahn, Archæol. § 366. 369.

This record of the Baptist's family proves his noble estate in a worldly view. "Pertinet hæc narratio," says Rosenm., "ad indicandam Joannis nobilitatem." Cp. Joseph. (de Vit. 1. c. Apion. i. 7) on his own priestly extraction.

— Ἐλισάβετ] Elizabeth. = εὐψυχῆ, Deus juravit; the name of Aaron's wife (Exod. vi. 23), where the LXX have Ἐλισάβετ.

Observe also, Mary is the same as Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron. Thus the beginning of the Gospel carries us back even by its names to the giving of the Law.

6. ἐνώπιον] in the sight of. The word ἐνώπιον is used by LXX for Hebr. עֲלֵי (al-pene), and of frequent occurrence in the writings of St. Luke; but never used by St. Matthew and St. Mark, and only once by St. John in his Gospel, xx. 30. It is common in the Epistles of St. Paul, and in the Apocalypse.

ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, 'in the sight of God,'—to contrast them with the great number of persons in their age, who sought to seem δίκαιοι in the sight of man. See below, v. 15.

— ἐντολαῖς καὶ δικαίωμασι] ἐντολαὶ are moral precepts of natural law as reinforced in the Decalogue, see on Rom. vii. 8—13; δικαίωματα are those positive commands which were sanctioned as right by God's command (see on Rom. i. 22; ii. 26; viii. 4), and added by special revelation of God, particularly for His worship and service, and were necessary to constitute the character of legal righteousness or justification (δικαιοσύνη). Gen. xxi. 5, Ἀβραάμ ὁ πατὴρ σου ἐφύλαξε τὰς ἐντολὰς μου, καὶ τὰ δικαίωματά μου, where ἐντολαὶ μου stands for Hebr. מִצְוֹת (mitsotthe), and δικαίωματά μου for חֻקֹּת (chukkothe). So 2 Chron. xvii. 4, ἐφύλαξε τὰς ἐντολὰς μου καὶ τὰ δικαίωματά μου.

7. ἦν στείρα, καὶ ἀμφοτέροι προβεβηκότες ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις αὐτῶν] Cp. Gen. xi. 30; xviii. 11, in LXX Version. St. Luke adopts the words of the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament, as familiar to the Gentile converts, and thus connects the Gospel with its history.

It has been alleged by a recent Expositor, that "Zachariah could not have been very 'far advanced in years,' because no one was permitted to perform the duties of a Priest beyond his fiftieth year," and this is grounded on Numb. viii. 25. But that only applies to Levites. Cp. Numb. iii. 1—39; iv. 1. 30. 35. 38. 42. 46—49; and even they waited on the Tabernacle after fifty. Numb. viii. 26; i. 53.

9. ἔλαχε τοῦ θυμιάσαι] he obtained by lot the duty to burn incense on the golden altar before the Veil in the Holy Place (ναὸς), while the people were ἔξω in the outer court—the court of the Israelites—in the ἱερόν.

It was erroneously supposed by some in ancient times that Zacharias was High Priest, and that this act of his was the annual entrance of the High Priest on the Day of Atonement (the tenth day of the seventh month Tisri) into the Holy of Holies. And on this supposition the chronology of the Conception and Birth of the Baptist and of our Lord has been arranged. But the word ἔλαχε alone confutes this supposition. The High Priest did not draw lots; he alone could enter the Holy of Holies.

On the courses of the Priests and the Temple-service see Lightfoot, i. 915. 947, and Weststein here, p. 647. On the Temple itself see Lightfoot, i. 897. 1080.

11. Ὡφθῆ—θυμιάματος The Angel Gabriel, the heavenly Messenger of the Gospel, appeared to the Priest ministering in the Temple,—thus showing the harmony of the Gospel with the Law. Cp. Iren. iii. 10. He stood on the right side of the Altar, i. e. the south. (Weststein.)

—ἄγγελος Κυρίου the angel of the Lord. It appears to have been a special design of the Evangelist St. Luke in his Gospel and the Acts, to reveal to the world the important doctrine of the Ministry of the Angels of God to the Faithful, and of their instrumentality in the concerns of the Christian Church. See i. 26; ii. 9. 13. 21; xii. 8; xv. 10; xvi. 22; xxii. 43; xxiv. 4. 23. Acts i. 10. Cp. notes below on xxii. 43. Acts xii. 15, and St. Paul i Cor. xi. 10, and above, Introduction to this Gospel, p. 158.

13. Ἰωάννην John, e. g. ἰωχάναν (yochanan), the favour or grace of Jehovah; from יָחַן (Yehovah), and יָחַן (chanan), gratiosis fuit; a name significant of the gracious tidings of which he was to be the harbinger, as the forerunner and herald of the Kingdom of Grace (see John i. 17). For the general form and diction of the sentence see LXX Version of Gen. xvii. 19.

14. χαρὰ—χαρήσονται There shall be χαρὰ σοι because he (as his name shows) is a pledge of the χάρις Θεοῦ.

15. σίκερα strong drink, from the Hebr. שֶׁכָּר (shechar), root שָׁכַר (shachar), inebriate, for which the LXX used σίκερα, Lev. x. 9. Numb. vi. 3 (concerning the Nazarites), Deut. xiv. 26, and passim. “σίκερα οἶνος συμμιγῆς ἡδύσμασιν, ἢ πᾶν πόμα ἐμποιοῦν μέθην, μὴ ἐξ ἀπῆλκον δὲ σκευαστόν.” (Hesychius.) Solebant Orientales inprimis de dactylis et succo palmarum potum inebriantem conficere. Plin. H. N. xiv. 19. Fivnt vina et ē pomis: primumque ē palmitis (quarum Palestina feracissima fuit), quo Parthi et Indi utuntur, et Oriens totus. Vid. et Hieronym. ad Ies. ix. 10.” (Krin.) The sense is: He shall be a Nazir (Numb. vi. 3), ἀγνισθεὶς, separate from the world, to God, like Samson and Samuel. See on Acts xxi. 24. 26.

17. προελεύσεται αὐτοῦ he shall go before Him, i. e. the Messiah. The αὐτοῦ without a preceding substantive, shows that the Personality of the Messiah fills the mind of the speaker. He is his αὐτός. Cp. Winer, p. 132. Αὐτός is specially applied to Christ, as the Person, “Qui facit Ipse per Se quæ nemo alius facit.” See Matt. i. 21. 2 Pet. iii. 4. 1 John ii. 12. 2 John 6.

—Ἡλίου of Elijah. See on Matt. xvii. 10.

—ἐπιστρέψαι to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children. Mal. iv. 6. The Angel Gabriel applies to St. John the Baptist (the precursor of our Lord's first coming) the prophecy of Malachi, which has been made by many (see on Matt. xvii. 10) a main ground for expecting Elias in person before Christ's second coming. He will turn the hearts of the fathers, i. e. of the Jewish nation, to the children, i. e. to the Apostles of Christ (Theophyl.); he will unite the Old and New Generations, as being a bond of union between the two covenants; being the last of the Prophets, and the first of the Preachers of Christ. See Matt. xi. 10, 11.

—ἀπειθεῖς ἡμίμ (morim), rebellious, wicked. Wickedness is disobedience to God.

—ἐν φρονήσει ἐν, to or for, the wisdom or intelligence. So ἐκάλειεν ἡμᾶς ἐν ἀγίᾳ σοφίᾳ, 1 Thess. iv. 7. Rom. i. 23—26. Cp. Glass, Phil. p. 485. On the meaning of φρόνησις see Eph. i. 8.

19. Γαβριήλ Gabriel; from גַּבְרִיִּל (gebhēr), vir, root גַּבַּר (gabhar), validus fuit, and אֱל (El), Deus. ‘I am the strong man of God,’ sent on embassies concerning the Incarnation of Christ. See Dan. viii. 16; ix. 21.

Earthly empires pass away; but the same Angel Gabriel who had been sent to the prophet Daniel at Babylon, to announce the Divine Kingdom of Messiah under the Law, more than five hundred years before His birth, comes again to earth to Zacharias in the Temple at Jerusalem on a similar message, and to the Virgin Mary at Nazareth (v. 26). And his name, Gabriel, shows that the power of God is specially manifested in the Evangelical dispensation which he comes to announce.

Certain rationalizing Expositors have endeavoured to explain away this angelic appearance. Others, dissatisfied with their attempts, have pronounced it to be purely mythical. This may serve as a specimen of the varying manoeuvres of the Evil One in dealing with the inspired Text of the Written Word. Error is ever changing its form. Truth is always the same. The faithful Church of Christ, holding the Word of God in her hand, retains her place, unchanged and unchangeable; for His Spirit is with her, and she stands on a Rock.

They who desire to see an excellent refutation of the modern sceptical objections on the subject of Angelo-phany, may consult Dr. Mill's Second Dissertation, pp. 1—4. 52—73.

—εὐαγγελίσασθαι to preach the Gospel, or glad tidings; a word used more than twenty times by St. Luke in his Gospel and Acts, and very often by St. Paul; but never used in this sense by any other Evangelist, and only once by St. Peter, 1 Pet. i. 12. St. Matthew uses it once in a passive sense, xi. 5.

22. αὐτὸς ἦν διανεύων he himself was beconing. Instead of pronouncing the Sacerdotal Benediction with which the people were to be dismissed to their homes (Numb. vi. 23—26). The Priest, struck dumb when officiating in the Temple, on account of incredulity at the announcement of the Angel, was a symbol of the Levitical Law, now to be reduced to silence by the preaching of the Gospel. (Origen and Isidore, Ep. 131.) Cp. Heb. viii. 13.

“Credat Judæus,” says Ambrose, “ut loqui possit.”—Let the Jew become a Christian if he would recover his speech.

—διέμενε κωφός] he remained dumb, a divinely ordained proof to Zacharias and others of the reality of the Vision. Cp. Saul's blindness, Acts ix. 8.

It has been inferred by many Expositors from v. 62, ἐγένεον αὐτῷ, that Zacharias was deaf as well as dumb. But this is not certain. As dumb, he made signs by beckoning (see v. 22, ἦν διανεῶν αὐτοῖς). His language was by signs: and it may be that his friends accommodated themselves to his condition, and used that language for communication with him. It is observed by Bengel, that the dumb often prefer to be addressed by signs. Such a mode of intercourse does not remind them of their own loss of hearing, as compared with others: which is most painfully felt by inability to hear their own voice.

Besides, the words ἔση σωπῶν κ.τ.λ., are probably introduced to define the sense in which κωφός is used. And it is not said in v. 64, that Zacharias recovered his hearing: but only that his tongue was loosed.

²³ οἶκον] his house. Probably in the hill country of Judæa. See v. 39.

—Ναζαρέθ] Nazareth. See on Matt. ii. 23. It has been alleged by some that St. Matthew knew nothing of Joseph and Mary's earlier connexion with Nazareth. But this is an error. See Matt. xiii. 55. 56, which shows that the family and kindred of Joseph were settled there, cp. Mark vi. 3; and silently confirms St. Luke's account (i. 26; ii. 4), that Joseph and Mary had come up from Nazareth to Bethlehem. The Apocryphal Books confirm the Gospel Narrative. See Evang. Nat. B. V. M., p. 319, where Nazareth is Mary's birth-place.

²⁷ μεμνηστευμένην] A Virgin, but espoused to a husband. See above on Matt. i. 18. The Virgin Mary was espoused; “ut adventum Filii Dei Diabolus ignoraret,” says Origen, quoting the saying of S. Ignatius (Epist. ad Ephes. c. 19), ἔλαθεν τὸν ἄρχοντα τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου παρθενία Μαρίας. The opinion of S. Ignatius was, that the Devil may have known from the prophecy of Isaiah (vii. 14), that the Messiah now expected was to be born of a Virgin; he saw that the Son of Mary was some great Personage; he heard Him called the Son of God (Matt. iii. 17) at His baptism. But Mary was espoused to Joseph, how then could her Son be born of a Virgin? “Disposuerat Salvator (says Origen) dispensationem suam et assumptionem corporis ignorare Diabolum, unde et in generatione suā celavit eum, et discipulis postea præcipiebat ne manifestum Eum faceret; et cum ab ipso Diabolo tentaretur nunquam confessus est Dei se esse Filium” (cp. 1 Cor. ii. 6—8).

Cp. Leo, Bishop of Rome in the 5th cent. (A.D. 440—462), Serm. xxi. p. 72, who there strongly condemns the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, now made an article of Faith by Pope Pius IX. Dec. 8, 1854: “Assumpta est de Matre Domini natura, non culpa. Et cum in omnibus matribus non fiat sine peccati sorde conceptio, hæc inde purgationem traxit unde concepit.” And Serm. xxiii., “Terra carnis humanæ, quæ in primo fuerat prævaricatore maledicta, hoc solo B. V. partu germen edidit benedictum, et ad vitio suæ stirpis alienum.”

Could he have said more plainly, that she who conceived Christ without sin, was not conceived without sin? See also his Serm. xxxviii. 3, p. 83, and Serm. xxxix. 4, p. 87, where, in enumerating all the examples of remarkable conceptions and births, e.g. Adam, Eve, Isaac, Jacob, Jeremiah, Samuel, John the Baptist, he does not even mention that of the Blessed Virgin. And last of all, he says, Serm. lx. p. 135, “Solut beatæ Virginis Filius natus est sine delicto.”

And Gregory the First, also Bishop of Rome (at the end of the sixth century), says, “Solut [Redemptor] in carne suā vere mundus extitit.” (Moral. in Job. xi. vol. i. p. 392.)

So S. Cyril Hierosolym. p. 27, εἰς ἄνθρωπον ἀναμάρτητος, ὁ τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἡμῶν καθάρων Ἰησοῦς, and S. Ambrose in Luc. ii. n. 56, “Solut ex natis de femina sanctus dominus Jesus, qui terrenæ contagia corruptelæ immaculati partus novitate non sensit, et celesti majestate depulit.” Other authorities to the same effect are cited in the Editor's ‘Occasional Sermons,’ No. xliii.

Such was the testimony of the See of Rome for the first six centuries after Christ. “How is the fine gold changed!” (Lam. iv. 1.) How can that which is so much at variance with itself be imagined to be infallible! and how dangerous and deadly is that system of religion, which is based on an imaginary Infallibility!

²⁸ εἰσελθὼν] Contrast with this simple narrative the ornate recital in the Apocryphal book, De Nativitate Mariæ, § ix. ed. Fabric. p. 33, or Tillo, p. 332, and p. 367.

—κεχαριτωμένη] specially graced or favoured by God. “Gratiā cumulata” (Valer.). See v. 30, εὖρες χάριν π. τ. Θεῷ, and cp. Ephes. i. 6; not (as some render it) a source or channel of grace from God. Cp. Eccles. xviii. 17. “Non mater gratiæ, sed filia.” Beng. Cp. Mede, p. 181.

³¹ συλλήψῃ] thou shalt conceive. To confirm her faith, the Angel reminds her of Isaiah's prophecy (Isa. vii. 14), and assures her that it is now to be fulfilled in her, and that Jesus and Emmanuel were two names of the same Person.

—Ἰησοῦν] Jesus. See on Matt. i. 21.

34. Πῶς ἔσται τοῦτο] The question, how it should be, does not express doubt, but rather implies faith, that it will be. The πῶς presupposes the ὅτι. "Non de effectu dubitat sed qualitatem ipsius querit effectus" (Ambrose); and see Libri Apoc. N. T. p. 332, "Virgo non incredula sed modum scire volens."

But Zacharias (v. 18) had said, "How shall I know this?" He disbelieves the ὅτι. Mary believes that it will be; and therefore inquires how it will take place: Zacharias doubts that it will not be, and therefore asks for a proof of the Angel's assertion, to remove his doubts.

There is, therefore, a striking contrast between the learned Priest in the Temple at Jerusalem, and the humble maiden at Nazareth.

35. Πνεῦμα ἅγιον—ἐπισκιάσει] The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee. As the Holy Spirit moved on the face of the deep, and brooded over it at the Creation, so now the Holy Spirit quickens the new Creation in Christ. On the figure here used, see note on Matt. iii. 16, and cp. Matt. i. 20.

From these words of the Angel, the Nestorians are refuted, who say that a mere man was conceived and born of the Blessed Virgin, and afterwards was associated with God. Theophyl., who adds, τὸ γεννώμενον ἐν τῇ μήτρᾳ ἐκείνῳ ἦν υἱὸς Θεοῦ.

And while we maintain the Unity of Christ's Person against Nestorius, we must, on the other hand, avoid the Eutychian heresy, which confounds the two natures of Christ. (Hooker, E. P. V. lii. and liii.)

Some modern Expositors have interpreted πνεῦμα ἅγιον, the divine essence generally; because, they say, if we understand it literally, "the Holy Ghost," it would follow that "the Holy Ghost is the Father of Jesus Christ." But this is an error. "Because (to cite Bp. Pearson) the Holy Ghost did not beget Christ by any communication of His essence, therefore He is not the Father of Him, though Christ were conceived by Him. . . the Word was conceived in the womb of a woman, not after the manner of men, but by the singular, powerful, invisible, immediate operation of the Holy Ghost, whereby a Virgin was beyond the Law of nature enabled to conceive, and that which was conceived in her was originally and completely sanctified." Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii. Cp. Dr. Barrow on the Incarnation, Sermon. xxiv. vol. iv. pp. 533 556.

Leo M. (in his Sermon on the Nativity, xxiii. xxiv. pp. 76—78) compares the operation of the Holy Ghost in the Nativity to His work in the human soul in the Sacrament of Baptism. "Factus est homo Christus nostri generis, ut nos divinæ naturæ possimus esse consortes. Originem quam sumpsit in utero matris posuit in fonte baptismatis. . . . Homini renascenti aqua baptismatis instar est uteri vaginalis, eodem Spiritu replente fontem Qui replevit Virginem." Cp. the Collect for Christmas Day.

—τὸ γεννώμενον] that which is being born of thee. Hence St. Paul says, Gal. iv. 4, "God sent forth His Son, born of a woman:" not through a woman, but of her flesh; and therefore of the same nature with us; for Mary, being a daughter of Adam, is our Sister. (Athanas. ad Epict. Basil. de Spir. Sancto.)

—ἅγιον] Christ alone is holy, because not conceived by a fleshly union, but by the Holy Ghost. (Gregor. 18. Moral. c. 52.) See above on v. 27.

36. ἡ συγγενὴς σου] thy kinswoman. Therefore Jesus and John were relatives. And Christ, our High Priest as well as our King, was connected with the Priestly as well as the Royal race. Greg. Nazian. (Carm. 18, de Geneal. Christ.)

Because Elizabeth and Mary were συγγενεῖς, it does not follow that they were of the same tribe. Josephus relates that he himself was sprung from ancestors of the priestly and royal tribes (Vit. i.): and the Jews say (Wetstein) that Miriam, of the tribe of Levi, was wife of Caleb, of the tribe of Judah.

On the form συγγενεῖς, see Lobeck, Phryn. p. 451.

—γῆρῳ] On this Ionic form for γῆρᾳ, see Winer, G. G. p. 60.

—μὴν ἕκτος—στεῖρα] On this use of the dative, see Matt. xv. 32. Mark viii. 2.

37. οὐκ—πάν] nothing. See on Matt. xxiv. 22.

ῥῆμα = Hebr. דַּבָּר (dabhar), matter spoken (see Vorst. de Hebr. N. T. p. 28). The phrase is from Gen. xviii. 14, LXX. See Bp. Pearson, Præf. in LXX, p. 267. Cp. ii. 15.

38. Ἰδοὺ ἡ δούλη K.] Behold the handmaid of the Lord. On the Obedience of Mary, as contrasted with the Disobedience of Eve; and on the conveyance of Life, as a consequence of the one, to counteract Death, flowing from the other, see Iren. iii. 33. And Aug. says (Serm. xv. de Temp.), "Diabolus per serpentem Evæ locutus per Evæ aures mundo intulit mortem; Deus per Angelum ad Mariam protulit verbum, et cunctis sæculis vitam effudit."

39. Ἀναστᾶσα] "Participium celeritatem denotans." (Valck.) "Occasionem dederat Angelus." (Beng.)

—Ἰούδα] A Levitical city in the hill country of Judah. Some imagine it to be Jutta. See Reland, Palæstin. p. 870. Winer, R.-W. v. Jutta, i. p. 641.

But the Holy Spirit withholds the name; it may be, to restrain vain curiosity. The exact day and year of Christ's birth are not certainly known, see Matt. ii. 20. And the precise sites of the Nativity, of the Temptation, of the Sermon on the Mount, of the Transfiguration, of the Crucifixion, and of the Burial of Christ, are not known. A remarkable fact, perhaps providential. Say not, "lo here, or lo there!" Go not forth on pilgrimages to the 'Holy Places'; the kingdom of God is within you, xvii. 21. See above on Matt. iv. 1.

41. ἐσκίρτησε] leapt. See above, v. 15. Elizabeth, the mother, first heard the word, but the babe in her womb first felt the grace.

46. Μεγαλύνει] Magnificat. Compare the Song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 1. The Magnificat, so full of Hebraisms, connects the eucharistic poetry of the Gospel with the Psalms and other Hymns of the Hebrew Dispensation. The same may be said of the Song of Zacharias, v. 68.

Some of the Hebraisms have been noted as follows by Kuin. Ἐποίησέ μοι μεγαλεῖα ὁ δυνατός: μεγαλεῖα respondet Hebraico נִסִּיּוֹת, ut Ps. lxx. 21, ἃ ἐποίησάς μοι μεγαλεῖα add. lxxi. 19; cxxvi. 2, 3, ἐ quo loco verba nostra videntur esse desumpta. ὁ δυνατός, Hebr., יָדָבִיר potentissimus, epitheton Dei in literis sacris

48. ἐπὶ τὴν ταπεινῶσιν τῆς δούλης αὐτοῦ] He deigned to look on the low estate of his handmaid. Notwithstanding its lowliness, He did not despise it. "Ἐπέβλεψεν ἐπ' ἐμὲ τὴν ταπεινήν, οὐκ ἐγὼ πρὸς ἐκεῖνον ἀνέβλεψα (Theophyl.); "sed humilem me respexit Deus." (Origen.)

— μακαριοῦσί] they will call me blessed; not for my virtue, but because God hath done great things for me. (Theophyl.) See Bp. Taylor's Life of Christ, sect. i., and Bp. Bull's Sermon on the Blessed Virgin's low and exalted condition, Sermon iv. p. 83, and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii. p. 278.

49. ὁ Δυνατὸς] ἡψ (Shadday), the Almighty.

50. εἰς γενεὰς γενεῶν] to ages of ages: צַדִּיק צַדִּיק (ledor dorum), or צַדִּיק צַדִּיק (dor vador), Gen. xvii. 9. Exod. iii. 15. Joel ii. 2.

52. δυνάστας] Specially Satan, the Prince of this world. (Cyril.)

54. Ἀντελάβετο] He laid hold of, in order to help. "Ἀντιλαβέσθαι τινὸς est manu prehensum aliquem periculo extrahere; cp. Esa. xli. 8, 9, σὺ Ἰσραὴλ ὁ παῖς οὗ ἀντελαβόμεν." (Valck.) Cp. Heb. ii. 16.

— Ἰσραὴλ] 'The Israel of God,'—those who follow the steps of Abraham's faith. (Bede.)

56. μῆνας τρεῖς] three months, probably till her delivery — ὑπέστρεψεν] returned. ὑποστρέφω in this sense is often used by St. Luke, about thirty times; but hardly once in any other Gospel. Some MSS. have it in Matt. viii. 13, and it is found in most MSS. in Mark xiv. 40.

59. ὀγδόῃ ἡμέρᾳ] on the eighth day. Cf. Gen. xvii. 12. The circumcision did not take place in the Temple, but at home, in the house of Zacharias. Elizabeth, the mother, was present.

On the typical character of the eighth day, the day of circumcision, see on xxiv. 1.

— ἐκάλουν] they were calling—they desired and designed to call him Zacharias.

62. τὸ τί] On this use of τὸ, see on Mark ix. 23.

63. πινακίδιον] a small tablet, probably covered over with wax, on which he wrote with a stylus.

64. Ἀνεψύχη δὲ τὸ στόμα] His mouth was opened. "Resoluta est lingua ejus, quia quam vinxerat incredulitas, fides solvit. Credamus et nos igitur, ut loquamur. Scribamus in Spiritu mysteria si volumus loqui, scribamus prænuntium Christi non in tabulis lapideis, sed in tabulis cordis. Etenim qui Joannem loquitur, Christum prophetat; loquamur Joannem, loquamur et Christum, ut nostrum quoque os possit aperiri." (Ambrose.) When the Voice, which was to prepare the way of the Eternal Word, comes forth into the world, the father's tongue is loosed. (Greg. Naz. Orat. 6.) See above, on v. 22.

68. Εὐλογητός] Blessed. This Hymn also, like the Magnificat, is replete with Hebraisms, harmonizing it with the Psalmody of the Old Testament. Thus the voices of the Law and the Gospel are heard in concert with each other; and utter a protest against those who would make the one to jar against the other. Some of the Hebrew expressions will be noticed in the following notes.

The student may read the Hymns of this and the following Chapter in Hebrew Translations of the New Testament, and in the Book of Common Prayer rendered into that language.

69. κέρας] horn. קֶרֶן (keren), cornu, Ps. cxxxii. 17. Horns

⁷², ⁷³. ἔλεος—μνησθῆναι διαθήκης ἁγίας αὐτοῦ, ὅρκον] “ποιῆσαι et μνησθῆναι posita sunt pro eis τὸ ποιῆσαι et eis τὸ μνησθῆναι. Formula autem ποιεῖν ἔλεος μετὰ τινος notat benignum se alicui præstare, benignitatem suam alicui demonstrare, favere, bene velle alicui, atque adeo enim eod. τῶν πατέρων est id. qd. τοῖς πατράσιν ἡμῶν. Hebræi enim eodem modo formulæ רָחַם הָיָה אֲדָרָא addere solent particulas רָחַם et דָּר. vid. Gen. xxiv. 14, add. xxvi. 29. Exod. xx. 6. xxxiv. 7. Deut. v. 10. Vorstius de Hebraism. N. The Holy Spirit, speaking by Zacharias, seems to refer here to the providential dispensation signified in the names of the Baptist and his parents. The Baptist, by his name, John, spake of the ἔλεος or grace of God; Zacharias (from זָכַר [Zachar], recordatus fuit, and יָה, Jah, Jehovah), signifies Θεὸς ἐμνήσθη, and Elisabeth (from אֵל [El], Deus, and שֶׁבַע [sheba], juravit), is connected with the oath of God.

⁷⁴, ⁷⁵.] On this text, see the Sermon of Bp. Andrewes, iv. 361.

⁷⁶. παιδίον] child.—“Infans tantillus Propheta dicitur et erit Altissimi.” (Valck.)

⁷⁸. ἀνατολή] This word is used by LXX for Hebr. מָזְרָא, the East, or Day Spring, from root מָזַר, ortus fuit. Jer. xxxi. 40. Cp. Mal. iv. 2, and Rev. xvi. 12, ‘kings of the East.’

The term ἀνατολή had also been applied to Christ by the LXX in translating the word צֶמַח (tsemach), germen, surculus, the Branch, in Jer. xxiii. 5. Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12. Cp. Isa. ix. 2; lx. 1. Ps. cx. 3. Matt. iv. 16. Welstein, p. 657. (Junius, Parallel. i. 55. Glass, Phil. p. 756.) See on Matt. ii. 23.

“Vates Hebræi MESSIAM venturum consideraverunt sub utraque imagine et Solis orientis et Germinis quod cœlitus duceret originem.” Valck.

And this ἀνατολή, whether as Oriens or Germen, is distinguished from all other ἀνατολαί,—because, whereas they are from below, this is from above, ἐξ ὕψους.

⁷⁹. σκιᾷ θανάτου] the shadow of death. Hebr. צֶלְמָוֶת (tsalmaveth). Isa. ix. 2. Matt. iv. 16.

CH. II. 1, 2. ἐξῆλθε κ.τ.λ.] there went forth a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world (see next note) should be registered in a census.

This ἀπογραφή was an enrolment. It does not appear that any impost or tax was levied with it. The Emperor Augustus is known to have made a Breviarium totius Imperii (Sueton, Octav. 28. 101), in which was registered “quantum sociorum in armis,” (Tacit. Ann. i. 11.) See also other authorities in Savigny, Zeit-Vol. I.

schrift für geschichtliche Rechts-wissenschaft, vol. vi. 350, who shows that Augustus contemplated a taxation of the whole Roman empire.

Though Judæa was now nominally a kingdom under Herod, yet Herod was a vassal of Augustus (see Josephus, Antt. xvi. 9); and Herod’s subjects took an oath of allegiance to Augustus (Ibid. xvii. 2), perhaps when this ἀπογραφή was made. By referring to this ἀπογραφή, St. Luke thus points attention to the following facts,—

That the time was come for the Messiah’s birth, because the whole world was now subject to the Roman, or Fourth Monarchy (Dan. ii. 44). See Chrys. v. 716, Orat. iii.

That the time was very seasonable for the coming of the Prince of Peace, now that Augustus ruled, under whom the Temple of Janus was shut. See Dio, lib. iv. Patrit. ii. p. 165.

That the sceptre was only now departing from Judah (Gen. xlix. 10); for this registration of which he is now speaking was the first ἀπογραφή.

That the greatest power of the world, that of Rome, was made subservient to God and Christ, in bringing Mary to Bethlehem, and so fulfilling the prophecies which prove her Divine Son to be the Christ. Micah v. 2.

— πᾶσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην] all the habitable world. The Roman empire. Acts xvii. 6; xxiv. 5. Joseph. Antt. xii. 31. B. J. v. 5. 14. Herodian, v. 2. 5. Patrit. de Evang. iii. 18. Welstein, p. 658, who cites Polyb. vi. 48; viii. 4, affirming that all the οἰκουμένην was then under Roman rule.

This expression therefore brings out clearly the fact, predicted by Daniel, that the world should be subject for the most part to one great temporal monarchy at this time. And the Roman Monarchy, to which the world was then subject, is certainly the Fourth Monarchy, foreshown by Daniel, ii. 44, 45; vii. 7; and the Monarchy which succeeds that of the iron, brass, clay, silver, and gold (Dan. ii. 45), is the Fifth Monarchy; the only kingdom that will never be destroyed, the Monarchy of CHRIST, vii. 14. 23—27.

The whole habitable world is related to Jesus, who was willing to be enrolled in the same catalogue with them (cp. Beng.), and not with the Jews alone. Compare the confirmation of St. Luke’s narrative in Libri Apocr. N. T. p. 234 and 373, where the ἀπογραφή is well rendered ‘professio.’

2. Αὕτη—Κυρήνιου] This first enrolment took place when Cyrenius was President of Syria.

Kυρήνιος, or Quirinus, was Præses of Syria after Varus,—i. e. A. V. C. 758 (see Joseph. Antt. xvi. 13. Tacit. Annal. iii. 68), about ten years after our Lord’s Nativity, and he then held an ἀπογραφή, census or registration. Joseph. Antt. xviii. 1. That census is referred to by St. Luke in the Acts, v. 37.

Therefore it is said by some that there is an error here in the Sacred History. The following is from Meyer, p. 237: “Der Bericht des Lukas ist offenbar irrig. Denn 1) ist das Præsidium des Quirinus um etwa zehn Jahre zu früh gesetzt; und 2) kann ein Reichs-Census, wenn ein solcher überhaupt zur Zeit der Geburt Jesu gehalten worden wäre (was jedoch anderweitig nicht nachzuweisen steht; denn die Stellen christlicher Autoren Cassiodor. Var. 3. 52. Suidas. s. v. ἀπογραφή beruhen offenbar auf dem Berichte des Luk., wie auch die chronologisch irrigte Notiz des Isidor. Orig. 5. 36. 4), Palästina nicht betroffen haben, da diess noch nicht Römische Provinz geworden war, was erst 759 geschah, wie denn auch die Verhängung einer so abnormen und beunruhigenden Maassregel über Palästina, welche gewiss nicht ohne tumultuarische Opposition verlaufen sein würde, so ungemein wichtig für die Jüdische Geschichte gewesen wäre, dass sie Joseph. gewiss nicht mit völligem Stillschweigen übergangen hätte (Antt. 18. 1, 1, gehört nicht hieher),—zumal da nicht etwa der rex socius selbst, Herodes, sondern der Römische Gouverneur, Quirinus, nach Luk. (gegen Wieseler) die dirigierende Behörde war. Ueberhaupt aber 3) ist die Abhaltung eines allgemeinen Reichscensus unter Augustus durchaus unhistorisch; historisch ist (s. d. Monum. Ancyran. b. Wolf ed. Sueton. ii. p. 369 ff. vgl. Sueton. Aug. 27), dass Augustus dreimal, 726, 746, u. 767, einen Census populi d. i. einen Census der Römischen Bürger, nicht aber auch der sämtlichen Provinzen des Reichs, gehalten habe (s. gegen Huschke: Wieseler p. 84 ff.)."

In order to remove the alleged difficulty, some have asserted that the word πρώτη here signifies before, as πρώτος μου, John i. 15. 30; cp. Acts v. 36. (See Wieseler, Chronol. Synops. der 4 Evangelien, p. 111—121. Greswell, Dissertations, xii. vol. i. p. 533.) A similar explanation has been given by Tholuck (Glaubwürdigkeit, &c. p. 182) and others. In this case the purport of the Evangelist in this sentence would be to guard his readers against confounding this taxing at our Lord's Nativity, with the later one which was held by Quirinus (to which St. Luke himself has referred in the Acts of the Apostles, v. 37), and so falling into a chronological error with regard to the life of Christ.

But this exposition is hardly consistent with the Greek text of the Evangelist.

Others have supposed (e. g. Casaubon, Exc. Antibar. p. 126, Grotius, and Wernsdorf, de Censu Vitel. 1693. Birch, de Censu Quirini, 1790. Münster, Stern d. Weisen, p. 88. Neander, Leb. Jes. p. 25; see Winer, Lex. v. Quirinus) that ἡγεμονεύοντος is to be understood in a larger sense, and is intended to express that Quirinus was an Envoy, or Commissioner Extraordinary, from Augustus, to hold this earlier Census. And it appears that he was in favour with Augustus, and had authority in the East under Augustus. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 48; i. 42. Murator, Thesaur. Inscr. i. p. 670.)

But it does not seem that the words ἡγεμονεύοντος τῆς Συρίας Κυρηνίου can bear this sense.

Bp. Middleton has proposed another interpretation (on the Greek Article, ad loc.); according to which πρώτη should be equivalent to πρώτον, and the sense be, 'this taxing first took effect,' see also Dr. Kitto, Daily Illustr. p. 49.

On the whole, it seems that there are two interpretations, and two only, of this passage, which are conformable to grammatical laws.

I. The first is, this first enrolment took place (ἐγένετο, not ἦν, cp. ἐγένετο, Acts xi. 28) when Cyrenius was Governor of Syria. See the similar use of ἡγεμονεύοντος in ch. iii. 1.

According to this translation, Cyrenius was Governor of Syria at the time of the Nativity, as well as ten years after it. Justin Martyr, who lived in Palestine in the second century, states in three places that this was the case. He says (Apol. i. 34), "Jesus was born at Bethlehem, thirty stadia distant from Jerusalem; as you may learn from the enrolments that were holden (ἀπογραφῶν τῶν γενομένων) under Quirinus your first Governor, in Judæa." This testimony is more important because it is addressed to the Emperor, Senate, and People of Rome. Justin says also (Apol. i. 46), "Christ was born one hundred and fifty years ago, under Quirinus." And in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew (cap. 78) he says that "Joseph went up from Nazareth, where he dwelt, to Bethlehem, whence he derived his origin, when the first taxing in Judæa was held under Quirinus." These statements are of more value as made by one who had lived in Judæa, and was addressing himself to persons who might be supposed to be familiar with the facts, and who, as he was conscious, would be ready, able, and eager to refute him, if he said what was not true. Cp. Euseb. H. E. i. 5.

Nor is this statement inconsistent with Tertullian's account, that the census of the Nativity was holden by Saturninus. Tertullian's words are (Marcion, iv. 19), "census actos in Judæa per Sentium Saturninum." Sentius Saturninus might have had local jurisdiction in this matter in Judæa, while Quirinus was Præses of Syria; as Coponius was afterwards Procurator of Judæa, while Quirinus was Præses of Syria (Joseph. Antt. xviii. 1); and St. Luke himself uses the term ἡγεμονεύοντος τῶς Ἰουδαίας (iii. 1) as a distinct one from ἡγεμονεύοντος τῆς Συρίας. In Josephus (Antt. xvi. 9) both Saturninus and Voluminus are called Kαίσαρος ἡγεμόνες and τῆς Συρίας ἐπιστατοῦντες. So Saturninus and Quirinus might hold office at once.

Perhaps in the fact of his having held the first Census, we may see a reason why Quirinus was afterwards chosen as a man of experience in Syrian affairs, by Augustus, to hold the second Census, and to fill the office of Præses in A. U. 758.

An opinion very similar has been recently maintained with much learning by Patritius, de Evang. ii. p. 165—168.

The researches of Zumpt (Comment. Epigraph. pt. ii. Berlin, 1844) have enhanced the probability that Quirinus, who was Governor of Cilicia (cp. Tacit. Ann. iii. 48. Strabo, xii. 6. 5; xiv. 4. 1), was also Governor of Syria at the time of the Nativity, and have satisfied a very learned and able writer of Roman History that this was the case. See Merivale's Roman Empire, vol. iv. p. 457.

The main point in Zumpt's argument is, that Cilicia, when separated from Cyprus by Augustus, did not remain a distinct government, but was united to Syria (cp. Dio C. liii. 12. Tac. Ann. ii. 43; ii. 70 and 78; vi. 41. Zumpt, pp. 90—148).

See also below on Acts xxiii. 34.

II. Secondly, the passage may be rendered as follows—"this Taxing or Enrolment became πρώτη, or first, when Cyrenius was Governor of Syria."

It is to be remembered, that St. Luke's design in referring to the Register or ἀπογραφῇ was to convince his readers that Joseph and Mary were of David's line, and that Christ was born at Bethlehem. In order to do this, he must specify clearly what the title of the Registration was to which he referred. If the reader looked in the Register of Quirinus (whose Census in U. C. 758 was a celebrated one, and was held about ten years after the Nativity), he would find no such entry; and he would suspect the Evangelist of error, and would not have the evidence which St. Luke desired to impart.

The sense therefore may be, This Taxing at the Nativity became the first (taxing) when Cyrenius or Quirinus was President of Syria.

This may be thus explained. As was said above, we know from Josephus (cp. Acts v. 37) that another Census was held by Cyrenius when President of Syria. Consequently a necessity then first arose that the earlier Census which had been held in the year of our Lord's birth, should be distinguished from that later one which was held by Quirinus. Therefore it then became known as πρώτη ἀπογραφῇ. And St. Luke's meaning appears to be, that when Quirinus was afterwards President of Syria, and, as such, held a Census, then the other Census of which he is now speaking came to be characterized as πρώτη. And the Evangelist thus instructs his readers, that, in order to find the names of Joseph and Mary, and to obtain official evidence from the Roman archives of Christ's birth at Bethlehem, they are not to look in the Register which was made by Quirinus, but to refer to that other and earlier Registration which then began to be entitled πρώτη ἀπογραφῇ, because it was then first succeeded by a δευτέρα, or Second ἀπογραφῇ.

The other and later Registration of Quirinus seems to have been known as "the taxing" (ἡ ἀπογραφῇ), Acts v. 37. It was the more celebrated of the two, because in the earlier taxing (that of the Nativity) Judæa had not been reduced to a Roman province, as it was after the deposition of Archelaus, under Quirinus, with a Procurator (or ἐπίτροπος) of its own, Coponius, subject to Quirinus, the Præses of Syria. (Josephus, Antt. xviii. 1, and B. J. ii. 11. Cp. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iv.)

Since the later or second taxing under Quirinus is called ἡ ἀπογραφῇ (the taxing) by St. Luke himself (Acts v. 37), it is evident that he was cognizant of two taxings; the first that at the Nativity, mentioned here in the Gospel; the second that specified in the Acts; and he distinguishes the one from the other,—the one as "the first Registration," the second as "the Registration."

In confirmation of the above opinion it may be observed that, in the Roman provinces, Land, which could be shown to have been under cultivation for ten years, was liable to taxation. (See Ulpian, de Censibus, Jus Civile, i. p. 705.) And the ἀπογραφῇ of Cyrenius was about ten years after our Lord's birth.

Hence the land which had been registered as under cultivation at the time of the Nativity would have become taxable at the registration of Cyrenius. The registration at the time of the Nativity would then come into full operation. Those who had been then registered would be first called out to pay taxes. In this sense it might well be called πρώτη, prima, principalis (see on Luke vi. 1; xv. 22. Acts xvi. 12) descriptio. Just as a levy of soldiers, dating back from a given year, may be called a prima conscriptio.

λαίας ἐκ πόλεως Ναζαρέθ εἰς τὴν Ἰουδαίαν, εἰς πόλιν Δαυὶδ ἥτις καλεῖται Βηθλεέμ, διὰ τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν ἐξ οἴκου καὶ πατριᾶς Δαυὶδ, ⁵ ἀπογράφασθαι σὺν Μαριάμ τῇ μεμνηστευμένη αὐτῷ γυναικί, οὔσῃ ἐγκύῳ.

($\frac{2}{v}$) ⁶ Ἐγένετο δὲ ἐν τῷ εἶναι αὐτοὺς ἐκεῖ, ἐπλήσθησαν αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ τεκεῖν αὐτήν· ⁷ καὶ ἔτεκε τὸν υἱὸν αὐτῆς τὸν πρωτότοκον, καὶ ἐσπαργάνωσεν αὐτὸν, ^w Matt. i. 25. καὶ ἀνέκλινεν αὐτὸν ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ, διότι οὐκ ἦν αὐτοῖς τόπος ἐν τῷ καταλύματι.

($\frac{3}{x}$) ⁸ Καὶ ποιμένες ἦσαν ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ τῇ αὐτῇ ἀγραυλοῦντες, καὶ φυλάσσοντες

Hence also we may explain that at the ἀπογραφὴ of the Nativity there was no popular outbreak, although Judæa was then nominally a Monarchy; but ten years afterwards, when it came into operation, an insurrection took place, although Judæa was then more directly subject to Rome. See on Acts v. 37.

Thus also St. Luke shows his Gentile readers, and particularly such persons as the "most excellent Theophilus"—men of patrician rank and official dignity—that the great Heathen Emperor of the World, Cæsar Augustus, was an instrument in the hands of God for accomplishing the prophecies concerning the birth-place and parentage of the Messiah, which prove that Jesus is the Christ; and he refers those Gentile readers to the public records in the Roman Capitol for evidence of the truth of his narrative in these important respects.

3. ἐκαστος] Every Roman subject was liable to a capitation tax; males after fourteen, females after twelve. (See Huschke, über den Census, p. 120. Davidson's Introduction, i. pp. 206—214.)

4. πόλιν Δαυὶδ] the City of David which is called Bethlehem. A mode of speech indicative of the fact that St. Luke is writing for Gentiles. See on iv. 31; xxi. 37.

— Βηθλεέμ] Bethlehem; the House of Bread. See on Matt. ii. 1. Cp. John vi. 51. 58. (Greg. Hom. viii. in Evan. and Bede.)

— οἴκου καὶ πατριᾶς] πατριὰ = φυλὴ (Hesyc.); οἶκος, a family in the tribe. He was of the tribe of Judah and house of David in it.

5. σὺν Μαριάμ—οὔσῃ ἐγκύῳ] A suggestion that Mary was also of the house of David. (See on Matt. i. 1.) Even though women were not obliged by the edict to go with their husbands to their cities, yet Mary in her present state might well desire the protection of Joseph; and the Evangelist seems to suggest that her pregnancy (so far from being an obstacle to it) was rather a reason for her journey, which, it must be remembered, did not exceed seventy miles. It appears also that women in Syria were subject to a capitation tax after the age of fourteen. (See Ulpian in Jus Civile de Censibus, i. p. 705.) And she would have had divine guidance to direct her in this important matter.

It is also probable from the fact mentioned in v. 7 that Mary swathed the Infant Jesus herself, that the pains of parturition and of childbirth were mercifully alleviated to her in bringing forth into the World Him Who alone was conceived without sin. And this was the opinion of some of the Fathers. "Ipsa et mater et obstetrix fuit." (Cyprian, Jerome, Maldonat., and Burgen.)

The doubts raised by De Wette (ad loc.) and Strauss (Leben Jesu, i. § 28) on this part of the History, proceed from a supposition that it was the duty of the Holy Spirit to record every minute particular in the Gospels, and from a want of recognition of divine suggestion and counsel regulating the actions of those who were principally concerned in the events.

7. πρωτότοκον] firstborn; not as if she was ever afterwards a mother. See on Matt. i. 25, and S. Cyril here (p. 123, Mai, or p. 9, Payne Smith), who well observes that Christ is called πρωτότοκος in two senses in Holy Scripture, as Everlasting Son of God (Heb. i. 6); and, as here, as Son of Mary; and that as certainly in the former case πρωτότοκος is equivalent to μονογενής, or only-begotten, so it is in the latter. In both cases he is πρῶτος καὶ μόνος. God the Father Himself is called "the First," and it is added, "beside Me is no other." (Isa. xlv. 6). So Christ, as Son. Cp. Ps. lxxix. 27. Heb. i. 6, with John i. 18.

— ἐσπαργάνωσεν] she swathed. Used by LXX in Ezek. xvi. 4, for ἔχη (chathal), 'fasciis involvit.' Cp. Job xxxviii. 9.

— ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ] in the stable of the Inn (Wets., Valck.). φάτνη is used by the LXX for 'stabulum,' as Latin præsepe (Virgil, vii. 275), not for manger properly so called. (See Prov. xiv. 4. Job xxxix. 9. Hab. iii. 17. 2 Chron. xxxii. 28, and elsewhere.) It was not necessary that He should be laid in the manger, because there was no room in the inn.

See also the Angel's words in v. 12, "Ye shall find the babe lying ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ," in the inn. There would probably be but one inn in so small a village as Bethlehem; but in that one inn there might be many mangers, and also in private houses.

— ἐν τῷ καταλύματι] in the inn, or caravanserai, "ubi peregrinantes sarcinas de camelis vel equis solutas deponerant." Bethlehem being a small village, there was probably only one inn, and this would be now crowded by persons coming for the Census.

Concerning the Grotto called the 'Cave of the Nativity,' see S. Justin M. c. Tryphon, cap. 78. Origen, i. p. 567. Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 41. S. Jerome, Ep. 24 ad Marcell. Suicer, L. v. φάτνη, and the Libri Apocryphi N. T. pp. 17. 67. 240. 377, ed. Thilo, particularly the note in p. 382; and Robinson's Palestine, ii. 285. Dr. Kitto's Illustrations of N. T. pp. 60 and 70—76. Cp. on Matt. ii. 1.

It is remarkable that this word κατάλυμα is used in two other places of the N. T. (Mark xiv. 14. Luke xxii. 11), and there designates the Guest-chamber, Upper Room, ἀνώγειον, or υπερῶνον (cf. Mark xiv. 15. Luke xxii. 12), where our Lord ate the Paschal Supper with His Disciples.

It is probable that the κατάλυμα at Bethlehem was the Upper Story of the Caravanserai; and that in that upper story the guests were lodged; while the horses and camels were stabled in the φάτνη below.

This is a very usual arrangement of Khans in Palestine and the East. Cp. Dr. Dorr's Notes of Travel in the East, pp. 202 and 238.

If this was so,—there was something very significant in the humiliation of our Blessed Lord at His Nativity.

The application of the Prophecies Isa. i. 3, Habak. iii. 2, to our Lord as lying in the φάτνη "inter bovem et asinum," is an ancient witness to the fact of our Lord's birth in the stable; as is also the record in the Apocryphal Book Historia de Infantia, &c. ed. Thilo, pp. 381—384, where see an interesting note by the learned Editor.

8. ποιμένες ἦσαν—τῆς νυκτός] there were shepherds abiding in the fields by night. Hence it has been inferred by some, that our Lord was not born in the month of December. See the Gemara Nedar 63 concerning the seventeenth day of the month of November: "Pluvia prima descendit; tunc armenta redibant domum; nec pastores in tuguriis amplius habitabant in agris." Clement Alexand. (Strom. i. p. 340) relates that in his age (the third Century) some regarded the twentieth of May, others the twentieth of April, as the birthday of Christ. The twenty-fifth of December was observed as such first in the west in the fourth century. Leo Mag. Serm. xxi. c. 6. Chrys. v. p. 511, Orat. 62. Sulp. Sever. Hist. Sacr. ii. 27. Bp. Pearson's Minor Works, ed. Churton, ii. 153, "Christ's Birth not mistimed." See above on Matt. ii. 1. Cp. Lardner's Works, i. pp. 370. 372, who places the day of the birth in the autumn about Oct. 1. And there seem to be some probable grounds for the opinion that our Lord's Nativity may have coincided in time with the Feast of Tabernacles, which was in the autumn. See below on John i. 14; vii. 2.

On the year of the Nativity, see on Matt. ii. 20.

It may be here observed that after the most elaborate researches of learned men, some uncertainty still prevails (cp. Clin-ton, F. H. iii. pp. 256—260), and probably will always prevail, with regard to the following points:

The year of our Lord's Birth;

The time of year of His Birth; and

The duration of His Ministry.

Perhaps the Holy Spirit may have concealed these things from the wise and prudent, in order to teach them humility; to remind them at the very outset of the Gospel that their knowledge is very limited; that their powers of discovering even historical truths are feeble; and to make them more meek and docile with regard to supernatural verities, and doctrinal revelations; and to inspire us with more gratitude for that degree of light and knowledge which it has pleased Him to impart to the world, concerning what most concerns us to know in order to our everlasting salvation,—viz., the actions, and teaching, and sufferings of Christ; and to remind us that He has been pleased to omit many other particulars which we might desire to know, and which perhaps might have removed some seeming difficulties in the Gospel History which are designed to try our faith.

On the uncertainty with regard to places in the Gospel History, see on i. 39. Matt. iv. 1, and above, v. 39.

9. Κυρίου of the Lord, i. e. Jehovah; for (as Minlert observes in v.) the "LXX sæpissimè usi sunt hac voce Κύριος (à κύρω, sum) pro nomine Dei essentiali ac propriissimo Ἰηϋ (Jehovah), quod ab ἡϋ (fuit)." And it is remarkable that St. Luke uses this word Κύριος in this sense three times here, and vv. 11. 15, in order to prepare us for its true sense as connected with Christ in ii. 26; in a word, to show that Jesus, the Messiah, is no less than Jehovah.

On the application of this divine title "Lord God" (i. e. Jehovah Elohim) to Christ, see Dr. Waterland, Serm. vi. vol. ii. p. 121, who refers to Luke i. 16, 17. 76; iii. 15, compared with Mal. iii. 1, in evidence of this application.

10, 11.] On this text see the Sermons of Bp. Andrewes, i. 64.

11. σωτήρ] a Saviour. It is remarkable that this word is never used by St. Matthew or St. Mark, and only once by St. John (iv. 42). It is frequently employed by St. Paul in his later Epistles, not in his earlier. It is also found five times in the Second Epistle of St. Peter.

It is observable also, that the word σωτηρία, salvation, used by St. Luke (i. 69. 71. 77; xix. 9), and often by St. Paul, is never used by St. Matthew or St. Mark, and only once by St. John (iv. 22).

— Χριστὸς Κύριος] Christ the Lord. See note on v. 9.

The angels of heaven bring the glad tidings—not to the Scribes and Pharisees at Jerusalem—but to Shepherds keeping their flock by night. They announce to them the birth of the Chief Shepherd—the Good Shepherd—who would lay down His Life for His sheep (Chrys., Bede); and while they behold our salvation (by which our nature is exalted above theirs), they rejoice that their number is completed. Greg. 28. Moral. sup. Job, 38.

Here is an evidence at the very beginning of the Gospel, that God hides His "mysteries from the wise and prudent, but reveals them unto babes" (Matt. xi. 25. Luke x. 21); a warning to the Expositor of Scripture, that he cannot understand God's word without humility. Ps. xxv. 8.

12—14.] On this text see the Sermons of Bp. Andrewes, i. p. 196. 215.

13. οὐρανίου] Examples of this use of adjectives with feminine substantives may be seen in Acts xxvi. 19, οὐρανίῃ δαπνασίᾳ. Rev. iv. 3, ἱρὸς—ἴμοιος. Winer, p. 64. Cp. 1 Tim. ii. 8. James i. 26.

— αἰνούντων τὸν Θεόν] praising God. If we would do God's will on earth as the Angels do in heaven, we must praise Him when He exalts others above ourselves, as the Heavenly Host praised Him when Human Nature was exalted above that of Angels, by its union with the Divine Nature in Christ. (Heb. ii. 16.)

On this text see Mede, Disc. xxiv. pp. 89—96. And on the Historic Reality of the Angelic appearances in the Gospel Dispensation, see Dr. Mill's Dissertation, ii. 54—72.

14. δόξα—εἰρήνη—εὐδοκία] In Christ's Incarnation, there is Glory to God in the highest, for His infinite love and mercy in providing a Saviour for lost mankind, who receive pardon through Him, and are delivered from eternal death, and are restored to God's favour and to hope of eternal glory, in Christ. There is also Peace upon Earth; Peace between God and Man, and Peace between Man and Angels, and Peace between Man and Man (see below on Eph. ii. 14—17), and Peace between Man and his own Conscience. See Cyril here, p. 17. There is also Good Will on God's part toward Men: there is εὐδοκία, acquiescence in them, and favour toward them summed up in Christ, Who has taken their nature, and in Whom they are now seen incorporated, and thus are accepted in the Beloved Son (Eph. i. 6), in Whom the Father is well pleased, εὐδόκησεν (Matt. iii. 17; xii. 18; xvii. 5).

Some few MSS. (e. g. A, D) read εὐδοκίας, i. e. Peace is proclaimed to men of εὐδοκία (Origen, who however reads εὐδοκία, c. Celsum, i. p. 46. Mede, p. 93); for there is no peace to the wicked. (Bede.) Valck. interprets it 'homines beneplaciti,'—i. e. in whom God is well pleased.

But the other reading and interpretation are to be preferred. 15. οἱ ἄνθρωποι οἱ ποιμένες] The men, the shepherds. The Angels returned into heaven, having made this glorious revelation, displaying the exaltation of man's nature above their own to men, and, among men, to shepherds. What condescension on God's part! what love on the part of Angels to men!

— δὴ] = agedum; "δὴ sæpè est impellentis." (Valck.)

— ῥῆμα] the thing spoken. See i. 37.

21. ἡμέραι ὀκτὼ] eight days. Why was Circumcision appointed to be on the eighth day? For a type of Jesus our Saviour, who rose from the dead on the eighth day, and has called us by a new name, and has given to us the Circumcision of the Spirit, by which we mortify the old Adam, and put on the new man. (Col. ii. 11.)

On the eighth day Christ was circumcised, and on the eighth day He arose from the dead, and gave us the new or spiritual Circumcision of Baptism, in which we first rise again from the death of sin to newness of life in Him. See Cyril here, p. 21.

The letters of the name Jesus, given on the eighth day, make three eights, 888. See below on xxiv. 1.

— Ἰησοῦς] Jesus. See on Matt. i. 21.

On this text see Bp. Sanderson's Sermons, iii. p. 355.

²² αἱ ἡμέραι] the days of their Purification. Observe αὐτῶν, their. Christ did not disdain to be made "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. viii. 3); and though He was "the Holy One of God," yet He condescended to be circumcised, and to be presented in the Temple, and to be baptized, and to be obedient in all things to the Law for man, and to fulfil all righteousness for us, in our nature, and so to be a propitiation for our sins, as well as to be a perfect ensample of obedience to us. See above on Matt. iii. 15; v. 17.

The rich presented a lamb. Her offering shows her to have been poor (Levit. v. 7; xii. 2—8); and that the Presentation was in all probability before the visit of the Magi, who offered gold. And this is the order of events in the Apocryphal Books of the N. T. See pp. 70. 80. 338, ed. Thilo, and note above on Matt. ii. 11.

See also the excellent remarks of Eusebius (Quæst. ad Marin.), lately published by Mai from the Syriac; Patr. Bibl. iv. p. 279, 280; and cp. ibid. p. 253, where Eusebius shows good reason for supposing that Joseph and Mary returned to Nazareth soon after the Presentation, and thence came back to Bethlehem, where the Wise Men visited them then, not in the stable, but in a house.

There is something in the birds themselves—the doves—characteristic of the love, purity, and meekness of Christ, anointed above His fellows with gifts of the Divine Dove. Cp. Cyriil, and Bede.

On the καθαρισμός, or Purification of Women after Child-birth, as a Divine assertion of man's original sin, see Jerome, adv. Pelagianos, vol. iv. p. 206: "Mulier generat liberos lege naturali, et immunda est; si masculum peperit diebus quadraginta, si feminam diebus octoginta. Accusa Creatorem, cur immundum quidquam nominet quod Ipse condidit."

²³ καθὼς γέγραπται ἐν νόμῳ] as it is written in the Law. A proof that they are in error (i. e. the Marcionites) who say that the God of the New Testament is at variance with the God of the Old, and that the Gospel is contrary to the Law. (Origen.) This is one of the passages which induced Marcion, in epitomizing St. Luke, to reject the first two chapters of this Gospel.

For Homilies on the ὑπαπαντή, or Feast of the Presentation in the Temple, see Amphiloch., p. 23, Methodius, p. 396, and S. Cyriil, p. 133, Mai.

— Συμεὼν] or Σιμεὼν, Hebr. שִׁמְעוֹן (Shimeon), hearing. Gen. xix. 33.

Some suppose that Symeon was father of Gamaliel (Acts v. 34), and son of Hillel. The Rabbis say, "the birth of Jesus of Nazareth was in the days of R. Simeon, son of Hillel." Rosenm.

— δίκαιος καὶ εὐλαβής] i. e. legally reverent and spiritually devout; see i. 6. 75.

With this simple recital (vv. 27—39) compare the ornate account of the Presentation in the Apocryphal Evangelium Infantis, ed. Thilo, p. 71. It may be observed once for all, that these Apocryphal Books are of great value and interest, as confirming the substance of the Gospels, especially of St. Luke, and also as showing, by contrast, what the Evangelical narrative would in all probability have been, if it had been left to human annalists, unassisted by the Spirit of God.

³⁰ τὸ σωτήριον] Something more than τὴν σωτηρίαν: it is used frequently by the LXX for ὡς (yeshu), and ἡ σωτηρία (yeshuah), salutary, and even for the Divine Name of Jehovah Himself. Isa. xxxviii. 11, οὐκ ἔτι μὴ ἴδω τὸ σωτήριον τοῦ Θεοῦ, οὐκ ἔτι μὴ ἴδω τὸ σωτήριον τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ ἐπὶ γῆς, where the original has twice יְיָ, i. e. Jehovah. Cp. Luke iii. 6.

³² φῶς εἰς ἀποκάλυψιν ἐθνῶν] a light to lighten the Gentiles. Observe, that the illumination of the Gentiles is mentioned before the glory of Israel; for when the fulness of the Gentiles shall have come in, then all Israel shall be saved. Rom. xi. 26. (Bede.)

This Song of Symeon, in the Temple at Jerusalem, declaring the glad tidings of the illumination of the Gentiles is aptly recorded by St. Luke, who wrote specially for the edification and comfort of the Gentile World; and who may fitly be called the Evangelist, as his fellow-traveller, St. Paul, was the Apostle, of the Gentiles. Cp. below, iv. 17—28, where the first Sermon recorded by St. Luke as preached by Christ Himself in a Jewish Synagogue, contains a similar announcement of grace to the Gentile world; and there He is rejected by Jews, even in His own city—a prelude to what would follow on a larger scale.

³⁴ εἶπε πρὸς Μαριὰμ] he said to Mary. It seems that Symeon was directed by the Spirit to address her as the parent of Jesus, and as hereafter to be present at his death; which Joseph was not.

— οὗτος κείται] this Child lieth (κείται, as a stone) for the falling, and also for the rising, of many in Israel. To those who reject Him He will be a stumbling-stone and rock of offence

(Isa. liii. 4. 1 Cor. i. 23. Rom. ix. 32, 33. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8); to others who believe in Him and obey Him He will be the foundation-stone of Zion, elect, precious. (Isa. xxviii. 16. 1 Pet. ii. 6.) He will grind the former to powder (Dan. ii. 34, 35. Matt. xxi. 44. Luke xx. 18); the latter will build safely upon Him as the chief Stone of the corner. (Ps. cxviii. 22. Matt. xxi. 42. Acts iv. 11.) Cp. Cyril here, p. 27.

He is appointed to try men's hearts and tempers, whether they will humbly and carefully examine the truth, and receive it with joy, and bring forth its fruits in their lives; and according to the result of this moral probation, He will be for their weal or woe. (John iii. 19. 2 Cor. ii. 16.) As Greg. Nyssen says (Hom. de occ. Dom.), the fall will be to those who are scandalized by the lowliness of His humanity; the rising will be to those who acknowledge the truth of God's promises in Him, and adore the glory of His Divinity.

Observe also the remarkable word κείραι, he lieth; and see the note below on 1 Cor. iii. 11.

³⁵. ῥομφαία a sword; properly the Thracian framea. This word is used by the LXX for Hebr. chereb, which has the sense of exhausting (particularly by loss of blood), so as to make desolate, as in Ps. xxii. 20. Zech. xiii. 7.

It is applied here prophetically to the Crucifixion of Christ (Origen, Theophyl., Bede, S. Aug. Ep. ad Paulin. 59), by which His blood was shed, and which also pierced her heart, and drained it of its life-blood, and made her childless. The word ῥομφαία here is aptly illustrated by its use in the LXX Version of Zech. xiii. 7, speaking of Christ's death, —ῥομφαία ἐξεγέρθητι ἐπὶ τὸν ποιμένα μου, Awake, O sword, against My Shepherd. (Cyril.)

— ὅπως ἂν ἀποκαλυφθῶσιν in order that different thoughts may be revealed from out of many hearts. For, in and by Christ's sufferings, it was shown what the temper and thoughts of men were. Then Judas despairs, Peter repents, Joseph of Arimathea becomes courageous, Nicodemus comes by day, the centurion confesses, one thief blasphemes the other prays; men faint, and women become strong. Cp. August. Ep. 59.

So it is also with the sufferings of Christ's mystical Body, the Church; they show what men are; whether her friends, or foes.

These words of Symeon, — see also vv. 31, 32, compared with those of Zacharias (i. 77—79), — prove that there were then persons among the Jews who had been enabled by the light of the Holy Ghost in the ancient prophecies, to understand the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, and that He was to suffer as well as to conquer, and to triumph by suffering. Cp. Luke xxii. 26—46.

³⁶. Ἄννα προφῆτις θυγάτηρ Φανουὴλ. Anna, a prophetess, a daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Aser. Ἄννα, from root פָּנָה (chan-nah), gratiosus fuit; Φανουὴλ, from root פָּנָה (panah), vidit, and עֵל (El), Deus; two names very significant of the grace then given to men in the Vision of God; and it is added, that she was ἐκ φυλῆς Ἀσὴρ. Ἀσὴρ is from root אָשַׁר (ashar), beavit; and blessed is the tribe of them who so receive grace, that they may enjoy the Vision of God.

Christ received a witness at His birth, not only from prophets and shepherds, but also from aged and holy men and women. Every age, and both sexes, and the marvels of events, confirm our faith. A Virgin brings forth, the barren becomes a mother, the dumb speaks, Elizabeth prophesies, the wise men adore, the babe leaps in the womb, the widow praises God; Symeon prophesies; she who was wedded prophesies; she who was a Virgin prophesies; and now a Widow prophesies, that all states of life might be there. Ambrose.

The mention of Aser shows how carefully genealogies were kept by the Jews; for Aser was one of the ten tribes which never returned. (2 Kings xvii. 6.) How secret and silent is this fulfilment of the prophecies of Christ's coming to His Temple! The world knew nothing of it. An aged man and woman see and declare it. So it may be with other prophecies already fulfilled, and with others yet to be fulfilled. (Cp. Burgon.)

³⁷. χήρα a widow. Cp. 1 Tim. v. 9.

— οὐκ ἀφίστατο was never absent at the appointed hours of sacrifice and prayer. See this use of πάντοτε and διαπαντός Luke xxiv. 53. John xviii. 20; and see Dan. viii. 11. Heb. xiii. 15. Cp. Dr. Barrow's Sermon on "Praying without Ceasing," ix. 1, pp. 164—169.

³⁸. αὐτῇ ipsa. She too, herself, with her own unassisted strength, aged woman as she was; so that old age was blessed in a woman as well as in a man,—in Anna as well as in Symeon; both were made strong by the Holy Ghost.

³⁹. Ναζαρέθ Nazareth. St. Luke has omitted what he knew to have been already explained by St. Matthew, that our Lord was carried into Egypt for fear of Herod, and at Herod's death (Matt. ii. 22, 23) came to settle at Nazareth; Bede, who thus answers by anticipation the objection that St. Luke's account is at variance with St. Matthew's. It is supplementary to it. St. Matthew states the reason why they did not settle in Judaea, but went to Galilee; and St. Luke explains why they chose Nazareth. All the Gospels were written by one and the same Spirit, and form one Gospel. Cp. on Matt. ii. 22, and note on Acts ix. 23.

⁴⁰. πληρούμενον σοφίας being filled with wisdom. Observe πληρούμενον, the present tense, marking the process of gradual fulfilment, going on in regular order. In proportion as He grew in bodily strength and stature, His Divinity showed its own wisdom. Cyril; see on v. 52.

⁴¹. κατ' ἔτος year by year; they went up from Galilee to Jerusalem for the feasts of the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, according to the Law. See Exod. xxiii. 17. Levit. xxiii. 34. Num. xxix. 12. Deut. xii. 18; xiv. 26; xvi. 1—16. This was obligatory only on males, not on women. But, in her piety, Mary went up with Joseph also; as Hannah, the wife of Elkanah and mother of Samuel the Prophet, 1 Sam. i. 7.

⁴². Καὶ ὅτε ἐγένετο ἑτῶν δώδεκα And when he was twelve years old; at which age the Jewish children were catechumens, and began to practise fasting. (See in Wetstein.)

"Fuisse Judeorum illis temporibus consuetudinem pueros, qui duodecimæ ætatis annum attigissent, ad dies festos concelebrandos Hierosolymam deducendis, haud sine probabilitatibus specie demonstrarunt ad h. l. Lightfoot et Wetstenius, qui idem docuerunt, puerum duodecim annorum ideo vocatum esse חִמְיוֹן בְּנֵי מִצְוָה filium legis, et חִמְיוֹן בְּנֵי מִצְוָה filium præcepti, h. e. ad quem lex divina, præcepta divina pertinerent, qui iis esset instituendus." (Kuin.) See below on v. 46.

S. Augustine (de Consens. Evang. ii. 10) considers the question, How could they go every year to Jerusalem under Archelaus? (cp. Matt. ii. 22), and observes that they might easily escape notice in such a multitude as flocked to the Passover. Besides, doubtless they acted under the Divine direction, and would be divinely protected in obedience to the Law.

Perhaps also this statement refers to the time after the relegation of Archelaus.

46. ἀκούοντα καὶ ἐπερωτῶντα] Not teaching, but hearing. (Origen.) "Non docens, sed interrogans." (Greg. 3, Pastor. 39. Weistein.) Our Blessed Lord submitted to be catechized, according to the order and usage of the Jewish Church. Our Lord now being ἑτῶν δώδεκα, was, according to Jewish language, "a child of the Law," or, "of the precept" (see on v. 42).—i. e. was a Hebrew catechumen. Cp. Rom. ii. 18. 20, and the authorities in the notes to Hooker, V. xviii. Dean Comber's Companion to the Temple, iii. pp. 438—443. St. Luke had already referred to a similar usage in the Christian Church, by applying the word κατηχήθη to Theophilus, i. 4.

The Child Jesus submitting to be catechized by the authorized Teachers of God's Law in God's House, is thus an example to all Christian children, and teaches them to come to be catechized by the Ministers of His Church in the House of God. He also thus teaches Christian Parents to send their children to be catechized by the appointed Teachers of the Christian Law. And He declares the great importance and duty of Catechizing in the Christian Church. And the Holy Spirit of God, by selecting this incident of Christ's childhood for perpetual commemoration in the Gospel, shows the great importance of the practical and doctrinal inferences to be derived from it.

The first Adam was formed a τέλειος ἄνθρωπος, in the full ripeness of manhood. But Christ Jesus, the second Adam, went through infancy, childhood, youth, to manhood, in order that He might sanctify every age (see S. Iren. ii. 39. S. Hippolyt. Philos. p. 333, and be an example to every age.

48. ὁ πατήρ σου] thy Father. This expression, recorded here by the Holy Ghost as used by the Blessed Virgin concerning Joseph, shows that St. Matthew (i. 16) in tracing our Lord's Genealogy through Joseph, did what was authorized, not only by human jurisprudence, but by the Holy Spirit Himself, who sanctions this human law by using the term οἱ γονεῖς αὐτοῦ, His parents, v. 41. Cp. on Matt. i. 1.

S. Gregory points here to Christ as an example of docility to children: "Ille Puer doceri interrogando voluit, Qui per Divinitatis potentiam verbum scientiæ ipsis suis doctoribus ministravit."

49. ἐν τοῖς τοῦ Πατρὸς μου] i. e. πράγμασι, in My Father's business. (Valck.) Cp. Matt. xxii. 21. John iv. 34; xviii. 37. 1 Cor. xiii. 5. 1 Tim. iv. 15.

The other interpretation, 'in My Father's house,' is very ancient, and has much to recommend it. See Grotius and Thilo, Libr. Apocr. N. T. p. 129. 158, and Lobeck ad Phrynich. p. 100, for the phrase. And it seems better to follow our Lord's question, 'How is it that ye sought Me? How came ye to be at a loss where to find Me? Did ye not know that I should be here?' He might have been about His Father's business elsewhere than in the Temple. Cp. Meyer.

Christ says ὁ Πατήρ μου, but teaches us to say Πατήρ ἡμῶν, —showing that God is His Father in a way in which He is not ours. And He often avails Himself of His relation to His earthly Mother, for the purpose of bringing out more clearly His Divine Filiation (see John ii. 4, and note; cp. Matt. x. 37)—His Eternal Generation—from His heavenly Father. He blames her not for seeking her Son, but raises their eyes to Him Whose Eternal Son He is.

51. Ναζαρέθ] Nazareth. He went down to Nazareth, even to despised Nazareth (John i. 46), and was subject unto them. He, by Whom all things were made, Whom the winds and the sea obeyed, was subject even to Joseph! Thus He consecrated Obedience.

Nazareth (literally Branch-town) was so called from its fruitfulness in the branches of trees (see above on Matt. ii. 23), and there He Who was the Branch Who was to grow up out of His place (Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12) was brought up. (See below, Luke iv. 16.) There He was nurtured and reared; there He grew up; there He flourished, Who was the Root out of the Stem of Jesse, and the Branch that grew out of His roots, as Isaiah says (xi. 1); and it is observable, that it was at Nazareth (or the city of Branches) that He showed the truth of that memorable prophecy of Isaiah concerning the Branch, that "the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him" (Isa. xi. 2; cp. Isa. lxi. 1—3), to preach glad tidings unto the meek, that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord.

—ὑποτασσόμενος αὐτοῖς] subject to them. The only acts recorded of Christ's childhood are acts of obedience,—

To God His heavenly Father; and also

To His earthly parents. He thus shows what the special duty of childhood and youth is; and teaches what the true order of obedience is; viz. that the foundation of obedience to man is to be laid in obedience to God (cp. S. Aug. Serm. li. 19); a lesson made more cogent by the particular circumstances of our Lord's relationship to Joseph, which was not one of natural, but of putative filiation; and therefore teaches the duty of obedience to Parents, Natural, Civil, and Ecclesiastical.

Jesus the Son of God was subject to Joseph as well as Mary. "Therefore," says Origen, "let us be subject to all in authority over us." "Si Jesus Filius Mariæ subijcitur Josepho, ego non subijciar Episcopo, qui mihi à Deo ordinatus est pater? Non subijciar Presbytero, qui mihi Domini dignatione præpositus est? Videat unusquisque quòd sæpe melioribus præpositus sit inferior, quòd cum intellexerit dignitate sublimior, non elevabitur superbiâ ex eo quòd major est, sed sciet ita sibi meliorem esse subjectum quomodo et Jesus subiectus fuit Josepho." (Origen.)

This is the last time we hear of Joseph. He was doubtless dead before the Crucifixion (John xix. 26. Acts i. 14), and probably before the commencement of our Lord's ministry. Cp. Matt. xii. 46. 49. Luke viii. 20. John ii. 1—12.

52. προέκοπτε σοφία] He was advancing in wisdom; literally, He was clearing away the obstructions in His way, as a pioneer clearing away timber, &c., to make roads.

On this text see Athanas. (c. Arian. iii. 51 sqq., pp. 475—480), who says that in proportion as the Divinity revealed itself in Him more clearly, so much the more did He increase in favour with men. St. Luke does not say that wisdom (which is perfect in the Logos) increased in Him, but that Jesus (the name He received as man) increased in wisdom. The Logos did not increase, nor was Wisdom Flesh; but Flesh became the Body of Wisdom. It is not said that the Logos increased, but that

III. Jesus increased in wisdom,—the Word made Flesh increased. (Cyril.)

Many of the Fathers (S. Athanas. adv. Arian., S. Ambrose, Cyril, Epiphanius in Ancor.) interpret προέκοπτε as signifying progressive manifestation.

But this explanation of the passage did not satisfy later Theologians. See Maldonat. here, who observes, "De humanā sapientiā omnis est quæstio;" and Bp. Pearson (Art. iii. p. 256), who says, "He whose knowledge did improve together with His years, must have a subject proper for it, which was no other than a human soul. This was the seat of His finite understanding and directed will, distinct from the will of His Father, and consequently of His Divine Nature; as appeareth by that known submission,—'Not My will, but Thine be done.' (Luke xxii. 42.) This was the subject of those affections and passions which so manifestly appeared in Him. 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death.' (Matt. xxvi. 38.) This was it which on the cross, before the departure from the body, He commended to the Father. (Luke xxiii. 46.) And as His death was the separation of this soul from His body, so the life of Christ, as man, did consist in the conjunction and vital union of that soul with the body." Observe also, St. Paul says of Christ (Heb. v. 8),—ἐμαθεν ἀπ' ὧν ἐπαθεν, attributing increase in learning to experience in suffering.

Hence the Apollinarian heresy is confuted, which denies that our Lord had a human soul; and also the Monophysite heresy, which confounds the two natures of Christ into one. See Matt. xxvi. 38 and 41. Hooker, V. lii. and liii. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii. p. 256; Art. iv. p. 293; Art. v. p. 358; and Art. iii. p. 258, ed. Oxford (1820).

CH. III. 1. Ἐν ἔτει] On the birth-year of Christ, see on Matt. ii. 20, and above, ii. 8; and Patrit. de Evang. ii. pp. 416—419; and the Chronol. Synop. prefixed to the Acts of the Apostles. On these verses (1—11) see Greg. M. Homil. in Ev. i. 20, p. 1516.

—Ποντίου Πιλάτου] Pontius Pilate. See Matt. xxvii. 2, and Patrit. de Evang. ii. pp. 420—424.

—Ἡρώδου] Herod Antipas. See Matt. xiv. 1.

For a learned dissertation on these τετραρχίαι, see Patrit. de Evang. ii. pp. 424—439.

—Λυσανίου] Nothing is known of this Lysanias from any other source. Abilene was governed by a Prince of that name, who was slain about 34 B.C. Augustus afterwards (B.C. 23) took possession of the country and distributed it among different parties. (Joseph. Ant. xv. 10.) Agrippa I. received it afterwards as a gift from Claudius. (Joseph. Ant. xix. 5.) Probably the Lysanias of whom St. Luke here speaks was a descendant of the elder Lysanias, and was placed in this tetrarchy by Augustus, and made feudatory to Rome. (Cp. Patrit. de Evang. ii. pp. 433—439.)

St. Luke's accuracy is questioned here (by De Wette, ad loc., and Strauss, Leben J. p. 375), though there is no evidence to be brought against it; a remarkable proof of the inordinate love of doubting with which some of the enemies of the Gospel are possessed; and showing how little value is to be attached to their doubts.

2. ἐπὶ ἀρχιερέως Ἄννα καὶ Καϊάφα] in the time of Annas the High Priest (i. e. in his high priesthood), and in the time of Caiaphas. Elz. has ἀρχιερώων, plural. But the singular ἀρχιερέως is found in the most ancient MSS., A, B, C, D, E, G, H, K, L, M, S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Α, and Lr., and appears to be the true reading.

It is alleged by some (e. g. Meyer, p. 259) that there is an historical error here, because Caiaphas was the High Priest at this time.

But doubtless St. Luke's assertion is a deliberate one; and it is repeated by him Acts iv. 6, where we find Ἄνναν τὸν ἀρχιερέα, καὶ Καϊάφαν.

The solution seems to be this. Annas had been forcibly removed from the High Priesthood by the heathen power of Rome; and Caiaphas, his son-in-law, had now been placed in that office by that power. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2.)

Annas was still alive (John xviii. 13. Acts iv. 6), and was the High Priest de jure; but Caiaphas was, in the eye of the Civil Power, High Priest de facto. This seems to have been the reason, why Jesus, when arrested by the Ecclesiastical power of Jerusalem, was taken to Annas first (John xviii. 13); and it is also recorded that Annas sent him bound to Caiaphas (John xviii. 24, where see note, and on Acts iv. 6), who, as the Roman nominee, delivered Him to the Roman Power to be crucified.

There may be also an allusion to the peculiar tenure, so precarious and irregular, by which Caiaphas held the office, in the words of the Gospel, saying that "he was high priest that same year." (John xi. 51; xviii. 13.) In fact, so great was the confusion with regard to the succession and tenure of the Jewish High Priesthood at this time, that, as Josephus relates (Ant. xx. 10; cp. Euseb. i. 10), there were no less than twenty-eight High Priests from the time of Herod to the destruction of Jerusalem, and only one of these held his office for the legal term,—namely, for life; the rest were removed at will by the arbitrary mandate of human power. Cp. Wetstein, p. 670, and see above on Matt. ii. 4.

St. Luke, therefore, in a spirit of reverence for the Sacred Office,—instituted by God Himself,—of the High Priesthood, which was hereditary and for life, does not acknowledge that the High Priest could be lawfully made and unmade by the Civil Power. He still calls Annas the High Priest. And yet, since Caiaphas was de facto High Priest, and was commonly reputed so to be, he adds his name in the second place to that of Annas. Annas had so much influence, that five of his sons became High Priests (Joseph. Ant. xx. 9. 1), and probably the practice of appointing Sagans, or Deputies, to the High Priest, would facilitate the conjunction of Annas with Caiaphas in the execution of the functions of High Priest. Cp. Lightfoot, Temple Service, chap. v. Works, i. p. 912.

Both Annas and Caiaphas are called High Priests in the Apocryphal Books of the N. T., pp. 500. 530. 532. 605, ed. Thilo.

It appears, that "since Caiaphas was High Priest (de facto), Annas had some special dignity, which could be no other than the chieftom or headship of the family of Aaron,—and for a similar cause Zadok is named before Abiathar." (2 Sam. xv. 29. 35.) Patrit. de Evang. ii. p. 360.

Observe also that this remarkable expression is used by St. Luke at a particular crisis, viz. in connexion with our Lord's Baptism.

He, the true High Priest, was now to be visibly and audibly inaugurated as such by the unction of the Holy Ghost descending upon Him.

At this juncture there was, as St. Luke notes, an unhappy collision between the Civil and Ecclesiastical Power. God and Cæsar were at war; and it must have been a perplexing and distressing question for the faithful Israelite,—To whom is my obedience due? Who is the High Priest?

Christ came from heaven to solve this question. He put an end to all doubts on this matter by rending the Veil at His Crucifixion, when He offered Himself once for all on the Cross; and by ascending into heaven and by entering with His Own blood into the true Holy of Holies.

Hence also the faithful Christian may derive comfort in the worst times. When the Civil and Ecclesiastical Powers, which ought mutually to assist each other, are at variance and conflict with each other, and the devout soul is in trouble, perplexity, and hesitation how to pay allegiance to Cæsar without breach of loyalty to God, then Christ, the true High Priest, will in His own due time intervene to terminate the struggle, by asserting and vindicating His own supremacy.

— ἐτοιμάσατε] prepare ye. The Baptist is represented as doing the work of a spiritual κελευστοποιὸς or Evangelical pioneer, levelling the hills and raising the valleys for the march of the army of the Great King and Conqueror—the Prince of Peace and the Lord of Hosts—whose way he came to prepare in the heart and life of the world.

7—9. Γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν] See Matt. iii. 7, whence these verses are repeated almost verbatim; but St. Luke adds of his own independent knowledge the topics in vv. 10—14, and thus shows that he repeats what he knows to be true, and because he knows it.

8. μὴ ἄρξησθε] begin not. “Omniem excusationis etiam conatum præcidit.” (Beng.) For a similar use of ἀρχομαι, see below, xiii. 26.

11—14. Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ λέγει—ὁμῶν] On the Baptist's Teaching, as here described by the Holy Spirit, it is to be observed, that this godly Preacher adapted his lessons to the several needs of the various classes of society respectively,—the Multitude, the Publicans, the Soldiers. He was like a skilful Physician applying the proper medicine to each particular disease,—a pattern for the Christian Preacher. Cp. Cyril here, p. 36.

14. στρατευόμενοι] Persons then engaged in military occupations—something more than soldiers by profession.

On the lawfulness of the profession of arms, see Bp. Sanderson's Case of a Military Life, vol. v. pp. 104—120. And for the opinions of the Ancient Fathers and practice of primitive Christians, see Grotius here, and the next note but one.

—μηδὲ συκοφαντήσητε] nor accuse any falsely. συκοφαντεῖν is a word derived from Attic law and practice,—and properly describing an information against persons who exported figs, and thence applied to any false or frivolous charge (Aristoph. Av. 1431, and Wetst.)—and is peculiar to St. Luke. See xix. 8.

—ὀψωνίοις] wages. See I Cor. ix. 7. Rom. vi. 23.

He did not say, Cast away your arms, quit the camp; for he knew that soldiers are not homicides, but ministers of law—not avengers of personal injuries, but defenders of the public safety. See S. Aug. c. Faust. xii. 24, where he discusses the question concerning the lawfulness of war. “The desire of injury,” he says, “the savageness of revenge, the lust of power, &c., these are sins which are justly condemned in wars, which are however sometimes undertaken by good men for the sake of punishing the violence of others, either by command of God, or of some lawful human authority.” Cp. Wetstein, p. 674.

16. ἔρχεται δὲ ὁ ἰσχυρότερος] the stronger than I—and than all—is coming. See on Matt. iii. 11. Mark i. 7, 8.

—λῦσαι τὸν ἱμάντα] to loose the thong of his shoes; to do the office of a servant. There may be also a reference to the practice described in Ruth iv. 8; and so, figuratively, he may mean what he says in John iii. 29, that he is not the Bridegroom, and would not rob Him of His own. Cf. Gregor. Hom. 7 in Evang. and Ambrose.

—αὐτός] He—and no other.

17. οὗ τὸ πτύον] Cp. Matt. iii. 12. In His hand is the fan of future judgment, with which He will winnow the chaff from the wheat, i. e. the Evil from the Good, who now lie mingled together on His Floor of the Church on Earth. Observe, the Earth is His Floor. Remark also the frequent repetition of αὐτοῦ, proclaiming the sovereignty of Christ.

19. Ὁ δὲ Ἡρώδης] Here is a remarkable instance of anticipation, not uncommon in St. Luke and in the other Gospels. The Evangelist having spoken of the Baptist's preaching, proceeds immediately to speak of his imprisonment, though probably some months intervened between the two. This serves the purpose of showing that John was ready to suffer for what he taught, and makes his preaching more practical and cogent.

The observation of this principle of anticipation clears up many supposed difficulties in the Gospel. See on Matt. xx. 29.

21, 22.] On this text see the Sermons of Bp. Andrewes, iii. 241.

21. προσευχόμενον] when He was praying. St. Luke alone notes this incident, which calls attention to the reality of our Lord's Human Nature. He also thus teaches the use of prayer for the reception of the Holy Spirit.

St. Luke, the Evangelist of the Gentiles, lays special stress on the solemn duty, and blessed privilege, and happy results, of Prayer. See on v. 16, and above, Introduction, p. 160.

Our Lord was baptized (says S. Ambrose), not to be cleansed by water, but to cleanse it for the washing away of sin in Baptism, and to fulfil all righteousness, i. e. to be an example of obedience to all the dispensations of God.

He came (as it were) to baptize Water for holy uses, and to invite men to a more joyful acceptance of that Baptism which would be instituted by Himself. He condescended in His own Body to prefigure the Church, His Mystical Body (says Chrys. in Caten.), in which they who are baptized receive the Holy Ghost. "Venit Dominus ad lavacrum," says S. Ambrose here, "Omnia pro te factus est. Nemo refugiat lavacrum gratiæ, quando Christus lavacrum poenitentiae non refugit. Nunc consideremus mysterium Trinitatis. Cum baptizatur Filius, Pater se adesse testatur. Adest et Spiritus Sanctus; nunquam potest à se Trinitas separari." Cp. on Matt. iii. 16, 17.

23. αὐτὸς ἦν] Jesus Himself was about thirty years of age when He began His ministry. In the pronoun αὐτὸς (which is emphatic) St. Luke seems to say: Even Jesus, the Son of God—the Divine Priest and Prophet and King—did not put Himself forward to preach before the legal age. How much less should men presume to undertake so arduous an office before they are ripe for it! Cp. Heb. v. 5.

The Evangelist here declares that Jesus Himself was about thirty years old when He began His Ministry. There is a remarkable testimony to this effect in Meilo (Rouilh, R. S. i. 121), of the second century, on the Chronology of our Lord's Life; τὴν θεότητα αὐτοῦ ἐπιστάσαστο διὰ τῶν σημείων ἐν τῇ τριετίᾳ τῇ μετὰ τὸ βάπτισμα, τὴν δὲ ἀνθρωπότητα αὐτοῦ ἐν τοῖς τριάκοντα χρόνοις (thirty years) τοῖς πρὸ τοῦ βαπτίσματος. τριακοντέτης βαπτίζεται, says Greg. Nazian. p. 714. See also Pseudo-Ignat. ad Tertullian. 10, τρεις δεκάδας ἐτῶν πολιτευσάμενος ἐβαπτίσθη . . . καὶ τρεῖς ἑνιαυτοὺς κηρύξας τὸ εὐαγγέλιον . . . ἐπαυσαμένη.

At first sight, the word ἀρχόμενος may seem abrupt when thus used. But it appears to be explained by St. Luke himself Acts i. 1, referring probably to this passage, τὸν μὲν πρῶτον λόγον ἐνομήσαντες περὶ πάντων, ὁ Θεοφίλος, ὃν ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς ποιῶν τε καὶ διδάσκων. And again Acts i. 22, Ἰησοῦς ἀρχάμενος ἀπὸ βαπτίσματος Ἰωάννου.

The reason for this notice seems to be, that it might be known that our Lord did not begin His public ministry till the age prescribed for the Levites (Numb. iv. 3; viii. 24. 1 Chron. xiii. 3), and that He did begin it as soon as He was of that age.

In this, and in other respects, He was typified by Joseph, who was thirty years of age when he stood before Pharaoh. Gen. xli. 46.

Christ was baptized when He was of full age. But let it not be imagined that this is any argument against Infant Baptism. For John's Baptism was not an act of initiation into covenant with God, but a Baptism of Repentance. And Christ was Circumcised when an Infant of eight days old; and Circumcision was to the Law what Baptism is to the Gospel,—the appointed act of initiation of man into covenant with God.

And therefore the example of Christ, circumcised on the eighth day after Birth, is an argument for Infant Baptism.

— ὡς ἐνομίζετο] As he was accounted by law (νόμῳ). See Luke

iv. 22. John vi. 42. This word ἐνομίζετο appears to intimate two things; first, that Jesus was not son of Joseph by Nature; and secondly, that He was son of Joseph by Law. And therefore, although He was the promised seed of the woman, His genealogy is traced through Joseph, who was united to Mary by the Law of Marriage, which God had instituted in Paradise; and He had an hereditary claim to the rights of Joseph, as son of David, and owed him filial obedience. See on Matt. i. 1.

— υἱὸς Ἰωσήφ, τοῦ Ἑλ] On the Genealogies of our Lord, see on Matt. i. 1—16.

St. Luke's design in this Genealogy was probably as follows:—

The Genealogy of our Lord is not inserted in the beginning of this Gospel, as is the case in St. Matthew; but at a later period, when our Lord is described as thirty years of age; and it is inserted in connexion with His Baptism.

St. Matthew descends in his Genealogy from Abraham; St. Luke ascends to God.

Why was this?

St. Luke intends to show that Jesus is the promised Seed of the Woman (Gen. iii. 15. Gal. iv. 4), that He is the Second Adam—the Father of the new race of regenerate humanity—in whom all Nations of the Earth are blessed.

In Him, anointed by the Holy Ghost, the whole Human Race is summed up, and sanctified.

Christ, our Divine Head, is here presented to us as the Author of the new race, which He carries up, as it were, by a retroverted stream of sanctification, turning back the channels of hereditary corruption and original sin, through every successive generation in an ascending series; and leading it up through Adam to God He cleanses it by the divine effluence and effusion of the Holy Ghost.

St. Luke dates our Lord's Genealogy from His Baptism, because in Baptism the old Adam is buried, and the new man is raised up; and the life of Christ in us begins at Baptism. See Origen here, and Eusebius in Mai, Patrum Nova Bibliotheca, iv. pp. 271—277.

The great work of retrogressive and retroactive purification is here connected with the Baptism of Christ. And thus the Holy Spirit has reminded us that our participation in this work of purification is commenced at our Baptism into Christ; that our adoption into the new Generation, by which we are engrafted into Christ, and through Him carried up to God, is effected by Him through the "laver of Regeneration." Tit. iii. 5. Cp. S. Aug. de Cons. Ev. ii. 4, 5.

As St. Paul says (Rom. v. 15), "Not as the offence (in Adam), so the free gift in Christ. For if through the offence of the one Adam, the many (that is, all, cp. v. 18), died, much more the Grace of God, and the Gift by the one man Jesus Christ hath abounded, or overflowed, to the many, i. e. upon all. As by the offence of one judgment came upon all to condemnation, so by the righteousness of One the free gift came upon all men unto Justification."

In addition to the authorities cited on St. Matthew, i. 1—16, the reader may consult the work of Eusebius, lately published by Mai, Quæstion. ad Marin. pp. 219—226.

27. τοῦ Σαλαθιήλ] of Salathiel. See on Matt. i. 12—15. It is most probable that this is the same person as he who is mentioned by St. Matthew, i. 12, and that Zorobabel is the same person as he who is mentioned under that name by St. Matthew. It is true, that between Zorobabel in St. Luke, and Mary, are seventeen generations, and between Zorobabel in St. Matthew, and Joseph, are nine generations. But so between David and Salathiel in St. Luke are twenty generations; and only fourteen in St. Matthew. Cp. next note.

36. τοῦ Καϊνάν] of Cainan. Here is a difficulty.

This name Cainan, as son of Arphaxad, does not occur, in this place, in the original Hebrew of Gen. xi. 12, nor in 1 Chron. i. 24, where Sala is represented as son of Arphaxad.

But it is found in the Septuagint Version in Gen. xi. 13, not in 1 Chron. i. 24.

The name of Cainan appears to be associated with the introduction of idolatry. See Ephraem Syrus in Gen. xviii. Mill on the Genealogies, p. 149.

It is also certain that the Evangelists had access to genealogical materials that we do not possess. See above on Matt. i. 3.

We have seen (Matt. i. 8) that it was the practice of the Hebrews to omit names from their Genealogies, for moral and judicial reasons. Accordingly we find that in St. Matthew's Genealogy several names are passed over in silence.

But this does not appear to be the case in St. Luke's Genealogy. He wrote specially for the Gentiles, and to show that in Christ all nations are blessed. In Him—Who is the Second Adam, the Father of the new Creation—there is pardon and grace freely offered to all; in Him the dead in trespasses and sins are made alive; and they who had been aliens—by idolatry and vice—were made nigh to God in Christ (Gal. iii. 28. Eph. ii. 12, 13); and there is an universal Amnesty in Christ.

Perhaps there may be something significant of this gracious purpose of Universal Reconciliation and Restoration by the Gospel, in the fact, that a name—the name of Cainan, expunged perhaps for moral reasons, viz. for idolatry—from the Hebrew Genealogies, is restored, in Christ, to that of the Gentile World.

On this question, see Walther, Harmon. Biblic. ad Luc. iii. 36. Michaelis, de Chronol. Mosis post diluv. in Comm. Soc. Gotting. 1763. Rus, Harmon. Evang. i. 359. Spanheim, Dubia Evang. xxiii., who, with Beza, would expunge the word. Routh, R. S. ii. 373, observes, that neither Julius Africanus, early in the third century, nor Eusebius in the fourth, seem to have had this second Kainán in their editions of the LXX; and Lord Arthur Hervey, on the Genealogies (pp. 168–203), has endeavoured to show that the name Cainan was first interpolated here in St. Luke, and thence passed into copies of the LXX. But it is found in all the best Manuscripts here, with the single exception of the Codex Bezae, which omits it. Cp. Mill, pp. 144. 147, note.

38. Ἀδὰμ, τοῦ Θεοῦ] Thus the Holy Spirit, writing by St. Luke to the Gentiles, taught them what they, especially the Greeks, much needed to learn, that God had “made of one blood all nations of men,” Acts xvii. 26. Herein, as in many other respects, St. Luke the Evangelist is a fellow-labourer with the Apostle St. Paul. See Introduction, p. 158.

Joseph is not called the Son of Eli literally, any more than Adam was literally the Son of God. (Aug. de Cons. Ev. ii. 3.) Perhaps, also, it may be said that the words ὡς ἐνομίζετο, as He was accounted, in v. 23, may be intended to imply that the Evangelist is giving the genealogy as commonly received. (Cp. Bengel.)

— τοῦ Θεοῦ] of God. “Ex Deo per Christum sunt omnia. Omnia reducuntur per Christum ad Deum.” (Beng.)

CH. IV. 1—13. Ἰησοῦς δέ] On the Temptation see Matt. iv. 1—11.

2. ἡμέρας τεσσαράκοντα] forty days. It is said by some (e.g. Bengel) that this is a “locutio prægnaans,” indicating that He was led into the Wilderness for forty days, where, after they were over (cp. Matt. iv. 3), He was tempted.

But the words of the two Evangelists taken together, seem rather to imply that He was tempted at intervals during the forty days (cp. Mark i. 13), and that at the close of them the Tempter assailed our Lord with the greatest violence.

And this appears to be typical of what is to be looked for in the History of the Church. She is tempted or tried by the Evil One during the whole period of her sojourn (represented by Forty Days, see on Matt. iv. 2), in the Wilderness of this World: but Satan reserves the fiercest trial for the last. See Rev. xii. 12.

4. Γέγραπται] It is written: repeated v. 8; cp. v. 12. Christ is “full of the Holy Ghost,” v. 1, and yet His Rule of Faith and Practice is Holy Scripture;—a fact which may be commended to the consideration of some (Quakers, Methodists, and others) who appear to suppose that inward illumination (or what is fancied to be such) may be a substitute for the written Word.

5. ἔδειξεν αὐτῷ] The last Temptation in St. Matthew (iv. 8), but mentioned here in the second place by St. Luke.

But observe, St. Luke does not say τότε or πάλιν, as St. Matthew does (iv. 5, 8), and therefore there is no discrepancy; but St. Luke places the temptations in an order of his own; perhaps with a reference to the temptation of the first Adam, and to the special trials of the Gentile World. By indulgence we were conquered in Adam, by abstinence we conquer in Christ. (Cyri.)

— τῆς οἰκουμένης] St. Matthew here (iv. 8) has τοῦ κόσμου. — ἐν στιγμῇ χρόνου] in a moment of time. “In momento enim prætereunt.” (Ambrose.)

8. Προσκυνήσεις] Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve. And yet Christ is to be worshipped (Heb. i. 6). How then can Christ be a Creature? How can He be other than God? Let Arians and Socinians be entreated to mark this.

9. Ἱερουσαλὴμ] Jerusalem. St. Matthew, writing for Jews, has τὴν ἁγίαν πόλιν, the Holy City, here, iv. 5.

13. ἄχρι καιροῦ] till a season. “Usque ad opportunum tempus” (Beng.), such as the Agony.

15. αὐτός] “Ipse; non modo per famam.” (Beng.)

16. Ναζαρέθ, οὗ ἦν τεθραμμένος] Nazareth (the city of Branches), where He (who is the BRANCH) had been reared, and where He “crevit utculo velut Arbor ævo.” See above on ii. 5.

— κατὰ τὸ εἰωθὸς αὐτῷ] according to his custom—a strong argument for attendance on Public Worship.

— ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῶν σαββάτων] on the Sabbath Day. On the Synagogue Worship on the Sabbath, see Acts xiii. 14, 15; xv. 21. Joseph. de B. Jud. vii. 3. Vitringa de Synagogâ, Franecq. 1696. Prideaux, Connexion, i. 416—430, ad A.D. 444. Jahn, Arch. S. 344. 397. And on the preparatory uses of the Synagogues for the diffusion of Christianity, see below, Introduction to the Acts of the APOSTLES, p. xvii.

17. ἐπεδόθη] was given in addition, perhaps after the Lesson from the Law. Our Lord appears to have done two things; first, ἀνέστη ἀναγνῶναι, He stood up to read the Lesson of the day; secondly, to have chosen a particular passage (εὐρεῖν τόπον) in the prophecies of Isaiah (Cyril), and to have expounded it, with additions from other places of the same Prophet; e.g. Isa. lxi. 1, 2, with illustrations from xlii. 7, and to have shown the application of these prophecies to Himself. See Surenhus. pp. 339—345.

— ἀναπτύξας] having unrolled the megillah, or volume.

It appears that Isaiah formed a separate roll.

18. ἔχρισέ με] anointed Me—made Me the Messiah, the Anointed One—the Christ. Christ was anointed at the Incarnation by the operation of the Holy Ghost, and was publicly anointed and inaugurated as the Messiah by the descent of the Holy Ghost at His Baptism. See on Matt. iii. 16. Therefore this lesson and exposition were specially appropriate now.

18, 19.] On this text see the Sermon of Bp. Andrewes, iii. 280.

19. ἐνιαυτὸν] the year—typified by the Jubilee, Lev. xxv. 9; which prefigured the Gospel dispensation, the World's release from the Debt of Sin; and the Universal Jubilee proclaimed by Christ.

On the erroneous notion hence derived by some (see Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 147, and Origen de Princ. iv. 5), that our Lord taught only for one year or little more, see the authorities in Gieseler, Ch. Hist. chap. i. note 10. Winer, Lex. i. p. 568. Routh, R. S. i. 121. 146; iv. 364, and above, on iii. 23, where it will be seen that Melito affirmed that our Lord's ministry lasted three years; so also S. Hippolytus, in Dan. § 4. So Euseb. H. E. i. 10. Theodoret, in Dan. ix. S. Hieron. in Dan. ix.

24. δεκτός] acceptable. See on Acts x. 35.

25. ἔτη τρία καὶ μῆνας ἕξ] three years and six months. It is said by some (e.g. Meyer, p. 275) that this is at variance with the date in 1 Kings xviii. 1, “the third year.” But it does not appear that the third year there is dated from the beginning of the famine. The original says, “There were many days; and in the third year—probably after those many days—the word of the Lord came to Elijah.” Why otherwise should the “many days” be mentioned?

The period of three years and a half (half of seven, the sacred number) = 42 months, or 1260 days, had an ominous sound in the ears of an Israelite, being the time of this famine (cp. James v. 17), and of the duration of the desolation of the Temple under Antiochus. Lightfoot, i. p. 620. Harm. N. T. Rev. xi. Joseph. B. J. i. 1. Louth on Dan. xii. 7. Prideaux ad A.D. 168, 165. See Rev. xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5.

26, 27. Ἡλίας—Ἐλισσαίου] The Prophets Elijah and Elisha were types of Christ; and in their special dealings with the widow of Sarepta and Naaman the Syrian, they foreshadowed His relation, not only to Capernaum in contrast with Nazareth, but also to the Gentile world in comparison with the Jews. (Theophyl., Euthym.) See above, ii. 32.

— εἰ μὴ] saving, except. See on Matt. xii. 4. 1 Cor. xiv. 6. Rev. xxi. 27.

29. ὀφρύος] the brow of the hill. Modern Nazareth is not on a hill, as the ancient city was. Cp. Robinson, Palest. iii. 183—200, who says, "The houses stand in the lower part of the slope of the western hill, which rises steep and high above them." Its inhabitants were guilty of rejecting the Son of God, Who vouchsafed to dwell among them, and of endeavouring to cast Him down from "the brow of a hill on which their city was built." They are now debased: a fit emblem of the degradation of those who reject Christ. Cp. the curse pronounced by Him on Capernaum (Matt. xi. 23).

30. διελθὼν διὰ μέσου] he passed through the midst of them and went forth on His way. He allowed them to take Him to the top of the hill—and then escaped. By such acts as these (cp. John viii. 59; x. 31. 39) He has proved that His death was voluntary,—"Quandò vult capitur, quandò vult occiditur,"—and we may add,—"Quandò nolunt inimici, elabitur, et quandò nolunt, occiditur." See Matt. xxvi. 5.

—ἐπορεύετο] He was going His way: while they were eager to cast Him headlong. Observe the imperfect tense.

Here is a remarkable instance of the manner in which the narrative of one Gospel fits in with that of another. St. Luke says here that He went His way, and the next thing we hear of Him is that he came to Capernaum. St. Matthew relates only that He left Nazareth and came to Capernaum (iv. 13). St. Luke supplies the reason why He left His own country, namely, because it had rejected Him.

In His great mercy He offered his own countrymen one more opportunity (Matt. xiii. 54. Mark vi. 1), which was lost.

31. Καφαρναοὺμ πόλιν τ. Γ.] Capernaum, a city of Galilee. A model of speech showing that St. Luke wrote for persons unacquainted with Palestine. So, in i. 26, he speaks of a city of Galilee called Nazareth, and in xxi. 37, the mount called the Mount of Olives; cp. xxii. 1, the feast of unleavened bread, which is called the Passover. See above, Introduction, p. 165.

Marcion began his edition of St. Luke's Gospel at this verse (see Libr. Apocr. N. T. p. 403), and inserted the words ὁ Θεὸς κατήλθεν εἰς Καφαρναοὺμ—a testimony from him to Christ's Divinity, and also an avowal that the earlier chapters of St. Luke (omitted by Marcion) assert the Humanity, which he denied.

Observe, He went and settled at Capernaum, although He foreknew its disobedience (Cyril), x. 15. A lesson to us to preach and propagate the Gospel whatever our hopes of success may be.

33. δαιμονίου] a devil. St. Luke, writing for Gentiles, adds the epithet ἀκαθάρτου, unclean, to δαιμόνιον, which St. Matthew, writing to Jews (for whom it was not necessary), never does. See Townson on the Gospels, p. 185.

—καὶ ἀνέκραξε] See Mark i. 24—28.

34. Ἰησοῦ Ναζαρηνέ] Jesus of Nazareth. There was something of bitter scorn and derision in their application here; for the citizens of Nazareth had just rejected Him, and had attempted to kill Him, iv. 29. Thus in this address of the demoniac there was blasphemy mixed with dread—a fearful picture of the temper of Devils toward "the Holy One of God."

—ὁ Ἅγιος] "He uses the Article," says Athanas. in Caten., "distinguishing Christ from all others; for He is the Holy One, by communion with Whom all who are holy are called holy."

35. Φιμώθητι] literally, Be thou muzzled. "Φιμὸς, i. q. κημὸς, camus (cp. Routh, R. S. iv. 44. 71), capistri genus (a muzzle) quo caballi superbi coerceri solent (Valck. ex Isid.), hinc φιμῶν obturare." See Matt. xxii. 12. Mark i. 25; iv. 39.

Καὶ εὐθέως ἡ λέπρα ἀπῆλθεν ἀπ'

CH. V. 1—11. Ἐγένετο δὲ—αὐτῷ Cp. Matt. iv. 18—22. Mark i. 16—20. Some Expositors suppose that these two latter describe a different action from that in St. Luke; but see Hammond, Lightfoot, and Spanheim, Dubia Evang. p. 337, and Trench on the Miracles, p. 125.

Spanheim's judicious observation here, p. 334, is of general application: "Nihil frequentius quàm quædam prætermitti ab his (i. e. by some of the four Evangelists), suppleri ab aliis, ob fines sæpe dictos, ne vel Scriptores sacri ex compacto scripsisse viderentur, vel Lectores uni ex illis, reliquis spretis, hærent."

—λίμνη] lake. So called by St. Luke alone. All the other Evangelists call it a sea; and never use the word λίμνη, lake, at all.

—εἶδε δύο πλοῖα] He saw two ships. Our Lord evangelizes men by means of their worldly occupations. The Shepherds at Bethlehem, when tending their flocks; the Magi looking at the stars; Matthew at the seat of custom; Simon and Andrew, James and John, at their nets, are called to Christ. (Cp. Theoph. here.) He thus teaches us the duty of labour, and to sanctify our labours by His presence.

—ἐστῶτα] standing still—at anchor. Cp. this use of this verb, Acts ix. 7, and Wetstein here.

—ἀπέπλυναν] they washed them off. Observe ἀπὸ and the aorist, marking by this act of washing that the fishing was over. They cleansed them from weeds, &c.,—and hung them up to dry, till they should be wanted again on the following night. Where human work ends, divine begins.

4. Ἐπανάγαγε] Launch forth from shore back again to the deep now in the day, where during the whole night (the best time for fishing) thou hast caught nothing.

5. Ἐπιστάτα] Master. The Greek word ἐπιστάτης is used by St. Luke six times (v. 5; viii. 24. 45; ix. 33. 49; xvii. 13), and is never used by any other Evangelist. The Hebrew word Rabbi is used for Master by all the other Evangelists, but never so used by St. Luke. See Introduction, p. 165.

—δι' ὅλης τῆς νυκτὸς] through the whole night, during the most favourable time, and during the whole of it. How then can we expect a draught now?

In a figurative sense the words may be applied to the labours of the Church of God during the night of heathen darkness, before the coming of Christ. See Theophyl. and S. Ambrose here: "Ego, Domine, scio quia noxx est quando non imperas—in Verbo Tuo laxabo retia."

6. διεῖρῃγγυτο] was on the point of breaking; "in eo erat ut rumpetur." (Cf. Valck.)

This draught of fishes was not only a Miracle, but (like other of our Lord's Miracles) it was a prophetic parable in action. It foreshadowed the success that would attend the labours of the Apostolical Fishers of Men, in drawing the Net of the Gospel through the Sea of the World, and enclosing the wandering shoals of Heathen Nations within it, so that they might be caught—not for death—but for life eternal (ἐζωγρημένοι),—and though the Net was full, yet it should not be broken.

Compare this miraculous draught with that in John xxi. 6—11, after the Resurrection; and consider them not only as miracles, but prophecies, and precepts, with regard to the Fishers of Men, the Ship of the Church, the Net of the Gospel, the Sea of the World, and the Shore of Eternity.

7. κατένευσαν τ. μετόχοις] they beckoned to their partners in the other ship. A suggestion to Pastors and Churches,—that when they themselves do not suffice for the Evangelical and Missionary work to which they are appointed, they should invite other Pastors and Churches to help them as μέτοχοι (coadjutors) in the labour of Apostolical Fishing. Where a Bishop is disabled by age or infirmity, he ought to be provided with a Coadjutor. All Pastors are μέτοχοι, partners, under one Κύριος, Christ.

They beckoned because of the distance,—or, it may be, in awe,—not venturing to shout aloud in the presence of Christ. Cp. vv. 8 and 9, θάμβος περιέσχεν πάντας.

8. τοῖς γόνασιν] at His knees—for Jesus was sitting in Peter's ship, v. 3.

—Ἐξελθε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ] Depart out of my ship.

10. ἀνθρώπους ἔσῃ (ζωγρῶν] thou shalt be a catcher of men alive. This shall be thy future occupation, to catch men for life eternal, instead of catching fish for death. The saying therefore is more emphatic than if it had been ἀνθρώπους (ζωγρήσεις, thou shalt catch men).

12. πλήρης λέπρας] full of leprosy. A Hellenistic paraphrase of St. Matthew's (viii. 2), and St. Mark's (i. 40) word, λεπρός. On this use of πλήρης as applied to diseases, see Ruhnken ad Timæum, v. ἀνὰ πλεως, p. 30.

On the circumstances of the miracle, see Matt. viii. 2—4.

13. Θέλω, καθαρίσθητι. Καὶ εὐθέως] I will, be thou cleansed. "Nihil medium est inter opus Dei et præceptum, quia præceptum est opus," S. Ambrose, who adds, "Volo dicit, propter Photinum; imperat propter Arium; tangit propter Monichæum;" and thus by a single act He confutes heresies yet unborn. And further: "Lex tangi leprosos prohibet, sed, qui Dominus Legis est, Legem facit; tetigit ergo, ut probaret quia subjectus non erat Legi—et ut lepra tactu fugaretur, quæ solebat contaminare tan- gentem." (Ambrose.) And yet our Lord sent the Leper to the Priest; because, though as God He had just showed Himself above the Law; yet as Man He came to fulfil the Law.

14. ἀλλὰ ἀπελθὼν δεῖξον] but go, and show thyself to the Priest. On this change of the oratio indirecta, to the oratio recta, which gives greater liveliness to the narrative, see Acts i. 4.

On the reason of this command, see above, Matt. viii. 3, 4.

16. προσευχόμενος] praying. This notice of our Lord's praying is peculiar to St. Luke. A similar act is noticed in his narrative of our Lord's Baptism (iii. 21), and before His choice of His Apostles (vi. 12; cp. ix. 18), and at His Transfiguration, ix. 28, 29. His prayer for His murderers (xxiii. 34), and His dying prayer (xxiii. 46), are recorded only by this Evangelist.

The Jews had frequent exhortations to Prayer in their Scriptures and Religious Services. The Gentiles, for whom St. Luke's Gospel was designed, needed special instruction in the duty and benefits of Prayer. Accordingly, this subject occupies a prominent place in his Gospel. His is eminently the Gospel of Prayer. The admonition to pray always (xviii. 1) is repeated (xxi. 36). Two Parables (xi. 5; xviii. 2) which show the success of frequent and fervent prayer are found only in this Gospel. Cp. Townson on the Gospels, p. 191, and above, Introduction, p. 160.

For an answer to the Nestorian objection that unless there had been a double personality in Christ, it would have been unworthy of Him to pray, see S. Cyril here, p. 95.

18. παραλελυμένος] one paralyzed. Both St. Matthew and St. Mark have the word παρλυτικόν, which is never used by St.

Luke; and the other Evangelists never use the word παραλελυμένος.

St. Luke here also uses the classical word κλινιδιον, couch (v. 19. 24), which is not found in any other Gospel. Cp. Wetstein, p. 637.

19. ποίας] rightly edited, instead of διὰ ποίας; ποίας marks place. Kühner, Gr. Gr. ii. 177. Æschyl. Ag. 1054, ἐστίας μεσομφάλου ἐστήκε. Soph. Elect. 900. Hence the adverbs of place, οὐ, ποῦ, ἀλλαχοῦ, οὐδαμοῦ. They did not find an entrance (εἰσόδος), much less a transit, a δίοδος. Cp. the use of the word ἐκείνης below, xix. 4.

— δῶμα] roof, or flat housetop; used in this sense for the Hebr. גג (gog) by the LXX. Jos. ii. 6. 8, and passim, cp. Luke xii. 3; xvii. 31. Acts x. 9.

— διὰ τῶν κεράμων] See Mark ii. 4.

21—26. Καὶ ἥρξαντο] See on Matt. ix. 3—8.

21. Τίς—βλασφημίας] An iambic verse; see v. 39. Cp. Winer, p. 564.

27. Λευὴν] Levi. See Matt. ix. 9.

29—39. Καὶ ἐποίησε] See Mark ii. 15—22.

30. αὐτῶν] of them—among them—the Capernaïtes. They among them who were Scribes and Pharisees murmured; i. e. those who ought to have taught others to see the truth were most blind. As to this use of αὐτῶν, see Matt. xiv. 14. (Scholeff.)

³⁵ Ἐλεύσονται δὲ ἡμέραι καί] καὶ is emphatic; imo. The days will come, even, when the Bridegroom shall have been taken away from them.

³⁹ οὐδεὶς πιὼν παλαιόν] An iambic verse. Cp. v. 21.

We have seen that our Lord condescended to adopt parables, proverbs, and prayers current among the Hebrews. Matt. vi. 9. 34; vii. 2, 3; xiii. 52. Perhaps He here adopted, in substance, a proverb current among the Heathens, of which St. Luke has given the Greek form, more easily remembered and circulated, on account of its metrical structure. Even in Heaven Christ deigned to use a Gentile Proverb. See on Acts xxvi. 14. Compare St. Paul's quotations from heathen writers (Acts xvii. 28. 1 Cor. xv. 33. Tit. i. 12). See also 2 Pet. ii. 22, and what is said of Moses, Acts vii. 22.

Perhaps our Blessed Lord and His Apostles may have designed to remind us by such adoptions of Truth, that of all Truth, wherever found, in every age and country, He is the Author. Cp. John i. 9.

"There is no kind of knowledge whereby any part of Truth is seen, but we justly account it precious . . . to detract from the dignity thereof were to injure even God Himself, Who, being that Light which none can approach unto, hath sent out these lights whereof we are capable, even so many sparkles resembling the bright fountain from which they arise." Hooker, E. P. II. i. and II. iv. and III. viii. 9.

CH. VI. 1. ἐν σαββάτῳ δευτεροπρώτῳ] This particular Sabbath is specified by St. Luke alone.

The ancient Expositors differ much in their opinions as to what this Sabbath was. See a summary of them in à Lapide, who thinks that it was the Pentecostal Sabbath; and so Maltonat. in Matt. xii. 1. And this is a probable opinion. It is grounded on the supposition that there were certain πρῶτα σάββατα, or principal Sabbaths; that the Paschal Sabbath (i. e. the Sabbath next after the 14th of Nisan) was the first of these first Sabbaths, or πρωτό-πρωτον (see John xix. 31), and that the Pentecostal was the second of these first Sabbaths, or δευτερό-πρωτον. And this opinion is confirmed by Valckenaer, and it seems most consistent with the rules of grammatical Analogy, to interpret δευτερόπρωτον second-first, intimating that there were other first or chief sabbaths. The word πρῶτος often signifies principal: see on ii. 2; xv. 22; xix. 47. Acts xiii. 50. And so δευτεροδεκάτη, the second-tenth, in Jerome, on Ezek. xlv., and cp. Winer, G. G. p. 91.

This sabbath was a chief sabbath; and so the inferences from our Lord's teaching here are stronger than if it had been only an ordinary sabbath. There may be also something significant in the fact, that the Law concerning the Sabbath which our Lord now explains, was given at this Pentecostal season by Himself, Who is the Lord of the Sabbath. Exod. xix. 1—3.

Another opinion^a is, that this σάββατον δευτερόπρωτον was the first Sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread. See Scaliger, de emend. temp. p. 557. Cusaubon, Exc. Bar. p. 272. Lightfoot on Matt. xii. 1. Jahn, Arch. S. 347. The second day of the Paschal week was distinguished by the waving of the first ripe sheaf of barley by the Priest before the Lord, to consecrate the harvest. See Levit. xxiii. 10—12 (where the Sabbath is the first day of unleavened bread, or 15th of Nisan. See Ainsworth on Levit. i. c.). 1 Cor. xv. 20. Rom. xi. 16. And the Sabbath here mentioned by St. Luke was, according to this opinion, the first Sabbath after that second day, i. e. the first Sabbath after the 16th of Nisan.

If this be so, then the corn which the disciples ate was barley (the wheat not being then ripe), an incidental evidence of their hunger; and therefore the particular Sabbath may have been mentioned here.

On the circumstances here related, see on Matt. xii. 1—8, and Mark ii. 23—28.

3. ὁπότε] The only place where this word occurs in New Test. (Meyer.)

6. Ἐγένετο] On the incidents here (vv. 6—12), see on Matt. xii. 9—14, and cp. Mark iii. 1—6.

Ὁ δὲ ἀναστὰς ἔσθη. ⁹ Εἶπεν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς πρὸς αὐτοὺς, Ἐπερωτήσω ὑμᾶς τι· ἔξεστι τοῖς σάββασιν ἀγαθοποιῆσαι, ἢ κακοποιῆσαι; ψυχὴν σῶσαι, ἢ ἀποκτεῖναι; ¹⁰ Καὶ περιβλεψάμενος πάντας αὐτοὺς εἶπεν αὐτῷ, Ἐκτεινον τὴν χεῖρά σου· ὁ δὲ ἐποίησεν· καὶ ἀποκατεστάθη ἡ χεὶρ αὐτοῦ ὡς ἡ ἄλλη. ¹¹ Αὐτοὶ δὲ ἐπλήσθησαν ἀνοίας, καὶ διελάλουν πρὸς ἀλλήλους τί ἂν ποιήσειαν τῷ Ἰησοῦ.

12. προσεύξασθαι] to pray. See above on v. 16.
— ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ] in prayer to God. Some have supposed that our Lord spent the night in a proseucha, or oratory. See Hammond and Mede, Works, p. 67, Bk. I. Disc. xviii. But the article prefixed to προσευχῇ, and the adjunct τοῦ Θεοῦ, seem to forbid this supposition. The Genitive is genitivus objecti, as ἀγάπη Θεοῦ, 1 John ii. 5. πίστις Ἰησοῦ, Gal. iii. 22. εὐεργεσία ἀνθρώπου, Acts iv. 9. ἐξουσία πνευμάτων, Matt. x. 1. Cp. Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 167. 212.

Christ spent the night in prayer before He chose His Apostles and preached His Sermon on the Mount. He thus instructs us by His example not to commence any important undertaking, especially in spiritual matters, such as Ordination, Preaching, &c., without Prayer to God for His blessing on the Work. "Orat Dominus, non ut pro Se obsecret, sed ut pro me impetret. Obedientiæ Magister ad præcepta virtutis Suae informat exemplo" (Ambrose, and see Cyril here, p. 188, Mai). "Aperuit os Suum (see St. Matt. v. 2). Aperi os tuum, sed prius, ut aperiat, implora." Cp. Augustine's Precept to the Christian Preacher, "Antè sit orator quam dictor; prius oret quàm dicat, ut verè orator dici mereatur."

13. ἀποστόλους ὠνόμασε] He named Apostles. See on Matt. x. 2. Ἀπόστολος is more than a messenger; it is also a representative of the sender, see Kuin. "Ἀποστόλους, legatos et voluntatis suæ interpretes, Hebr. מַלְאָכָי, vid. Schoettgenius ad h. l. Ita מַלְאָכָי de nuntio, vices mittentis gerente legitur 1 Regg. xiv. 6, ubi οἱ δ. habent ἀπόστολος, quo eodem vocabulo Aquila expressit Hebr. nomen מַלְאָכָי Ies. xviii. 2, quod Alexandrini vertere solent πρέσβυς."

Observe that our Lord chose Galileans to be His Apostles, and thus fulfilled the prophecy, "There is little Benjamin their ruler" (cp. on Acts ix. 1. 1 Cor. xv. 8), the Princes of Judah their counsel; the Princes of Zebulon and the Princes of Nephthali. (Cyril.)

15. Ματθαῖον] Matthew. Eusebius (Theophan. p. 323, ed. Lee) remarks on St. Luke's reverence here shown for his brother Evangelist the Apostle St. Matthew, in not calling him a publican, and in placing him before St. Thomas; and on St. Matthew's humility in recording his former profession, and putting himself after St. Thomas. (Matt. x. 3.) The same observation applies to St. Mark, iii. 16. Here is an evidence of the genuineness of St. Matthew's Gospel.

— Ζηλωτὴν] The same as Hebr. קנאניתן, see on Matt. x. 4.

16. Ἰούδαν Ἰακώβου] Jude (the brother) of James. See on Acts i. 13. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, and brother of Jude, was probably better known at the time when, and to those persons for whom, St. Luke wrote, than Alphæus, or Cleophas, the father of James and Jude (Matt. x. 3); thence the reference to the brother, and not to the father. Cp. Winer, p. 171.

17. ἐπὶ τόπου πεδινῷ] on a level place on the ὄρος, or mountain. See further on Matt. v. 1. The use of a genitive rather than a dative after ἐπὶ, may be intended to mark that the place itself was elevated. Cp. Luke iv. 29; xxii. 30. Acts xx. 9. Such a place is called by the LXX ὄρος πεδινόν, Isa. xiii. 2, an exact description of our Lord's position here. It is remarkable that Isaiah's words are, in the LXX, ἐπ' ὄρους πεδινῷ ἄρατε σημεῖον. Assuredly our Lord did lift up a standard on such a lofty plain when He preached His Sermon on the Mount. Cp. below, on vv. 20, 21.

The occasion on which the Discourse here given by St. Luke was delivered, appears to be the same as that described in St. Matthew when the Sermon on the Mount was preached;

For, St. Mark (iii. 13—19) relates that our Lord went up to a Mountain, and there called the Twelve;

And after the delivery of the Sermon on the Mount, our Lord is described by St. Matthew (viii. 5—13) as going into Capernaum, and healing the Centurion's servant.

The order of events is the same here: see vii. 1—10.

St. Matthew says (vii. 28, 29), that when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people (οἱ ὄχλοι) were astonished at His doctrine (cp. viii. 1); and St. Luke says (vi. 17), the company of His disciples were there, and a great multitude of people which came to hear Him; and (vii. 1) "when He had ended all these sayings, in the audience of the people."

The Discourses in Matthew (v. vi. and vii.) and Luke (vi. 20—49) closely resemble each other; and the points of difference, consisting mainly of omissions on one side or the other, may be easily accounted for, as follows;

St. Matthew was writing specially for Hebrew readers, and therefore he records all the portions of our Lord's Discourse in which the Teaching of the Levitical Law, or the practice of its Jewish Expositors, is explained, enlarged, or corrected by the Gospel (see Matt. v. 17—38). These passages—less applicable to the Gentile world—are not repeated by St. Luke. So again in St. Matthew's report, our Lord corrects the Jewish notions on Almsgiving, Prayer, and Fasting (vi. 1—19); which cautions, probably for a like reason, are not reiterated by St. Luke.

The residue of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. vii.) being of a general character, applicable alike to Jews and Gentiles, is repeated with some additions by St. Luke here (vi. 31. 37—49), or elsewhere (Luke xi. 9—13, comp. with Matt. vii. 7—11, and Luke xiii. 24, comp. with Matt. vii. 13), with the exception of the caution against false teachers in sheep's clothing (Matt. vii. 15).

There is a remarkable difference in the form of the introduction of the two narratives of the Sermon on the Mount. In St. Matthew it has the form of a judicial promulgation of Law; in St. Luke it is a hortatory Address to the World. In St. Matthew it is a Code; in St. Luke, a Homily. In St. Matthew the language is, "Blessed are the poor, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (v. 3); in St. Luke, "Blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God" (vi. 20: cp. Matt. v. 1—10, with Luke vi. 21—26).

So also in the conclusion of the Sermon. In St. Matthew it is, "Not every one that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord" (vii. 21). In St. Luke, "Why call ye Me Lord, Lord" (vi. 46). In St. Matthew, "Whosoever heareth these sayings of Mine, and doeth them, I will liken him" (vii. 24). In St. Luke, "I will show you to whom he is like" (vi. 47).

It is probable that the Holy Spirit in thus presenting the same substantial truth in two various forms, designed to remind the world by St. Matthew, that the same God Who had spoken as a Lawgiver and Judge to his forefathers in Mount Sinai now speaks in the Gospel in the same character, and with the same authority and majesty, to all; and that He intends to show by St. Luke, that He condescends to address the Gentile World in the persuasive language of an Ethical Teacher, and to show the way to attain "the Chief Good," both in time and eternity.

If it be said that Christ could not have used both forms of address at the same time, and that if one recital be correct the other is not so; it may be replied, that the true design of the Holy Gospel is not so much to confine our minds to one set of words, as if they were or could be a full exponent of Christ's meaning, as to declare what was in the mind of Christ.

The Holy Spirit Who inspired the Evangelists knew what was in Christ's mind, and by presenting the same substantial truth with circumstantial varieties and in different points of view, He has given a clearer view of that mind than if He had given one view only. See above, Introduction to the Four Gospels; and Augustine, quoted above on Matt. iii. 11; and here vv. 20, 21.

It is observable that the History of the Sermon, as given in both Evangelists, is prefaced and followed by a narrative of Miracles. They were then worked by Christ, and are here recorded by the Holy Spirit (we may reasonably suppose), in order to give greater force and solemnity to our Lord's Preaching, and to gain reader assent and obedience to it.

This Sermon is like an Epistle from God; the Miracles are its seals, impressed with the Divine Image and Superscription. See further on Matt. vii. 29.

18. ἀπό] Restored, for ὑπό, from the best MSS. It is observable here that these persons resorted to Christ for relief; and this agrees better with ἀπό than with ὑπό; for those who were under the dominion of the Evil One, would rather have fled from Him; whereas these persons were driven from Satan to take refuge in Christ. On the use of ἀπό after a part. pass., see Winer, G. G. p. 332.

19. δύναμις παρ' αὐτοῦ ἐξήρχετο] power was going forth from out of Him. For He was πηγὴ δυνάμεως, the Fountain of Miracles (Theophyl.): the Apostles were only ὄχετοί, or channels.

20, 21. Μακάριοι] Blessed. See on Matt. v. 1—10. After He had chosen His disciples, He ῥηθίλει αὐτοῖς διὰ τῶν μακαρισμῶν καὶ διὰ τῆς διδασκαλίας. (Theoph.) S. Ambrose says, "Quatuor tantum beatitudines sanctus Lucas Dominicus posuit, octo verò sanctus Matthæus; in his octo illæ quatuor sunt, et in istis quatuor illæ octo." S. Ambrose therefore thought that this Sermon in St. Luke was the Sermon on the Mount. See note on v. 17 here, and so S. Cyril, pp. 192, 193. The following remarks on this point are from S. Augustine, de Consensu Evang. ii. 47: "Quamquam etiam illud possit occurrere, in aliquâ excelsiore parte montis primo cum solis discipulis Dominum fuisse, quando ex eis illos duodecim elegit: deinde cum eis descendisse, non de monte, sed de ipsâ montis celsitudine in campestrum locum, id est, in aliquam æqualitatem, quæ in latere montis erat, et multas turbas capere poterat; atque ibi stetisse donec ad eum turbæ congregarentur: ac postea cum sedisset, accessisse propinquiis discipulos ejus, atque ita illis cæterisque turbis præsentibus unum habuisse sermonem quem Matthæus Lucasque narrarunt, diverso narrandi modo, sed eadem veritate rerum et sententiarum, quas ambo dixerunt. Jam enim præmonuimus, quod et nullo præmonente unicuique sponte videndum fuit, si quis prætermittat aliquid quod alias dicat, non esse contrarium; nec si alius alio modo aliquid dicat, dum eadem rerum sententiarumque veritas explicetur: ut quod Matthæus ait, cum autem descendisset de monte, simul etiam de illo campestri loco qui in latere montis esse potuit, intelligatur. Deinde Matthæus de leproso mundato narrat, quod etiam Marcus et Lucas similiter."

22. ἀφορίσωσιν] excommunicate you, for My sake. See John xvi. 2. Hence ἀφορισμός became the ecclesiastical word for excommunication. See Suicer, Thes. i. p. 600. Bingham, XVI. ii. 6; xvii. 1. Here is a prophecy that some would be excommunicated unjustly; and here is comfort for those who suffer under that ban; e. g. for persons who are cut off from communion with a Church which imposes, as terms of communion, Articles of belief not found in Scripture, or contrary to Scripture, and unknown to the Primitive Church.

23. Χάρητε] Restored from the best MSS. for Χαίrete. — κατὰ ταῦτα] in like manner. Elz. has ταῦτα, but ταῦτα seems preferable. Tisch. has τὰ αὐτὰ, with B, D, Q, X.

27, 28. Ἀγαπᾶτε] See on Matt. v. 44. The connexion is,—Ye will be persecuted; but your persecutions are trials of your love. Overcome evil with good. Love your enemies, and your persecutions will be occasions to you of glory.

It is observable that the word χάρις, so often used by St.

35. Πλὴν ἀγαπάτε] But love ye. This corrective word πλὴν seems to remind the reader that this report of the Sermon on the Mount is not a full report, and to refer him for its complement to the words of our Lord in St. Matthew, v. 43. St. Luke writes with a knowledge of St. Matthew's Gospel, and supposes that his reader will refer to it. The One Spirit Who inspired all the Evangelists intends us to regard all the Gospels as interwoven with each other, and forming one harmonious whole.

— δανεί[ετε] lend ye. See on Matt. v. 42, and Prov. xix. 17, "He that hath pity on the poor, lendeth (δανεί[ει, LXX]) unto the Lord;" and see Eccles. xxix. 2.

38. δώσουσιν] they will give. "Hebræi verba activa numero plurali posita pro passivis accipiunt. Vid. Luc. xii. 48, αἰτῆσουσι." Cp. Job vii. 3; xviii. 18. Luke xii. 12. John xv. 6. Rev. xvi. 15. Vorst. de Hebr. p. 577.

— κόλπον] lap. To be understood by reference to the loose raiment worn in the East. It corresponds exactly to the Hebr. כֶּתֶם (cheyk), which is used for the bosom or lap, and the fold of the garment upon it. Ps. xxxv. 13; lxxiv. 11; lxxix. 12. Cp. the Latin sinus. (Wets.)

39, 40. Μήτι δύναται τυφλὸς—ὁ διδάσκαλος αὐτοῦ] Can the blind lead the blind? A warning against the sin of claiming absolute dominion over the faith of others on the one hand; and a warning also against the sin of submitting our conscience and reason to the dictates of any human teacher on the other.

41. Τί δὲ βλέπεις] But why dost thou look at the mote in thy brother's eye? See on Matt. vii. 3. The connexion appears to be,—the Blind cannot lead the blind; therefore thou canst not teach others if thou dost not begin with teaching thyself; thou must cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, in order to see clearly to cast out the mote from thy brother's eye. It is vain for thee to pretend to be a good tree by a show of leaves, if thou dost not bring forth good fruit in thine own life. Thou art then a mere leafy fig-tree, and wilt be withered by Christ. (Matt. xxi. 19.) The blind follower will fall into the ditch of error and of misery as well as the blind leader. Every one who is κατηρτισμένος, thoroughly schooled and disciplined by his Master, will be as his Master. He will be κατηρτισμένος εἰς ἀπώλειαν (Rom. ix. 22) if he blindly follows a blind guide. But he will be ἀρτιος, and "thoroughly furnished to every good work" (2 Tim. iii. 17), if he follows Christ,—the unerring Guide, the true Master (Matt. xxiii. 8—10), the Light of the World.

b Acts 9. 40.

CH. VII. 1. ἐπλήρωσεν εἰς] He filled up all these words into the ears of the people. On this use of εἰς, into, see on Mark i. 39, κηρύσσω εἰς τ. συναγωγὰς. Our ears are like vessels into which Christ's doctrine is poured. It is poured into our hearts through them, and fills them, and their duty is to hold it.

2. Ἐκατοντάρχου] See on Matt. viii. 5—10. St. Luke dwells and enlarges on this history as specially instructive and edifying to Gentile soldiers, who might be led thereby not to despise the conquered race of Israel, nor yet to confound Christ and His religion with the tenets and practices of many of the Jewish Teachers, but to seek for divine truth, and cherish it when found (see vv. 5, 7); and to treat their slaves with brotherly love (v. 2), and to apply the lessons learnt in the discipline of the Camp (vv. 8, 9) to their own spiritual improvement as soldiers of Christ.

3. ἀπέστειλε] St. Matthew says προσῆλθε, i.e. resorted to Jesus, i.e. by his messengers, and by his faith, as the faithful woman is said to touch Christ (Matt. ix. 20. Mark v. 30. Luke viii. 45) because she believed, though she only touched the hem of His garment; whereas the crowd who pressed on Him, but did not believe in Him, did not touch Him.

4. παρέξει] Literally, thou shalt afford this favour. On the middle voice παρέχωμαι, see Titus ii. 7.

5. τὴν συναγωγὴν] the synagogue which we frequent; i.e. he, though a Roman soldier, at his own expense (αὐτὸς) built for our (τῇν) synagogue,—the synagogue in which we worship. There were many synagogues in so large a city as Capernaum. At Jerusalem there were upwards of 400.

St. Luke alone records the words of these Jewish elders; and thus while he repeats the substance of St. Matthew's narrative (viii. 5—13), he shows his own independent knowledge of the facts.

6. μου] emphatic; the roof of me, most unworthy as I am. So C, D, L, M, R, X, Γ, and about thirty-five Cursives. Other MSS. have τὴν στέγην μου.

7. λόγῳ] by a word, without coming in person. Cp. Matt. viii. 8, 16, and the use of λέγων in v. 6.

11. Ναὺν] Nain, Hebr. נַאִין, so called to this day; from נֶאֱמַר (na'ēm), or נֶאֱמַר (na'im), fair. See Lightfoot. Reland, Palest. lib. iii. p. 304. Near Endor and Kison, two leagues from Nazareth; two miles from Capernaum (S. Jerome), and two miles on the south of Mount Tabor. Cf. Wetst. p. 698. Robinson, Palest. iii. p. 469.

11, 12. ὄχλος—πύλη] So that the miracle was done in the sight of numerous spectators. Observe the circumstantial manner in which it is told. The city, the gate, the multitude, the man's age and circumstances, his mother's condition, our Lord's words, the effects on the multitude,—all are specified.

This miracle is recorded only by St. Luke.

S. Augustine observes (Serm. xcvi.), that of the numerous persons raised to life by Christ, three only are mentioned, as specimens, in the Gospels (cp. John xxi. 25); the widow's son (Luke vii. 11), the daughter of Jairus (Matt. ix. 18. Mark v. 42), and Lazarus (John xi. 44); and after remarking that all our Lord's works of mercy to the body have also a spiritual reference to the soul, he proceeds to consider them as illustrations of Christ's divine power and love in raising the soul, dead in trespasses and sins, from every kind of spiritual death; whether the soul be dead, but not yet carried out, like the daughter of Jairus; or dead and carried out, but not buried, like the widow's son; or dead, carried out, and buried, like Lazarus. He who raised Himself from the dead can raise all from the death of sin. Therefore let no one despair.

13. ὁ Κύριος] the Lord. This mode of describing Christ is almost peculiar to St. Luke among the three Synoptical Evangelists. See vii. 31; xi. 39; xii. 42; xvii. 5, 6; xviii. 6; xxii. 31, 61; cp. John iv. 1. It seems to be designed to remind his readers that Jesus was indeed coequal with Him Who in the Septuagint is called Κύριος, i.e. the Lord ἸΗΣΟΥΑΝ; and that He proved by His mighty works, such as that here described, that He claimed with truth so to be. See above, ii. 11.

It may be also a silent evidence that St. Luke's Gospel is later than that of St. Matthew and St. Mark; and that it was written for those who had not seen Christ in the flesh, and habitually regarded Him as the Lord, risen from the dead, and enthroned at God's right hand in heavenly glory as Lord of all. Acts ii. 36, 47; iv. 33; vii. 59; ix. 13; x. 36; xi. 17. When St. Luke wrote, it had probably become common in the Church. He generally employs it, as here, when he is about to relate some mighty work done, or some authoritative saying uttered, by Jesus the Lord.

14. ἥψατο τῆς σοροῦ] He touched the bier, and so raised the dead; in order that we may know that His own Body is the Body of Life (Theophyl.); and that by communion with Him we live.

According to the Levitical law, uncleanness was communicated by touching a Leper, or a Dead Body, but Christ touched both; and with His touch He cleansed the one (Matt. viii. 3) and raised the other, and proved Himself to be above the Law, and to be the Giver of the Law.

— Νεανίσκε, σοὶ λέγω] Young man, I say unto thee arise! Christ is not like Elijah mourning over the son of the widow of Sarepta (1 Kings xvii. 20),—nor as Elisha stretching his own body over the dead (2 Kings iv. 34),—nor as Peter praying over Tabitha (Acts ix. 40),—but He calls those things that are not as though they were (Rom. iv. 17). He speaks to the dead as living, and raises them by His own Divine word,—I say unto thee, Arise. (Titus Bostr.)

19. Σὺ εἶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος] Art Thou the coming One? On the design of this inquiry, and on its circumstances (19—23), see on Matt. xi. 2—6.

21. Ἐν αὐτῇ δὲ τῇ ὥρᾳ] At that very hour. He knew, as God, what John's design was in sending to Him, and He put it into his heart to send at that very time when He Himself was working many miracles, which were the true answer to the question. (Cyril.) S. Basil. Seleuc. p. 180, says ἐργοῖς χαρίζεται τὴν ἀπόκρισιν. He replies by deeds. Believe your own eyes. They will tell you that I am doing the very works which it was prophesied that "He who should come," i. e. the Messiah, should do (see Isa. xxxv. 5), and which are an answer to your question.

22. τυφλοὶ ἀναβλέπουσι] the blind recover their sight, &c. One of the most consolatory reflections produced by these mighty and merciful works of Christ on earth, is the assurance they give that at the great day of Resurrection He will remove all infirmities and blemishes from the bodies of His servants, and clothe them in immortal health, beauty, and glory, so as to be like His own glorious body, once marred on the cross, but raised by Himself from the dead, and now reigning for ever in glory. Cp. Phil. iii. 21.

24. Ἀπελθόντων δέ] On the sense of these verses (24—35) see on Matt. xi. 7—19, and on cp. S. Cyril here, ed. Mai, p. 210.

— κάλαμον ὑπὸ ἀνέμου σαλευόμενον] a reed shaken by the wind. So far from being a reed shaken by the wind of popular opinion, John was a rock, which stood unmoved though beaten by storms of suffering. (See Cyril.)

28. προφήτης] a Prophet. Some MSS. and Editors omit προφήτης; but it appears to be emphatic. There is a contrast between the prophets and those ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, in the kingdom of God,—i. e. those who partake of the full privileges of the Gospel in the Christian Church.

There is also a contrast between γεννητοὶ γυναικῶν, those who are born of women (v. 28), and those who are "born of water and the Spirit" (cp. John i. 13; iii. 5), i. e. members of Christ's Church.

John, by coming after the other Prophets, and by his nearness to Christ, was greater than all the Prophets. "Major Prophetā, quia finis Prophetarum," says S. Ambrose. Yet, by being a prophet and forerunner of Christ, he was less than those who saw the whole Gospel-scheme, of which he had been the Herald and Precursor; as the temple of Zerobabel was more glorious than that of Solomon,—not in itself, for it was less magnificent (Ezra iii. 12), but because Christ would appear in it (Hagg. ii. 7.9). Not therefore that John in himself was less; but that Christ and the Gospel are greater than all. And by comparing them with John, Christ shows the greatness of the privileges which we enjoy. "For," says S. Cyril, pp. 212—214, "although we may be inferior in holiness to some under the Law, whom John represents, yet now, after the Passion, and Resurrection, and Ascension, and Day of Pentecost, we have greater blessings in Christ, being made, through Him, partakers of the Divine Nature; and therefore John confessed that he needed to be baptized of Christ (Matt. iii. 14), and from the days of John the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence (Matt. xi. 12)." Cp. below, x. 23, 24. Matt. xiii. 16, 17. Eph. iii. 5. Heb. xi. 13.

29, 30. καὶ πᾶς—αὐτοῦ] A continuation of the discourse of Christ. The words εἶπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος, inserted in some editions before τίνα οὖν, are not in the best MSS.

29. ἐδικαίωσαν τὸν Θεόν] they justified God. They proclaimed God to be just, holy, and good. The use of the word δικαίωσιν, as employed in the New Testament for to regard as just and holy, to pronounce such, to acquit,—is derived from the Septuagint (see Gen. xxxviii. 26. Deut. xxv. 1. Ps. li. 4. Isa. v. 23, and passim), and is very different from the sense in which it commonly stands in classical authors, where it signifies, when applied to a person, to pronounce sentence upon; and when it refers to a thing, to consider it right. Cp. below, v. 35, with Bengel's note, and the Epistle to the Romans, iii. 26.

30. eis ἑαυτοὺς] towards themselves.
31. Τίνι οὖν ὁμοιώσω] To what then shall I liken? See on Matt. xi. 16—19. After that section St. Matthew recounts our Lord's condemnation of the Galilean cities Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum, in which His mighty works (above described, v. 22) had been wrought.

That censure, conveying a salutary warning to those at Jerusalem and in Palestine, is not repeated by St. Luke, writing for Gentile use.

35. Kaf] And Wisdom was justified by all her children.

The Wisdom of which St. Matthew speaks is, as St. Luke here explains, the Wisdom of God—in the Baptism of John as well as the Mission of Christ.

"Aperuit sanctus Lucas," says S. Ambrose here, "specialibus additis quod quasi generalibus sanctus Matthæus subobscurum reliquerat" (Matt. xi. 19).

36—50. γυνή] St. Luke now proceeds to insert a narrative not found in any other Evangelist, and full of tenderness and encouragement to the Heathen nations, for whose special use his Gospel was designed.

The Gentile world might see a beautiful picture of itself in the Woman that was a sinner, and despised by Simon the Pharisee, but blessed on her repentance by Christ; and might thus be taught to love much, and to present those members of the body (Rom. vi. 13; xii. 1) and faculties of the soul and estate, represented by her hair, her tears, and her ointment, which had been before abused to the service of Sin and Satan, as living sacrifices to Christ.

Her eyes, which once longed after earthly joys, now shed forth penitential tears; her hair, which she once displayed for idle ornament, is now used to wipe the feet of Christ; her lips, which once uttered vain things, now kiss those holy feet; the costly ointment, with which she once perfumed her body, is now offered to God. See Rom. vi. 19, "As ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, so now yield your members servants to righteousness, unto holiness." Cp. S. Amphiloch. pp. 67—85. Gregor. Hom. 33 in Evangelia, quoted below, on v. 47.

S. Ambrose applies this history thus, as a motive to almsgiving and tender love and care for the poor members of Christ: "Expand capillos, sterne ante Christum corporis tui dignitates . . . Accurre ad pedes. Ubique audieris Christi nomen, accurre. Lacrymis confitere delicta . . . si desideras gratiam, caritatem auge, mitte in corpus Jesu fidem resurrectionis, odorem Ecclesie, Caritatis unguentum. Non unguentum mulieris Dominus, sed caritatem probavit. Pecuniam conferas pauperi, ut deferas Christo. Corpus ejus Ecclesia est."

Some ancient Expositors suppose this woman to have been Mary Magdalene, and that she was the same as Mary the sister of Lazarus, who anointed our Lord in the house of Simon of Bethany (Matt. xxvi. 7. Mark xiv. 3. John xii. 3). But the reasons adduced for this supposition (which may be seen in à Lapidè here) are not satisfactory. "Potest non eadem esse," says S. Ambrose here. S. Augustine has a sermon on the subject (Serm. xcix.), and does not connect her with any other person. S. Chrysostom supposes that there were two different women who anointed Christ. Origen, Theophyl., and Euthymius that there were three.

It seems certain that there were at least two, viz. this woman in St. Luke, and Mary of Bethany (John xi. 2; xii. 3), and that the name of the woman here has been purposely concealed by St. Luke from considerations of delicacy, modesty, and tenderness to her. Mary Magdalene is mentioned by name in the next chapter (viii. 2); and if the woman in this chapter had been Mary Magdalene, and if it had been intended that she should be known to be so, some reference, it is probable, would have there been made to this act.

It is to be remembered that the use of unguent (μύρον), especially at feasts, was of common occurrence in the East (Eccl. ix. 8. Cant. i. 3; iv. 10. Amos vi. 6), and that therefore it is probable that our Lord was often anointed. He was anointed at banquets, and for His burial (Matt. xxvi. 12). Women prepared spices and ointments for Him in the tomb (Luke xxiii. 56). Their faith and love was devoutly exercised in anointing the body of Him Who is the Anointed of God.

37. ἐν τῇ πόλει] in the city. Her repentance was as public as her sin.

— ἦν ἀμαρτωλός] Not who was then a sinner, but who had been once a sinner. Cp. λεπρὸς in Matt. xxvi. 6.

On the use of the words ἀμαρτωλὸς and peccatrix, applied to sins of the flesh, see Welst.

S. Aug. says, "Accessit ad Dominum immunda, ut rediret munda" (Serm. xcix.). She had not been pronounced clean—not openly forgiven by Christ. "Accessit confessa, ut rediret professa." (Aug.)

— ἀλάβαστρον μύρου] an alabaster vase of ointment. See above on Mark xiv. 3.

Why did this woman come? In order to show her love for Christ; to testify her sorrow for sin; and to obtain Absolution from Him. Many came to Christ for bodily health. But we do not read of others who came to Him for remission of sin. Thus she was a singular example of faith and love and repentance, and received a special reward. It is a very interesting circumstance, that this woman seems to have come to our Lord immediately after He had uttered the touching and comforting words, "Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and ye shall find rest for your souls." Matt. xi. 28, 29. (Greswell, Harm. p. 92. Burgon.) Perhaps then this act of faith and love was the fruit of that blessed invitation.

See what seems to be a reference to this burden in v. 41. 47.

38. πόδας] His feet—mentioned thrice, to show her humility and reverence. She did not venture to anoint His head.

— τοῖς δάκρυσιν] with her tears. "Lacrymæ, aquarum pretiosissimæ." (Beng.)

— ταῖς ἐπιξ] with her hair. "Passis, ut in luctu." (Beng.)

Our Lord was reclining on a couch at the table, His feet being bare, and the woman came behind Him, and began to bathe His feet with her tears and wipe them with her hair.

The penitent woman stood behind Him; perhaps from a feeling of sorrow and shame she could not bear to confront His Divine Eye, before she had received a declaration of forgiveness, for which she came. Cp. Cyril here, p. 217.

39. Οὗτος εἰ ἦν προφήτης] If this man were a prophet He ἦν προφήτης ἐγίνωσκεν ἂν τίς καὶ ποταπὴ ἡ γυνὴ ἣτις ἄπτεται αὐτοῦ, ὅτι ἁμαρτωλὸς ἐστι.

would have known that she is unclean; and knowing that she is unclean, He would not have suffered Himself to be polluted by her touch. (S. Aug. Sermon. xcix. Cp. Isa. lxxv. 5.)

Christ refutes the supposition of Simon, and proves Himself more than a Prophet; and that He did know who and what manner of person the woman was, by reading Simon's heart, and by replying to his thoughts, and by forgiving the woman's sins.

⁴⁰ ἀποκριθεὶς ὁ Ἰησοῦς] Jesus answered. "Audivit Phariseum cogitantem; ipsum pascentem esuriebat, ipsum sanare cupiebat." (S. Aug. Sermon. xcix.)

— σοί] to thee. Emphatic—to thee, who hast harboured injurious thoughts of Me, I have something to say.

⁴¹ χρεωφειλέται] A, B, D, E, F, G, L, and others have χρεοφειλέται, but see Lobeck, Phryn. p. 691. Winer, p. 43.

⁴³ τὸ πλείον] the greater sum of the two. There is a contrast between the two sums as well as the two debtors.

⁴⁴ εἰσῆλθον σοῦ] σοῦ is emphatic. I came into thy house, and therefore might justly expect marks of hospitable courtesy from thee; and what thou, my host, didst not do for Me, she, a stranger, whom thou condemnest as a sinner, has more than supplied.

— ὕδωρ, κ.τ.λ.] water. Thou hast not shown Me the ordinary tokens of hospitality (see Gen. xviii. 4; xxiv. 32. Judges xix. 21. 1 Sam. xxv. 41), but she has gone far beyond them.

— μοῦ] of Me—thy guest, and yet treated by thee with indifference. Observe the contrast in the position of the pronoun, τὴν κεφαλὴν μου and μοῦ τοὺς πόδας, repeated thrice. So in v. 45, μοι—my face,—contrasted with feet.

⁴⁶ μύρῳ] unguent. More costly than ἔλαιον. There is a contrast between the head and the feet; between oil and ointment; between Simon and the woman; between what was not done by the one, and what was done by the other.

⁴⁷ Οὐ χάριν λέγω σοί] Wherefore I say to thee, her sins have been forgiven.

A debt is something which is not only claimed by the lender, but owned to be due by the borrower. And applied spiritually, as here, it not only represents sin committed, but sin confessed. It betokens deep consciousness, hearty conviction, and humble acknowledgment of sin. And this inward feeling and internal act arises from a lively faith in God's holiness, justice, and mercy. And therefore Christ, Who had read her heart before she entered the house, states the formal cause of the woman's justification by saying, "Thy faith hath saved thee" (v. 50). This faith worked by love (Gal. v. 6); it worked by fervent love to God, Who had been offended. Without such love there can be no true Repentance, and consequently no Forgiveness. And such Love sends the sinner to Christ; and prompts him to acts of deep contrition and self-abasement and reverential affection to Christ, in the hope of receiving a gracious declaration of pardon from His lips.

To apply this to the present case. Simon the Pharisee dwelt in his mind on the woman's sins. But our Lord draws his attention to her sense of her sins, and to her godly sorrow for them. She owed much; but she owns that she owes much, that she is a heavy debtor to God, and she comes to Christ in faith, hope, and love, in order to be relieved of the burden of this heavy debt. See on v. 37.

On the other hand, Simon himself is little conscious of his sins,—he is not conscious that he is a great debtor, and therefore is forgiven little. She feels the greatness of her sins, and the largeness of God's mercy in Christ, and therefore loves much. The other knows little of his own sinfulness, and has little forgiven, and loves little. Her love is love for mercy promised; it is love for pardon already anticipated by faith; it shows itself in acts of love to Christ. Her sins are indeed many (v. 47), but she is forgiven because she is conscious of them, and loved much even before her pardon was pronounced. Therefore her faith hath saved her, and she may depart in peace.

But he who has little forgiven him, is he, who is little sensible of his sins, and of the love of God in pardoning sin (and he cannot have forgiveness without such sense of sin and of God's love),—he loves little; and because he loves little, therefore little is forgiven him.

— αἱ ἁμαρτίαι αὐ. αἱ π.] Observe αἱ repeated,—her sins, which thou sayest are many, and which are many, are forgiven.

— ᾧ δὲ ὀλίγον ἀφίεται, ὀλίγον ἀγαπᾷ] He who has little sense of his debt, and of God's goodness in the work of redemption and grace, loves little. If he "who has little forgiven, loves little," says S. Augustine (Sermon. xcix.), "some one may object, oportet ut multum peccemus,—ut multum debeamus, quod nobis dimitti cupiamus, ut Dimissorem magnorum peccatorum multum diligamus Dictum est hoc à Christo propter Phariseum, qui vel nulla vel pauca se putabat habere peccata O Pharisee, parum diligis, quia parum tibi dimitti suspicaris; non quia parum dimittitur, sed quia parum putas quod dimittitur."

The dative ᾧ may be rendered 'in cujus estimatione.' (See Matth. Gr. Gr. 389.) Soph. Antig. 904, καὶ τοί σ' ἐγὼ ἴμῃσιν τοῖς φρονόσιν εἶ,—i.e. eorum judicio; and we may compare our Lord's saying, "I am not come to call the righteous (i.e. those who think themselves such), but sinners (i.e. those who own themselves such) to repentance." (Matth. ix. 13.)

S. Greg. M. (in Hom. xxxiii.) applies this History to Christ's dealings with the Jews and Gentiles. "Quem namque Phariseus designat de falsâ justitiâ præsumens, nisi Judaicum populum? Quem peccatrix Mulier, sed ad vestigia Domini veniens, et plorans, nisi conversam Gentilitatem designat? Nos ergo, nos illa mulier expressit; si toto corde ad Dominum post peccata redeamus, si ejus pœnitentiæ luctus imitemur . . . Plus pœnitens mulier Dominum pascabat intus, quam Phariseus foris."

⁴⁸ Ἀφένονται σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι] Thy sins have been forgiven thee. A declaration of pardon, already anticipated by faith (see vv. 42. 50). Christ not only gives general assurances of mercy, producing a feeling of faith, hope, and comfort, in the penitent sinner's soul; but He has provided declarations of pardon for the contrite sinner, by the ministry of Absolution, and by the Holy Eucharist, sealing His pardon visibly to individual persons in the sight of others (even such as Simon and his guests, who murmur at Christ's mercy and despise the penitent sinner), and restoring the penitent to the communion of the Church.

50. Ἡ πίστις σου] Thy faith, which anticipated pardon from Me, and brought thee to Me with public signs of penitence and love, hath saved thee. Christ mercifully ascribes to faith those benefits which are due to Himself as the efficient and meritorious Cause, and are apprehended by the hand of Faith as the instrument on our part, by which they are applied.

— εἰς εἰρήνην] in and to peace.

CH. VIII.—Preliminary Note to the Eighth Chapter.

The present Chapter presents a remarkable specimen of that inner connexion of matter, which the reader will observe as a characteristic of St. Luke's Gospel.

The sower goes forth to sow. The seed is the Word. Its reception in the different soils of human hearts is described. The duty of hearing aright, i. e. of receiving and keeping the Word, and of bearing fruit, is inculcated.

The same Word is next described as a Light: Christ Who sowed the seed, lights the candle, and puts it on a candlestick, the candlestick of His Church, and (in a secondary sense) on the candlestick of every Christian soul, that the Light may be seen of men, and may illumine the world.

Here is their probation: by the manner in which we receive the Seed, and use the Light, our future doom will be determined. Next, divine encouragement is given to those who rightly receive the Seed, and use the Light; they are even called "the Mother and Brethren of Christ" (v. 21).

The value of the Seed and the glory of the Light, and the consequent happiness of those who are so much endeared to Christ, by "hearing and doing His Word," is next described. He is no other than God: Omnipresent, Omniscient, Omnipotent, and He must be believed in as such; His Word is the Word of God. It is a weak faith which imagines that Christ must be awakened, in order to still the storm. He sleeps as man, but never slumbers as God. And as God He commands the winds and waves, and they obey Him (vv. 24, 25). This doctrine of His Divine Omnipotence and Omnipresence is further displayed in His dominion over the Devils; and in His refusal of the healed Demoniac's request, who asked permission to remain with Him. He was to learn from Christ's human absence to realize His Divine presence. So we must learn from Christ's personal absence as man, to see Him, and to trust in Him, ever present as God (vv. 38, 39). The weak faith, in this particular, of the Disciples in the storm (v. 24), and of this Demoniac who desired to remain with Christ, and of Jairus who sent for Jesus to come to his house and heal his daughter (v. 41), is contrasted with the stronger belief of the Woman, who is blessed by Him, because she believed that she would be healed by His Divine Power, though she touched but the hem of His garment (vv. 41—48). And thus, though as man He is far removed from our bodily senses,

He teaches us to see Him, as God, with the eye of Faith, and to touch Him with the hand of Faith.

Other similar examples of inner connexion, in St. Luke's narrative, will present themselves to the reader's observation. See xi. 14.

2. δαιμόνια ἐπτά] seven. See below, xi. 26, and on Mary Magdalene, Mark xvi. 9, and Matt. xv. 37.

3. διηκόνουν αὐτῷ] were ministering to Him. This ministration is mentioned here by St. Luke alone: but it is alluded to by St. Mark, xv. 41. Many MSS. (e. g. B, D, F, G, H, K, S, U, V) and Editors have αὐτοῖς here. It may be the true reading; but αὐτῷ, which is also supported by good authority, seems preferable. What was done to His disciples was, in fact, done to Him, and for His sake. Perhaps αὐτῷ may have been altered into αὐτοῖς, because it seems unlikely that He would have need of many (πολλοὶ) to minister to Him. See note on 1 Cor. ix. 5.

In the next chapter (ix. 14—17) the Evangelist relates that our Lord fed five thousand men with five loaves and two fishes. But He never exerted His Divine Power to minister to His own daily needs. He allowed women to minister to Him of their substance. He gave them the blessed privilege of being God's almoners to Him; of being ministerial to the sustenance of that blessed Body and Blood, and to the nourishment of that holy Flesh which redeemed and quickens the world.

He dealt with His Apostles as with Himself. In the next chapter He gives them power to work miracles (ix. 1—3); but He never authorized them to use that miraculous power in providing for themselves. After the Resurrection (when their ministerial duties were in abeyance) they went a fishing (John xxi. 3), and St. Paul worked with his own hands. (Acts xviii. 3; xx. 34. 1 Cor. ix. 12.) "The labourer is worthy of his hire," and "the Lord hath ordained that they who preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel." (Luke x. 7. 1 Cor. ix. 14.) The Teacher's needs are designed to be the trial of the people's love. God has thus offered the People a share in the Pastor's glory. For he that receiveth a Prophet in the name of a Prophet shall receive a Prophet's reward. (Matt. x. 41.)

29. παρήγγελλεν] He was commanding. If He had already commanded, the Evil Spirit would not have had power to remonstrate; and, therefore, this reading, found in most of the uncial MSS., is preferable to παρήγγειλε.

31. τὴν ἄβυσσον] the abyss. Not the Sea of Galilee (as some have supposed), nor yet (as others have thought) Gehenna, or the Lake of fire, which is the place of future torment, prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. xxv. 41); and is distinguished from the abyss, into which the devil is cast by Christ, before he is cast into the Lake of fire, into which he will not be cast till the end of all earthly things. See on Rev. xx. 3. 10, and above on Matt. viii. 29.

* Ἀβυσσος is the word used by the LXX for the Hebr. תְּהוֹם (tehom), or depth (Gen. i. 2. Deut. xxxiii. 13. Job xxviii. 14. Ezek. xxxi. 15); and it seems to describe the place of gloom into which the devils were plunged after their expulsion from heaven, and after the Incarnation and Passion of Christ (cp. 2 Pet. 2 D

But it does not mean the final place of torment to which they will be consigned at the Great Day of Doom.

Concerning the mysterious questions,—where is the present abode of Evil Spirits, and what is their present condition and employment, see notes above on Matt. viii. 29, and below on Eph. ii. 2.

The devils made three requests to Christ:

Not to torment them before the season, πρὸ καιροῦ,—i. e. of future judgment (v. 28). See Matt. viii. 29. Mark v. 7.

Not to send them into the abyss.

To allow them to enter the swine.

33. εἰσῆλθον] The reading of A, B, C, E, G, H, K, L, M, P, R, V, X, and others, is preferable to εἰσῆλθεν, as marking the separate personality of the evil spirits. See on Mark ix. 20.

—ἰατροῖς] on physicians. A remarkable avowal from Luke the physician. Coloss. iv. 14.

The professors of the medical art have sometimes been charged with a reluctance to give credit to the reality of supernatural agency in the spiritual world. Luke, the beloved Physician, whose praise is in the Gospel, is an exemplary instructor to them and to others in this respect. Cp. note on Acts xix. 12, and also on xii. 21, 22, and above, Introduction, p. 160.

45. Τίς ὁ ἀψάμενός μου;—οἱ ὄχλοι συνέχουσιν] Who touched Me?—the crowd throng Thee. The crowd throngs Him; one faithful woman touches Him. The crowd press Him, but touch Him not; they are obtrusive in bodily presence, but absent in spiritual life. Christ is touched by faith. (Ambrose. Gregor. Moral. 3, c. 11.)

A solemn warning to all who crowd on Christ; who use His Name lightly and profanely; who make familiar addresses to Him in (so called) religious hymns; who treat with carelessness and irreverence His Day, His House, His Sacraments, His Ministers; or who read His Holy Scriptures in a carping spirit, handling them as a common book. Although such as these may crowd upon Christ in His Word, with a pressure of earthly labour and learning, they never touch Him. See above on Mark v. 30, and on John xx. 17.

48. ἡ πίστις σου σέσωκέ σε] thy faith hath saved thee. This woman's faith was a lesson to the Ruler of the Synagogue, and to all the Jewish Nation, that it is not the Mosaic Law which justifies and saves,—but Faith in Christ. Cyril. Cp. Gal. ii. 16.

52. ἐκόπτοντο αὐτήν] plangebant. Cp. Aristoph. Lysist. 397, κόπτεσθ' Ἀδωνιν, i. e. beat yourselves in grief for Adonis.

54. κρατήσας τῆς χειρὸς — ἐφώνησε] Our Lord adapted His manner of working miracles to the circumstances of the occasions. He called the four-days dead Lazarus from the grave with a loud voice (John xi. 43, φωνῇ μεγάλῃ ἐκραύησας); but of this youthful maiden it is said, that He took her by the hand and called her, Damsel, arise, and woke her gently from the sleep of death.

— Ἡ παῖς] Compare this with St. Mark's Talitha cumi (v. 41). "Minimè omnium Lucas Hebraica posuit vocabula." (Bengel.)

CH. IX. 1. Συγκαλεσάμενος] See on Matt. x. 2.

3. ῥάβδους] This reading, which is found in A, B, C, E, H, K, S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Δ, appears to be the true reading. C*, D, E*, F, L, M, have ῥάβδον. On the sense see Matt. x. 10.

— μήτε ἀργύριον] silver: according to Greek usage. St. Mark, writing for Roman use, says χαλκόν, as (vi. 8).

7. Ἦκουσε] He heard. See Matt. xiv. 1—12. Mark vi. 14—29. Those two Evangelists insert here an account of John's death, the circumstances of which St. Luke, writing after them, assumes to be well known, and only alludes to them, v. 9.

10. Βηθσαιῖδά] Bethsaida. Not the city of Peter and Andrew (John i. 44) on the western coast of the lake, but the other Bethsaida or Julias (called so by Philip the Tetrarch, from Julia, the daughter of Augustus. Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2), and situated on the northern shore of the Sea of Galilee. St. Luke supposes that his readers will compare the narratives of St. Matthew and St. Mark (Matt. xiv. 22. Mark vi. 45), where there is mention of their crossing back after the miracle to the western Bethsaida. (Matt. xiv. 34. Mark vi. 53. Cp. Robinson's Palestine, iii. p. 238, and on Matt. xiv. 13.)

11. ἐλάλει αὐτοῖς] He was speaking to them. Our Lord combines preaching with miracles, in order to enforce the one by the other; and He feeds the soul while He prepares to refresh the body. See on Matt. viii. 2.

13. Οὐκ εἰσὶν] See Matt. xiv. 17—21. Mark vi. 38.

16. εὐλόγησεν—κατέκλασε—ἐδίδου] Mark the change of tense, He blessed and brake once for all, but continued giving. See on Mark vi. 41.

18. προσευχόμενον] praying. See on v. 16.

— τίνα μὲ λέγουσιν] Whom say they that I am? Observe the position of με here in all the Gospels, showing that the character and office of Christ, and not of Peter, was the scope of the question. See on Matt. xvi. 15—20, and on Mark viii. 27—30.

20. ὁ Πέτρος — Θεοῦ] St. Peter eagerly springs forward (προσηδᾶ) and becomes the mouth of the Apostolic body (στόμα τοῦ χοροῦ, Chrys.); and utters these words full of love, and confesses Jesus to be the Christ, that is, to be the Anointed one, above all Kings, Prophets, and Priests, and to be the Christ of God, or, as St. Matthew says (xvi. 16), the Son of the Living God—the Only-Begotten Word of God. (Cyril, p. 235.)

21. μηδενὶ εἰπεῖν] to tell no man. See Matt. xvi. 20. Mark viii. 30. St. Luke does not repeat here what was not favourable to St. Peter, and had been recorded by St. Peter's friend and scholar St. Mark (viii. 32).

23. καθ' ἡμέραν] daily. This phrase is recorded by St. Luke alone here. Cp. St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 31. “*Duobus modis crux tollitur, cum aut per abstinentiam afficitur corpus, aut per compassionem proximi affligitur animus.*” (Cp. 1 Cor. ix. 27. 2 Cor. xi. 29.) “Perfectus prædicator (Paulus) crucem portabat in corpore et in corde.” Greg. M. Hom. in Ev. xxxii., where is an exposition of vv. 23—27.

24. Ὃς γὰρ ἂν θέλῃ κ.τ.λ.] For whosoever shall desire (i. e. shall make it his main wish) to save his life, shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life for My sake, he shall save it.

27. Λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν] See on Matt. xvi. 28.

— ἀληθῶς] The two other Evangelists have the Hebrew āmēn, which is rarely used by St. Luke. Cp. on v. 5.

— βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ] the Kingdom of God. The Kingdom of which Christ speaks here is His future Kingdom of Glory; of which He was now about to show them a glimpse in the Transfiguration. Cyril, p. 237.

28. Ἐγένετο] See on Matt. xvii. 1. Mark ix. 2.

— ὥσπερ ἡμέραι ὀκτώ] about eight days after. Then the Transfiguration took place. It is observable that manifestations of Glory appear to be connected in Holy Scripture with the Eighth Day. See below, on xxiv. 1.

— τὸ ὄρος] The two other Evangelists have here indefinitely ὄρος ὑψηλόν, another proof that τὸ ὄρος is used by way of contrast with the plain, and not to specify any particular mountain. See on Matt. v. 1.

— προσεύξασθαι] to pray. See above on v. 16.

29. ἐγένετο—τὸ εἶδος—ἕτερον] His countenance was changed—a foreshadowing of the glorious change in the countenance of risen saints; ἀλλαγῆσόμεθα, we shall be changed, says St. Paul. 1 Cor. xv. 51. Phil. iii. 21.

St. Luke seems to have declined the use of μετεμορφώθη (employed by the two other Evangelists here), that he might not awaken in his Greek readers any ideas or feelings connected with the fabulous Metamorphoses of their heathen deities;

“Extat libellus,” says Valck., “Antonini Liberalis inscriptus Metamorphώσεις, historias complexus fabulosas veteres. Multa habet ex Nicandri opere quod inscriptum fuerat ἑτεροιούμενα. Eandem tractavit materiam quam Ovidius qui in admirandum suum poema (Metamorphoses) multa transcripsit ex isthoc opere Nicandri.”

30. ἄνδρες δύο] two men (not angels) appeared, who were Moses and Elias. The other two Evangelists introduce them at once as well known to their readers (Matt. xvii. 3. Mark ix. 4).

31. τὴν ἔξοδον] death. τὸν θάνατον, Theophyl. See Wisdom iii. 2; vii. 6. 2 Pet. i. 15, μετὰ τὴν ἐμὴν ἔξοδον, and S. Irenæus iii. 1, μετὰ τὴν Πέτρον καὶ Παύλον ἔξοδον, Μάρκος ὁ μαθητὴς καὶ ἐρμηνευτὴς Πέτρον, κ.τ.λ. Cp. Valck. here, who interprets ἔξοδος “exitus animæ ex corpore tanquam à carcere liberatæ.”

The death of Christ was thus shown to be the culminating point, to which all the Law and the Prophets tended and aspired as their end. (Cp. S. Ambrose here.) This was therefore their theme, even at His Transfiguration, even in that hour of glory. And thus the Apostles were encouraged to look with hope and faith to what they had contemplated with dismay. See Matt. xvi. 21, 22.

The word Ἐξοδος, Exodus, is happily chosen here, and is very suggestive. Moses (present at the Transfiguration) had described the Literal Exodus from Egypt. And all the things that Moses had there written were τύποι ἡμῶν, figures of us (1 Cor. x. 6—11)—us Christians.

In the word Ἐξοδος, Exodus, as applied to Christ, the Son of God, and Head of the people of Israel (see on Matt. ii. 15), there is a reference to the Exodus, accomplished by His death, by which He delivered us from the spiritual Egypt, the House of Bondage, of Satan, and of Sin; and the redemption of His People by His Blood, the blood of the true Passover, into the glorious liberty of the Sons of God. The death of Christ is the true Exodus of the spiritual Israel. Cp. Bp. Horne in Burgon, p. 234.

32. βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ] weighed down with sleep. Hence it is not improbable that the Transfiguration took place at night. See also v. 37, where the miracle of healing the demoniac is described as having been performed τῇ ἐξῆς ἡμέρᾳ. St. Luke describes it also as having been done κατελθόντων αὐτῶν. (See also Matt. xvii. 14. Mark ix. 14.)

Our Lord's glorified body and His raiment were στίλβοντα λευκὰ ὡς τὸ φῶς ἐξαστράπτοντα (Matt., Mark, Luke). Moses and Elias ὤφθησαν ἐν δόξῃ. The νεφέλη was φωτεινὴ (Matt. xvii. 5). All these objects would be more conspicuous and striking in the darkness and stillness of the night; and a memorial would thus suggest itself of the bright pillar of fire which shone on the people of Israel in the night in the wilderness; and an assurance would thus be given that Christ's glorious presence would be with His Church in the darkness of distress and persecution in her pilgrimage in the world.

As to the connexion of the Transfiguration, in this and other respects, with the Agony, see above, Matt. xvii. 1, and xxvi. 37. 43. — διαγρηγορήσαντες] when they awoke: an incident mentioned to guard against the supposition that this was a vision seen in sleep—a dream: it was seen by them with their eyes opened.

Here also may be a spiritual reference to the fact that the disciples of Christ will be awakened from the sleep of death, and raised from their graves to see Christ in glory. See 1 Thess. iv. 13—16.

37. κατελθόντων] See Matt. xvii. 14.

45. ἠγνόουν τὸ ῥῆμα] they did not understand the thing spoken, because they had preconceived notions of a temporal and triumphant Messiah. See Acts i. 6.

48. Ὁ γὰρ μικρότερος] for he who is the less among you; that is, makes himself less in comparison with the rest. The comparative μικρότερος is contrasted with the comparative μεῖζων in v. 46. Make yourselves less, and you will be made greater. Humility is the road to glory.

50. ὃς γὰρ οὐκ ἐστὶ] See on Mark ix. 40, and what Theophyl. says here, "He who is not against God is on His part; and he who does not gather with God, he is with the Evil One."

— ἡμῶν] ἡμῶν is found in many MSS. (e. g. B, C, D, K, L, M) and Versions. See Mark ix. 40.

Tell me, dost thou forbid one who in Christ's name casts out devils? Has the sting of envy wounded thee? Was it not rather thy duty to reflect that the man was not the worker of these wonders, but the grace of God that was in him wrought them by the power of Christ? Dost thou then forbid one who conquers Satan by Christ? Yes—for "he followeth not us." O blind speech! What, if he be not mentioned with the holy Apostles, yet being crowned with divine grace, he is equally with these adorned with Apostolic power. See 1 Cor. xii. 8. Forbid not therefore him who, in Christ's name, is crushing Satan: for he is not against you. All who love Christ and act to His glory, and in His Name, and in obedience to His word, and who are crowned by His grace are for us; they are on our side. This is the law of the Churches. We honour all such who act thus: for we know that it is Christ Who works in them and by them; and by loving them we honour Him. See Cyril here, p. 250. Cp. on Mark ix. 38—40.

⁵¹ ἀναλήψεως] His Ascension. See Mark xvi. 19. Acts i. 11. 22. 1 Tim. iii. 16. The word ἀνελήφθη had been already prepared for this sense of ascension by the LXX applying it to Elijah (2 Kings ii. 9—11). Our Lord's Agony, Cross, and Passion were at hand. But He looked through them all to His Glorious Ascension; and, as Bengel observes, Ejus sensum imitatur stylus Evangelistæ.

— τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ἐστήριξε] He set fast His face. A Hellenistic expression, derived from the Old Testament. So the LXX, Ezek. xiv. 8. Jer. xxi. 10, ἐστήρικα τὸ πρόσωπόν μου. Cf. 2 Kings xii. 17, ἔταξε τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ἀναβῆναι εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ. And see Vorst. de Hebraism. cap. 39. "I have set my face as a flint," is said of the Messiah preparing Himself with an unflinching courage for suffering (Isa. i. 7); and this seems to be imitated here.

— πορεύομενον] So LXX (2 Sam. xvii. 11), τὸ πρόσωπόν σου πορευόμενον. Probably it was now the time of one of the three great Jewish Festivals, and the Samaritans perceived that our Lord was one of those who were going up to Jerusalem for the feast; and they considered this as a reproach to themselves, who did not go up; and as an act of contempt to their own Temple on Gerizim, where they said men ought to worship, and not at Jerusalem. Cp. Jerome ad Algasiam, p. 194.

^{54—56}] On these verses see the Sermon of Bp. Andrewes, iv. 241.

— Ἰάκωβος] James and John; the sons of Thunder (Mark iii. 17). "Quid mirum filios tonitruī fulgurare voluisse?" (Ambrose.) But our Lord changed their hearts by the light of the Holy Spirit, which cleansed away the dross of human passion, and left the pure ore of divine love, and inflamed them with fervent zeal for the salvation of souls.

— πῦρ] Our Lord wrought miracles on all the elements but Fire—that is reserved for the End. (Bengel.)

— ὡς καὶ Ἡλίας] as also Elias did. 2 Kings i. 10—12. On this and other instances of abuse of "Piorum Exempla," which are no safe rule of conduct, see Bp. Sanderson, Prælect. de Oblig. Conscient. iii. § 10 (vol. iv. p. 50 of his Works), and note below on Gal. ii. 13. Hæc quæ in Scripturis Sanctis legimus non ideò, quia facta credimus, etiam faciendâ credamus, ne violemus præcepta, dum passim sectamur exempla. Aug. de Mendac. cap. 9.

⁵⁵ Οὐκ—ὑμεῖς] ὑμεῖς is emphatic. You who would destroy others know not how evil your own spirit is. A warning to those who endeavour to propagate Christianity by violence;

These Samaritans refused to receive Christ Himself. Yet they were not to be punished by the Apostles themselves with bodily pains and penalties. How much less should Ministers of Christ endeavour to unsheath the sword and use the secular arm against the life of those who refuse to receive what is supposed, perhaps erroneously, by the persecuting party, to be the Religion of Christ! "Religionis non est Religionem cogere." (Tertullian ad Scap. 2.) "Defendenda est non occidendo sed moriendo." (Lactant. Inst. v. 20.)

Romish Divines—who advocate the use of the sword in propagating Christianity, and put that principle into practice in the Inquisition—endeavour to set aside this conclusion by referring to the case of Ananias smitten (as they say) dead by St. Peter (Acts v. 4, 5), and to St. Paul striking Elymas with blindness (Acts xiii. 11). "Usus est Evangelicâ severitate Petrus Ananiam et Sapphiram occidens, usus est Paulus Elymam excæcans." (Maldo-natus.)

But this is an untrue account of the matter, and injurious to the Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul. St. Peter did not kill Ananias, but foretold his death. And St. Paul did not smite Elymas with blindness, but announced to him that the hand of the Lord was upon him (Acts xiii. 11). And thus these Apostles proved their commission to be from God, Who alone could enable them to foresee the future. See on Acts v. 5, and xiii. 11.

The words οὐκ οἴδατε to σῶσαι are absent from many MSS.; but see Alf.

⁵⁸ εἶπεν αὐτῷ] Our Lord read his heart; and his answer is to be interpreted accordingly: from Christ's answer we may conclude, "istum hominem, si sequeretur Christum, sua quæsiturum fuisse, non quæ Jesu Christi. Quid ergo respondit? Vulpes foveas habent, &c. Filius autem hominis non habet ubi caput reclinet. Sed ubi non habet? In fide tuâ. Vulpes habent foveas in corde tuo, dolosus es: volatilia cœli habent nidus in corde tuo: elatus es. Non Me sequeris." S. Aug. Serm. c. 2, and Serm. lxii. 2, who says elsewhere, "Pauci sequuntur Jesum propter Jesum."

⁵⁹ θάψαι τὸν πατέρα] to bury my father. See on Matt. viii. 22, and cp. S. Aug. Serm. lxii. 2, "Pium erat quod volebat facere; sed docuit Magister quid deberet præponere. Volebat enim Christus eum esse Vivi Verbi Prædicatorem ad faciendos victuros. Erant autem alii per quos illa necessitas (i. e. sepeliendi patrem) impleteretur. Infideles cadaver quando sepeliunt, mortui mortuum sepeliunt. Illius corpus animam perdidit, illius anima Deum. Sicut enim vita corporis anima est, sic vita animæ Deus." And again, Serm. c. 2, "Honorandus est pater, sed obediendum est Deo. Amandus est generator, sed præponendus est Creator. Ego ad Evangelium te voco. Mihi necessarius es; majus est hoc

See above, Matt. xxiii. 9, and below, xiv. 26, the best exposition of this saying.

61. πρῶτον δὲ ἐπίτρεψόν μοι ἀποτάξασθαι] but first allow me to bid farewell to those at my home. ἀποτάξασθαι, valedicere, see Mark vi. 46. It often happens, that when a man goes home, and is engaged in bidding farewell to his friends, some among them are found who will draw him off from God to the world. (Theophyl.)

The very wish to consult relatives when God calls, is a disqualification for His service. (Cyril.)

Vocat te Oriens, et tu attendis Occidentem. (Aug.)

Bonum studium, sed majus impedimentum; nam qui paritur studium, derivat affectum; et qui dividit curam, differt profectionem. Ergo prius amanda sunt quæ maxima sunt; ipsis discipulis, cum à Domino mitterentur, neminem in viâ salutare præscriptum est; non quòd benevolentia displiceret officium, sed quòd persequenda devotionis intentio plus placeret. (Ambrose.)

These three incidents appear to have been combined here by the Holy Spirit for the purpose of teaching,

That in designing to follow Christ, we must look only to Christ, and follow Him for His own sake; not for any worldly interest, but at the sacrifice, if need be, of all earthly advantage. Abraham became the friend of God and the father of the faithful by his readiness even to slay his son at God's command. (Cyril.)

That when He calls us, no earthly tie, however dear, may draw us from prompt obedience to the call.

That in offering ourselves to Christ, we must give Him the first place in our affections. He must have the whole heart; and having once put the hand to the plough, in His service, we may not look off from it to any earthly object, however good in itself, if we desire to be fit for the kingdom of God.

Compare Phil. iii. 14, and our Lord's words to the Church, Ps. xlv. 11. The Holy Ghost propounds for our imitation the example of the Apostles, who immediately, as soon as they were called, left all, and followed Christ. Matt. iv. 20. 22. Mark x. 28. Luke v. 28; cp. Gal. i. 15, 16. Christ assures all who do so, that they shall receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting. Mark x. 29, 30. Luke xviii. 29, 30.

62. ἄροτρον] plough. An intimation that the ministerial life is like that of the tiller of the ground. Cp. 1 Cor. iii. 9. The Christian Minister is a Feeder of Sheep; a Dresser of a Vineyard; a Sower; a Master-builder; a Watchman; all these names imply duties requiring diligence, vigilance, and toil.

CH. X. Preliminary Note to the x. xi. xii.—xvii. Chapters.

This and the following Chapters, xi. xii. xiii. xiv. xv. xvi. xvii., contain incidents in a great measure peculiar to St Luke's narrative. These appear to fall in the period of our Lord's Ministry between the Festival of Tabernacles (John vii. 2) in October, and His arrival at Bethany, near Jerusalem, six days before His last Passover. Cp. note on xiii. 4. 6.

Whether in this interval He revisited Galilee is doubtful. The Evangelist has already said that the days of his ἀνάληψις, or going up into heaven, were now being fulfilled (ix. 51), and that He set His face to go to Jerusalem (vv. 52, 53); see also xiii. 22, i. e. He had then prepared Himself with deliberate constancy to suffer. See below, note on xii. 49.

It seems probable that the events here recorded did not take place in Galilee. The words in x. 13, concerning Chorazin, need not have been uttered in Galilee; and even if they were, yet from their material connexion with what precedes, might naturally be introduced by the Evangelist there. On the supposed difficulty in xvii. 11, see note there.

Rather, these incidents seem to have occurred in the northern neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and near the City of Ephraim (John xi. 54), perhaps about twenty miles north of Jerusalem (Robinson's Palestine, ii. 121—125, probably Ephraim of 2 Chron. xiii.

19); and in Peræa, on the east side of Jordan, which He crossed a short time before His last passover in His way to Jericho (the largest city of Judæa next to Jerusalem), where the narrative of St. Luke falls into that of St. Matthew and St. Mark (see on Matt. xix. 1. Mark x. 1. Luke xvii. 11); and thence, on the Saturday before the Crucifixion, to Bethany, where all the four Evangelists meet.

It would seem, that our Lord, in His tenderness and long-suffering to the Jews, concentrated His last efforts upon Judæa, and its neighbouring country Peræa. And, as if His own personal agency and that of His Apostles were not enough, He proceeds now (ch. x.) to ordain the Seventy to preach and work miracles, in every city and place which He was about to visit. See also the affecting apostrophe to Jerusalem at this time. (Luke xiii. 34, 35.)

A theory has been propounded by Schleiermacher ("über die Schriften des Lucas," Berlin, 1817, p. 158), and seems to be approved by Olshausen on ix. 51, and Kuinoel (x. 23; xi. 33; xv. 41), that this portion of St. Luke has been compiled from two fragmentary narratives by some other person, who was not fully informed of the events. De Wette goes further, and says, that in this portion we have an unchronological and unhistorical collection, which is due to the circumstance that St. Luke had met with a good deal of material which he did not arrange elsewhere, and therefore threw together here.

These opinions, which (it is superfluous to say) were unknown to Christian Antiquity, are at variance with St. Luke's assertion (i. 3), παρηκολούθηκόντι ἠνωθεν πᾶσιν ἀκριβῶς. See further on ch. xi. v. 14.

1. ὁ Κύριος] the Lord. See on vii. 13. This expression fitly introduces the Ordination of the Seventy, by the Divine Head of the Κυριακή, or Church, the οἰκία Κυρίου. The Mission of Ministers, is "actus verè dominicus." (Beng.)

The appointment of the Seventy is mentioned by St. Luke alone.

St. Matthew and St. Mark had recorded the designation of the Twelve; and it was reserved for St. Luke to describe, in his Gospel, this extension of the Christian Ministry by the appointment of the Seventy; and to commemorate its still further enlargement by the nomination of the Seven Deacons in the Acts of the Apostles, vi. 1—7. This was an appropriate task to be performed by him who may be called the Evangelist of the Gentile World, and the Historian of the Universal Church.

On these verses (1—9), see an excellent Homily by Greg. M. Hom. in Ev. i. 17, p. 1946, well worthy to be carefully read by every Christian Preacher.

— ἑβδομήκοντα] seventy. Some MSS. here (B, D, M, and others) add δύο, two. But it does not follow that this reading is to be adopted. For the Jews often speak of seventy—a round number—when they mean seventy-two, e.g. in the case of the seventy Interpreters of the Old Testament. The exact number here may have been seventy-two, a multiple of twelve (the number of the tribes); and the number adopted on other occasions. The number seventy was that of the heads of the family of Israel (Gen. xlv. 27), and of the Elders constituted by Moses (Numb. xi. 16, 25, and of the Palm-trees at Elim, Exod. xv. 27. Cyril, p. 246). And the Jews supposed that the languages of the world were seventy, see à Lapide on Gen. xi. 32; or as some say, seventy-two (S. Aug., S. Hieron., Euseb., Bede).

As the Apostles are succeeded by Bishops in the Church, so the Seventy by Presbyters. "We very well know," says Bp. Andrewes to Peter Moulin, "that the Apostles and the seventy-two disciples were two Orders, and these distinct. And this likewise we know, that every where among the Fathers, Bishops and Presbyters are taken to be after their example; that Bishops succeeded the Apostles, and Presbyters the Seventy-two." He then quotes Cyprian, S. Jerome, S. Ambrose.

The original Latin words may be found in Bp. Andrewes, in p. 169 of Opuscula Postuma, published in 1629, and in English, 1647, and the whole correspondence is inserted in the late Dr. Wordsworth's Christian Institutes, iii. 222—267; the passage quoted is in p. 231. See also Bp. Andrewes, in his admirable Sermon on Acts ii. 42, on Worshipping of Imaginations, vol. ii. p. 63.

The Fathers saw the Twelve Apostles, and the Seventy Presbyters typified in the twelve fountains and seventy palm-trees at Elim. Exod. xv. 27. See S. Cyril here, p. 246, ed. Mai, p. 274, Smith. S. Jerome de xlii. Mansionibus (Ep. 127), Mans. vi.: “Nec dubium, quin de xlii. Apostolis sermo sit, de quorum fontibus derivatæ aquæ totius mundi siccitatem rigant. Juxta has aquas lxx creverunt Palmæ, quos et ipsos secundi ordinis intelligimus Preceptores, Luca Evangelista testante (x. 1) xlii fuisse Apostolos et lxx discipulos minoris gradus, quos et brios ante se Dominus præmittebat.”

And Theophylact here says, “Elim means ascent, and in our ascent to the spiritual knowledge of the Gospel we find twelve Wells—the Apostles; and seventy Palm-trees—the Disciples.” The Apostles are Wells, as being fountains of sweet water, flowing from one Divine Source; and the Palm-trees are refreshed and nourished by the water, and bear sweet fruit, and have for leaves and branches the emblems of victory (John xii. 13), even in heaven (Rev. vii. 9).

As to the names of some of the Seventy see Clemens Alex. in Euseb. i. 12.

—ἀπέστειλεν αὐτοὺς ἀνὰ δύο] He sent them forth two and two, to be examples, witnesses, supports and stimulants to each other (Origen, Theoph.); a precedent too much neglected in modern Missions. Greg. M. l. c. says well, “binos ad prædicandum mittit, nam minùs quàm inter duos caritas haberi non potest; et nobis tacitus innuit, quia qui caritatem erga alterum non habet, prædicationis officium suscipere nullatenus debeat.”

See also above as to the Apostles, Mark vi. 7, among whom are three pairs of brothers. See on Matt. iv. 18.

2. Ὁ μὲν θερισμὸς πολὺς] The harvest is great; the same words as He used before He sent out the Twelve. Matt. ix. 37.

4. Μὴ βαστά[ετε] See on Matt. x. 9.

—βαλλάντιον] a purse. A word used only by St. Luke among the Evangelists. See above on Mark vi. 8. On the form βαλλάντιον, with the double λ, see Winer, p. 42.

—μηδένα κατὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ἀσπάσησθε] salute no one by the way; the way on which you go, as Preachers, in the discharge of your duty.

The phrase has been explained by reference to the formal and tedious modes of Eastern Salutations (Kuini), but this does not seem necessary or appropriate. It is rather an Oriental mode of expression (cp. 2 Kings iv. 29), indicating that their whole heart was to be in their work; so that, comparatively, nothing else, even what was most easy and necessary, was to be done or thought of. Cp. what is said on domestic salutations, ix. 61, and the burial of a father, v. 60, and below, xiv. 26.

“Omnia prætermittatis,” says S. Aug. Sermon. c. 1, “dum quod injunctum est peragatis,” and S. Ambrose says, “Non salutationis sedulitas aufertur, sed obstaculum impediendæ devotionis aboletur, ut quando divina mandantur, paulisper sequestrentur humana. Pulchra est salutatia, sed pulchrior matura executio divinorum: ideò et honesta prohibentur, ne impediatur ministerium, cuius mora culpa sit.”

They were not to salute any in the way, but they were to pronounce salutations on their entrance into houses, and say, “Peace be to this house” (v. 5). Courtesy was not to interfere with duty; it was itself to be consecrated into duty.

5. Εἰρήνη τῷ οἴκῳ τούτῳ] Peace to this house. A divine authorization of Benediction by Presbyters of the Church. See 1 Cor. x. 16, and the Office of Visitation of the Sick in the Book of Common Prayer; and George Herbert, ch. xxxvi. “The Parson blessing,” and Hooker, V. xxv. 3. Bingham, Antiq. II. xix. 15.

6. υἱὸς εἰρήνης] a son of Peace; i. e. a peaceable man, with that loving spirit which is necessary for the reception of a divine benediction. See Cyril, p. 281, Smith. Our Lord thus teaches us, that the profitable use of sacerdotal benedictions, and other means of grace in His Church, depends on the temper of those to whom they are ministered. As to the phrase here, cp. Matt. ix. 15, οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος. xxiii. 15, υἱὸν γεέννης. Luke xvi. 8, οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ φωτός. xx. 36, υἱὸς τῆς ἀναστάσεως. John xii. 36; xvii. 12, ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας. Ephes. ii. 2; ii. 3, τέκνα ὀργῆς. v. 6, υἱὸς ἀπειθείας. 1 Thess. v. 5. 2 Pet. ii. 14, κατὰρας τέκνα.

7. ἄξιός—αὐτοῦ] the labourer is worthy of his hire. This saying is quoted as Scripture by St. Paul, 1 Tim. v. 18, where see note; and for other quotations of St. Luke's Gospel by St. Paul see 1 Thess. v. 3, and 1 Cor. x. 27, where St. Paul quotes the saying of our Lord in the next verse here, ἐσθίετε τὰ παρατιθέμενα ὑμῖν; and see above, p. 168—170, as to the inference concerning the date of this Gospel.

11. ἀπομασσόμεθα ὑμῖν] we wipe off from ourselves on you. See on Theocrit. xv. 95, where perhaps the true reading may be μή μοι κονίαν ἀπομάξῃ.

12. ἀνεκτότερον] See on Matt. x. 15.

13. Οὐαὶ σοι] Because these cities were in Galilee, it does not follow that this was spoken in Galilee. The words have an intimate connexion with what has just preceded, and also with what follows. Observe the use of τοῦ οὐρανοῦ in vv. 15 and 18, and see also v. 21; and therefore, even if they were spoken in Galilee (see Matt. xi. 20), they have an appropriate place here.

The connexion which the Holy Ghost appears to have preferred in dictating the Gospels, is a connexion of substance rather than of time or place.

See above on Luke iii. 19, on Matt. xxvi. 6, and Mark xiv. 5.

17. Ὑπέστρεψαν] They returned. An instance of what was remarked in the previous note. St. Luke, whose practice it is to finish off with a subject on which he has entered, introduces here the return of the seventy, in connexion with their sending forth. "Semper ad eventum festinat." See on iii. 19, and on Matt. xx. 29, and on Mark x. 46.

18. Ἐθεώρουν τὸν Σατανᾶν] I was beholding Satan fallen from heaven. When you were casting out devils, I was beholding the effect of My power, exercised by you, on Satan, in My Name.

As Theophylact explains the words, "Wonder not that the devils are subject to you, for their Prince is fallen from heaven. Although men saw not this, I saw it, who see what is Invisible. He fell as lightning, because he was a bright Archangel and Lucifer ('and because he fell suddenly,' Euthym.), and is plunged into darkness. If, then, he is fallen, what will not his servants (the inferior spirits) suffer? And the words 'from heaven' may be understood 'from his glory,' in which he is worshipped in the world as God." On ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, i.e. from high estate, see Isa. xiv. 12. Matt. xi. 23. Rev. xii. 4, and cp. John iii. 31. Our Lord's view was also prophetic of Satan's future and final fall. On the victory over Satan achieved by Christ, the Seed of the woman, see above, viii. 31, and below, xxii. 3.

19. δίδωμι] See Mark xvi. 18. Rom. xvi. 20.

— τὴν ἐξουσίαν τ. π.] The power of treading; which belongs only to Me and Mine, and can only be given by Me.

— ὄφεων καὶ σκορπίων] of serpents and scorpions. These words, following the mention of the fall of Satan, who is the Dragon (Rev. xx. 2), the Old Serpent (Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2. 2 Cor. xi. 3), suggest that there is some connexion between his power and the operation of venomous reptiles; and that they may be left in the world by the Providence of God, as a visible warning to man of what he will endure hereafter from the worm that dieth not (Mark ix. 44—48), unless he places himself by faith and obedience under the protection of Christ, Who enables His disciples to tread on serpents and scorpions and all the power of the Enemy. (Cp. Mark xvi. 18.)

The literal fulfilment of this prophecy in certain cases, e.g. that of St. Paul at Malta (Acts xxviii. 3. 5), was a visible pledge of the protection and strength granted by Christ to His disciples against the noxious and poisonous powers of the spiritual world. It is partly with reference to this conflict that Christ is called "the Eagle,"—"the Great Eagle" (see Rev. xii. 14. Matt. xxiv. 28. Luke xvii. 37),—i.e. the King of Birds,—the Eagle being, in the Natural World, the Enemy and Destroyer of the Serpent.

— ἀδικήσῃ] injure. See Rev. ii. 11; vi. 6; vii. 2, 3.

20. μὴ χαίρετε] rejoice not. The spirits themselves whom you cast out may warn you against pride,—for they were once angels in heaven. Even Judas himself had power to cast out devils. Cp. Matt. vii. 22. 1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2.

— τὰ ὀνόματα ὑμῶν ἐγγράφη] your names were written in heaven. See Phil. iv. 3. Heb. xii. 23. It is of God's free grace to write us there. We cannot inscribe ourselves. And though written by God, our names may be blotted out. Rev. iii. 5.

VOL. I.

Exod. xxxii. 32, 33. Rev. xxii. 19. Rejoice because your names were written in heaven, though they may be cast out as evil on earth (vi. 22).

21. ἡγαλλιάσατο] He rejoiced. See on Matt. xi. 25.

— Ἐξομολογοῦμαι] I acknowledge with thanks. Cyril, p. 297, ed. Smith.

— σοφῶν] See on Matt. ix. 13.

22. μοι παρεδόθη] μολ is emphatic,—'it was given to Me, and to none other;' therefore μ. παρ. has been rightly restored from the best MSS. for παρεδόθη μοι. Cp. Matt. xxviii. 18.

23—37.] In these verses and in the fellow Parable our Lord handles by anticipation the great argument of Justification by Faith, afterwards treated by St. Paul in his Epistles to the Galatians and Romans;

He declares to His disciples that blessed are their eyes, for they see; and that the things which they behold are those very things which the Patriarchs of old and the Prophets and Kings under the Law had desired to see.

Thus He teaches that the Law was the shadow of the Gospel, and that the Gospel is the fulfilment of the Law.

Upon this the Lawyer stands up, astonished by our Lord's statement, and tempts Him. Thou hast said, that they who hear and see Thy words and works are blessed, and that these things which Thou sayest and doest are the things which the Kings and Prophets under the Law desired to see. I ask Thee, What shall I do to inherit eternal life? Our Lord answers him from the Law, How readeest thou? The Lawyer gives the Legal summary of duty to God and Man. Our Lord replies in the terms of the Law, This do and thou shalt live. But hast thou done this? Canst thou do it? Has any one ever done it? Then what hope hast thou from the Law? The Lawyer desiring to justify himself, that is, to establish his own righteousness, to prove himself righteous, and to show that he could earn eternal life as wages due to his own works, asks, And who is my neighbour? Our Lord replies by the Parable which proves how inadequate and defective were his notions, and the notions of the Jewish Nation, of which he was a teacher and a representative, as to the true requirements of the Law.

In this Parable, rightly understood (see v. 31), our Lord delivers a divine Sermon on that subject,—which He had already introduced by declaring the blessedness of His own disciples,—namely, the universal need of a Redeemer; the preparatory and manuductory character of the Mosaic Law and the Prophets, and their fulfilment in the Gospel; and the Doctrine of Justification by Faith in Himself; and the inadequacy of all legal obedience alone to merit eternal life.

He is thus led to speak of Original Sin. He represents Human Nature stripped of original righteousness by the arch-thief Satan. He shows Mankind in Adam, and all His progeny lying in the road stripped naked, wounded, and half dead. The Aaronic Priesthood comes and looks upon the traveller and passes by on the other side. The Levitical Law comes and casts a transitory glance upon him, and passes by on the other side. They cannot heal him. At length, last of all, the Samaritan comes,—

($\frac{122}{X}$) ²⁹ ° Ὁ δὲ θέλων δικαιοῦν ἑαυτὸν εἶπε πρὸς τὸν Ἰησοῦν, Καὶ τίς ἐστὶ μοῦ πλησίον; ³⁰ ° Ὑπολαβὼν δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν, Ἀνθρώπος τις κατέβαινεν ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ εἰς Ἱεριχὰ, καὶ λησταῖς περιέπεσεν, οἱ καὶ ἐκδύσαντες αὐτὸν καὶ πληγὰς ἐπιθέντες ἀπῆλθον ἀφέντες ἡμιθανῇ τυγχάνοντα. ³¹ Κατὰ συγκυρίαν δὲ ἱερεὺς τις κατέβαινεν ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ

Christ comes,—and pours in oil and wine,—and sets him on His own beast; for He Himself bore our infirmities; He bore our sins in His own body on the tree (1 Pet. ii. 24), and carries him to the spiritual inn of the Church open to all Nations (πανδοχείον), and gives him in charge to the Host, and promises that when He comes again He will repay him whatever he expends upon him.

Thus then He teaches the true nature of the Law as compared with the Gospel, and declares that He Himself alone is both willing and able to save and restore the whole Human Race.

In reading such Parables as this and that of the Prodigal Son (xv. 11—32), every one must perceive how faithful and like-minded a companion and fellow-traveller the holy Evangelist St. Luke is in his Gospel, to the blessed Apostle St. Paul, the great Preacher of Universal Redemption in Christ, and of the doctrine of Original Sin, and of the preparatory and figurative character of the Mosaic Law, and of Justification by Faith in Christ, in his Epistles to the Galatians and the Romans. See below, the Introduction to the latter Epistle, p. 186—198, and above, Introduction to this Gospel, p. 161—163.

24. οὐκ εἶδον] they never saw them.

25. ἐκπειράζων] tempting, drawing Him out (ἐκ). Thou sayest, Blessed are they who hear and see Thee. The Law says, “Do this and thou shalt live.” (Levit. xviii. 5. Cp. Rom. x. 5. Gal. iii. 12.) What then shall I do to inherit eternal life? The Lawyer tries to show that Christ contradicts Moses. Thus he tempts Him.

26. Ἐν τῷ νόμῳ τί γέγραπται;] What is written in the Law? It has been supposed that in asking this question our Lord pointed to the Lawyer’s phylactery, on which was written the text Deut. vi. 4, which he quoted, and which the Jews were wont to recite daily. Vitring. de Synag. pt. ii. lib. iii. c. 15. Buxtorf, de Syn. cap. 9, and see on Matt. xxiii. 5.

29. θέλων δικαιοῦν ἑαυτόν] willing to justify himself. The Lawyer had heard Christ’s word declaring the blessedness of His Disciples as compared with Kings and Prophets (v. 23). And He rose up (v. 25),—an attitude mentioned to mark the contrast between his self-confidence and the lowliness of a disciple,—and said, By doing what, shall I inherit eternal life? He would earn heaven as wages due to his own works. The Lawyer desiring to justify himself, i.e. to prove himself to be righteous by his own performance of the Law, is a type of the Jewish Nation, which sought “to establish its own righteousness by the deeds of the Law, and would not submit to the righteousness or justification provided by God through faith in Christ.” (Rom. x. 3; iii. 21, 22.)

— τίς ἐστὶ μοῦ πλησίον] Observe μοῦ πλησίον, My neighbour; though in v. 27 we have τὸν πλησίον σου. Our Lord answers such questions as these by not replying to them directly; and so tacitly censures them, and shows that they ought not to be put, and that they proceed from an evil heart. He inverts them, and as it were places them on the basis of duty (see on xiii. 23). He answers the Lawyer, by leading him to declare that every man, though a Samaritan, i.e. a foreigner and an enemy (see Luke ix. 52, 53; xvii. 18. John iv. 40. 45), is neighbour to a Jew, whom he assists in distress; and that no one, though a Priest or Levite of Jerusalem, is neighbour to a Jew whom he leaves wounded in the road; and that it is his duty to consider, not who is neighbour to himself, but to whom, however estranged from him, he can act a neighbour’s part. The Samaritan who does good, is neighbour to the Jew; and the Samaritan, as neighbour to the Jew, is therefore entitled, as such, to receive good at the Jew’s hands. Every one, therefore, is our neighbour. “Who-soever is another is our brother.” (By. Pearson, Art. ix.) Cp. S. Aug. de Doctr. Christ. v. 30: “Eum esse proximum intelligamus, cui vel exhibendum est officium misericordiæ si indiget, vel exhibendum esset, si indigeret. Ex quo est consequens, ut etiam ille à quo nobis hoc vicissim exhibendum est, proximus sit noster: proximi enim nomen ad aliquid est, nec quisquam esse proximus nisi proximo potest.”

Winer (p. 119) expresses surprise at the omission of the Article before πλησίον here. But μοῦ πλησίον, my neighbour, is itself a definite phrase, and we should not expect the insertion of ὁ after μοῦ.

30. ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ] from Jerusalem. This confirms the opinion that the events of this portion of the history are connected with Jerusalem (see above, v. 1).

The road here described was infested with robbers (Joseph. Ant. xv. 7. S. Jerome, in Jerem. iii. 2, and ad Paul. Ep. 77). The distance from Jerusalem to Jericho was 150 stadia (Joseph. Ant. iv. 8. See also Lightfoot, Chorograph. ch. xlvii. vol. ii. 43—45). The traveller came from the “Holy City,”—probably a Jew. The Priest and Levite were perhaps coming from their service in the Temple.

— εἰς Ἱεριχά] to Jericho,—the Scriptural type of the City of this World, as opposed to Jerusalem, the Holy City, the City of God. Josh. vi. 26. 1 Kings xvi. 34.

31. Κατὰ συγκυρίαν] by a coincidence. See Trench, p. 308, with his remarks, p. 310, on the relation of the Samaritans (as strangers, ἀλλόφυλοι, ἀλλογενεῖς, ἄλλοθενεῖς, of Cuthite and Assyrian extraction) to the Jews.

This Parable—delivered by Christ in the last year of His Ministry, and not long before He went on the road to Jericho—has also a higher spiritual meaning, and is designed to commend for imitation the example of Christ, the Good Samaritan, traduced and rejected as such by His countrymen. See Aug. Sermon. cxxi. 2, and on Ps. li.

Christ came from heaven to the place where Mankind lay, stripped of original righteousness, and wounded by the arch-thief and robber, the devil. The Mosaic Law and Levitical Priesthood, which came as it were per accidens, κατὰ συγκυρίαν, οὐ προηγουμένως—διὰ τὴν ἀνθρωπίνην ἀσθένειαν μὴ δυναμένην ἐξ ἀρχῆς δέεσθαι τὸ κατὰ Χριστὸν μυστήριον, were unable to restore Mankind, and could only cast on it a transient glance, and pass by. But Christ pours in the cleansing wine and healing oil of His Word and Sacraments, and other means of grace, and carries it on His own Body, and places it under the care of His Church, on His ascension to heaven, with a promise of an eternal reward, to the dispensers and stewards of His mysteries (1 Pet. iv. 10), when He returns again at the Great Day.

See Aug. Sermon. cxxxi. 6: “Oleum et Vinum Baptisma. Hoc est quod infusum est in viâ;” and he interprets τὸ ἴδιον κτήνος by “caro in quâ ad nos venire dignatus est.” S. Aug. Quæst. Ev. ii. 19. τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ· μέλη γὰρ αὐτοῦ ἡμᾶς ἐποίησε. (Theoph.)

The Inn to which the traveller is brought is the Church,—πανδοχεῖον ἡ Ἐκκλησία, ἡ πάντα ὑποδεχομένη (Theoph.), who interprets the δύο δηνάρια as the δύο διαθήκας. Cp. Aug. Sermon. cxxxi. 6.

See Origen, who says,—“Aiebat quidam de presbyteris, parabolum volens interpretari, hominem qui descendit esse Adam; Ierusalem, paradisum; Jericho, mundum; latrones, contrarias fortitudines; sacerdotem, legem; Levitem, prophetas; Sama-

Jones* of Nayland, Sermon xxxiii. vol. iv. p. 466, Lond. 1826, and Burton, p. 261. And the Church of England, by joining this Parable with Gal. iii. 16—23 on the Thirteenth Sunday after Trinity, seems (as Dean Trench has observed) to set the stamp of her approval on this exposition.

³⁴ ἔλαιον καὶ οἶνον] oil as a lenitive, to soothe; wine as an absterive, to cleanse the wound. Plin. xxix. 9. Wetst.

— ἐπὶ τὸ ἴδιον κτῆνος] on his own beast; and walked on foot to the inn, while the sick man rode. So Christ, the good Samaritan, carried us. See on v. 31.

A lesson of love for Christ as our true neighbour follows of course. "Nihil tam proximum quàm caput membris," says S. Ambrose, "Eum quasi Dominum diligamus, Eum quasi proximum." The Parable of the Good Samaritan thus explained, prepares the way, by a natural connexion, for the next incident,—the praise of Mary for her love of Christ.

— πανδοχεῖον] inn; 'diversorium,' κατάλυμα. (Wetst.)

³⁶ πλησίον—γεγονέναι] to have become neighbour. Observe γεγονέναι. The neighbour Jews became strangers, the stranger Samaritan became a neighbour, to the wounded traveller. It is not place, but love, which makes neighbourhood.

³⁷ Ὁ ποιεῖς] He will not say "the Samaritan." (Beng.)

— Πορεύου καὶ σὺ ποιεῖ ὁμοίως] Go thou and do thou likewise. Go thou, O Lawyer of the Jews, and imitate the example of the despised Samaritan. Imitate Him Whom thy countrymen revile as a Samaritan (John viii. 48). Imitate the Good Samaritan, Jesus Christ, Who has made thee and all men neighbours to Himself and to each other, by taking their nature and uniting it for ever to God; and Who makes Himself a neighbour to all, and all men neighbours to one another in Himself, in the Unity of the Church, and in the Sacrament of Baptism, and in the Communion of His own most precious Body and Blood.

³⁹ ἤκουε] was listening; the imperfect tense, contrasted with περιεσπάτο (v. 40).

⁴⁰ περιεσπάτο] distrahebatur (Valck.), who illustrates the word, and contrasts with it St. Paul's expression, which may be applied to Mary, and seems to have been framed on these words of St. Luke, 1 Cor. vii. 35, ἐνπρόσεδρον τῷ Κυρίῳ ἀπερι-σπάστω.

"Martha laborans multum in illâ occupatione et negotio ministrandi interpellavit Dominum et de sorore conquesta est," says Aug. Serm. civ., who thus (Serm. ciii.) contrasts the case of Martha and Mary; "Martha Dominum pascere præparans circa multum ministerium occupabatur. Maria soror ejus pasci à Domino magis elegit. Intenta erat Martha quomodo pasceret Dominum; intenta Maria quomodo pascetur à Domino. Illa multa disponebat, ista Unum aspiciebat."

— Κύριε] Martha requires Christ to command Mary to leave Him, to help her in her much serving. The secular spirit would make the spiritual desert its office, and serve the world.

⁴² μερίδα] portion: a word aptly chosen, because it is specially applied to portions of a feast, a mess. See the use of the word mepris, a portion of food, a mess, sent to a guest, in Gen. xliii. 34, ἦραν δὲ μερίδας παρ' αὐτοῦ πρὸς ἑαυτούς· ἐμεγαλύνθη δὲ ἡ μερίς Βενιαμὴν παρὰ τὰς μερίδας πάντων πενταπλῶς. See other passages in Wetstein, p. 726. Mary has chosen the good μερίδα, that of the spiritual banquet of Christ's words; and that mepris is not like the μερίδες, "meat which perisheth," which thou, Martha, art so busy in preparing; for that is a portion which will never be taken from her; it is "meat which endureth unto everlasting life." John vi. 27.

— ἣτις οὐκ ἀφαιρεθήσεται] which shall not be taken away from her; which will abide with her for ever in the world to come. "Hoc elegit quod semper manebit. Sedebat ad pedes Capitis nostri; quantò humilior sedebat tantò amplius capiebat. Confluit aqua ad humilitatem convallis: Unum est necessarium: hoc sibi Maria elegit. Transit labor multitudinis, manet caritas unitatis. A te quod elegisti auferetur. Hoc illa elegit quod semper manebit." (Aug.)

CH. XI. 1. καθὼς καὶ Ἰωάννης] as also John did. John taught his disciples to pray, and Christ taught His disciples to pray. John's Prayer is lost; but Christ's Prayer remains, and is heard in every climate under heaven. He that is of the earth must give way to Him who is from heaven. "Terrena coelestibus cedunt." Tertullian, de Oratione. Cp. John iii. 30, 31.

Concerning the stress laid in this Gospel on the Duty of Prayer, see above on v. 16.

2. Ὅταν προσεύχησθε λέγετε] When ye pray, say. See on Matt. vi. 9. By repeating the same Prayer (with some few variations) as He had delivered in the Sermon on the Mount, Our Lord not only teaches (1) to pray; and (2) how to pray, i.e. what ought to be the manner and order of our desires and petitions, but (3) He also authorizes and prescribes set forms of prayer. Cp. Matt. xxvi. 44.

— ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς] These words are not in B, L, and some few Cursives, nor MSS.; but they are in A, C, D, E, F, G, H, K, M, P, S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Λ, and in Lr. Cyril, ed. Smith, p. 325.

St. Luke, writing to the Gentiles, never uses the term βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν (but βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ), lest he should countenance the heathen idea of a local deity, see above, p. 167; but the words πάτερ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς had been explained before, x. 20; see also xii. 33.

— ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὄνομά σου] B, L, and some few other MSS. omit γενηθήτω τὸ θέλημά σου ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, and ἀλλὰ ῥῦσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ. See Origen, περὶ εὐχῆς, ii. p. 226. Cf. August. Enchirid. c. 116; and Cyril, p. 350, ed. Smith. But these words are found in A, C, D, E, F, G, H, K, M, P, S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Λ, Lr. And if these clauses were interpolated from St. Matthew, why was not the whole prayer here made identical with its form in that Gospel?

3. τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν] For this use of τὸ, cp. xix. 48. James iv. 14, τὸ τῆς αἰῶνος. 2 Pet. ii. 22, τὸ τῆς ἀληθοῦς παροιμίας. And the sense is, Give to us, by the each day,—i.e. as it succeeds,—that bread which is needful for us. On ἐπιούσιον, see Matt. vi. 11.

7. κέκλεισται] has been shut and is shut with bar and bolt, which it will be troublesome to remove.

— εἰς τὴν κοίτην] i.e. have come to—and are now in—bed, and cannot rise and come out of it. On this use of εἰς see Mark i. 9. 39. Luke xii. 21; xxi. 37.

14. Καὶ ἦν ἐκβάλλων] This portion of St. Luke's narrative (v. 14—26) affords a striking instance of the manner employed in this Gospel by the Holy Spirit, of grouping together incidents and sayings according to their spiritual connexion. This is the truest connexion, especially in the eye of Him, with Whom the ideas of Time and Place are absorbed in Eternity and Omnipresence. And incidentally this mode of writing supplies a silent proof, not only of St. Luke's posteriority to St. Matthew and St. Mark, but also of the divine origin of the Gospels. Time and place are needful for man. And the Holy Spirit, by St. Matthew and St. Mark, had fixed the time and place of those incidents. (See Matt. xii. 22—37. Mark iii. 22—30.) He now deals with them by St. Luke according to their inner relation to each other.

These considerations are more necessary to be observed, because they seem to have been lost sight of by some Harmonists.

What then must be said of those, who (with Schleiermacher and De Wette) censure St. Luke here, as if he were an ill-informed and inaccurate compiler, because his Gospel is not subordinate to the lower laws of human agency, but is constructed on the higher principles of spiritual order and chronology? See above, viii. 1, and p. 207. But "Wisdom is justified of her children."

The inner connexion of this chapter is as follows:—

Our Lord is praying, and is desired by one of His disciples to teach them to pray. Prayer, then, is the key-note struck by a special incident. The rest follows in harmony. He gives a form of prayer; and proceeds to teach the blessedness of perseverance in prayer: with an assurance that God will give the Holy Spirit to those who pray for Him. The mention of the Holy Spirit, as a gift of God, leads naturally to the mention of Christ's power over the Evil Spirit generally, and particularly when dumb, i.e. when hindering prayer; and the proof thence given that the Kingdom of God is come to them, and ought to be joyfully received. And (in the paragraphs here inserted with this connexion) Our Lord goes on to warn them (vv. 14—23), that though He has the will and power to cast from their hearts the Evil Spirit, yet it is for them to watch and pray lest he return; for he will desire and seek to return, and if when cast out he does return, he will be more fierce and inveterate than before (vv. 24—26).

He goes on to show the blessedness of having Christ's image formed in our souls, which are thus safe against the Evil Spirit, and of bringing forth its fruits in our lives. And having described this blessedness, He contrasts with it the sinful and miserable condition and doom of those who reject or neglect the offers of the Kingdom, now displayed by His preaching and miracles. They, who are deaf to His gracious message, will be put to shame and condemned at the great day by the example of the Queen of Sheba and of the Ninevites (29—32). He then warns them, that the light of the Holy Spirit is kindled in the heart, in order that it may burn brightly and purely in their lives (33—36), especially in rectitude of intention (i. e. for the glory of God, and according to the light of His law); and He warns them by woes denounced on the Pharisees, against an empty, barren, and hypocritical show of religion (37—52).

— ἐλάλησεν ὁ κωφός] the dumb man spake. Observe the transition from the neuter gender to the masculine. The spirit was dumb; and when the man was released from it, the man spake.

23. Ὁ μὴ συνάγων μετ' ἐμοῦ] he that gathereth not with Me. See Matt. xii. 30.

24. Ὅταν τὸ ἀκάθαρτον πνεῦμα] when the evil spirit has gone out of the man. This saying was applicable in the first instance to that generation. See on Matt. xii. 45. As long as the Israelites were in the bondage of Egypt, and lived according to its customs, they were possessed with an unclean spirit; but it was cast out when they received the Law of God from Moses. But because they did not receive Christ, of whom Moses wrote in the Law, the Evil Spirit returned to them with greater force, because he found their hearts void of godly fear and love, and took up his abode there. (Cyril.)

This saying is also applicable generally as a warning to every nation and every individual. The Evil Spirit has been cast out at Baptism. He goes about roaming through the dry places of Heathenism; among souls which have not been baptized into Christ. But he loves most to tempt Christians to fall away from Christ. Therefore he returns to the house whence he was cast out, and finds it swept and garnished, lying idle and empty, and returns with greater force and dwells there. See Greg. Nazian. p. 719.

33—36), which are directed specially against the Pharisees, and those who resemble them, is as follows:—

The Pharisees sought for a sign, but they were an evil generation, and sought it with an evil intention. No sign, therefore, should be given to them. But signs enough (σημεῖα) would be afforded to those who are not evil, in the miracles (σημεῖοις) and doctrine of Christ. For Christ did not light the candle of His Gospel in the World to be hidden, but that all who will see, may see it. (See S. Cyril here.) But no one can see it, if he has an evil eye, i.e. a wicked intention, as the Pharisees had. (See Gregor. 28. Moral. c. 12, and Bede.) If the intention is holy, then all the whole man is full of light; but if it is evil, the whole man is full of darkness: and it is vain for such men that the Light is come into the world, “for they love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil” (John iii. 19). Our mind is our candle (Prov. xx. 27), which shines when it has the Light of God. (Theoph. on cap. xii. 35.) Take heed, therefore, that what God intended for thy light be not darkness. Let no cloud of passion or prejudice darken the inner light of the spiritual eye. If thy whole man be full of light, having no part dark, every thing (see v. 36) will be full of light, being illumined by the light of Christ, as when a candle with its bright shining doth give thee light.

34. Ὁ λύχνος] See on Matt. vi. 22.

35. μὴ—ἐστίν] that the light that is in thee be not darkness. On this use of μὴ with an indicative, see Winer, p. 589.

36. εἰ οὖν τὸ σῶμά σου ὅλον φωτεινόν] It is alleged by some interpreters that this sentence is tautologous; that it has the same sense in the protasis and apodosis, and therefore it is said by Kainoel to be “compositus ex interpretamentis atque glossematis ad v. 34 adscriptis.”

But it is not tautologous. The sense is: The light of the body (i.e. of thy whole man) is the eye; if thine eye be single (i.e. if thou hast a single eye to God's glory in all thy thoughts and actions, and orderest them to that end, according to His Law), thy whole body will be luminous. If, then, thy whole body be luminous, not having any part dark, all around thee will be light, as when a candle with its ἀστραπὴ beams upon thee. ὅλον is the Hebrew כָּל (col), every thing, and is used in this sense Matt. i. 22, τοῦτο δὲ ὅλον γέγονε, xiii. 33; xxi. 4; xxvi. 56. Luke xiii. 21, ἐξυμῶθη ὅλον, and cp. 1 Cor. xii. 17. If thou art not like the Pharisee, who seeks a sign not for faith, but to cavil at it; if thou seekest humbly for the truth; if thou aimest only at one end—God's glory by good means—then in every circumstance and emergency of life, a clear conviction of what thou oughtest to do will immediately flash upon thee, as by the lightning of intuition.

37. Φαρισαῖος] a Pharisee. Here is the key-note of this passage to the end of the chapter.

Prayer was the key-note of the former part, struck by an incident at this time, viz. our Lord's being engaged in Prayer (see v. 1). So now; while He is preaching, a Pharisee asks Him to dine with him (vv. 37—40). Our Lord uses the occasion as one of exhortation and warning to the Pharisees generally.

This incident, like the former, is peculiar to St. Luke's Gospel; and on the note so struck, the Holy Spirit proceeds most fitly and beautifully to introduce a solemn strain of denunciation, delivered afterwards by Christ on another occasion (Matt. xxiii. 13—36).

Thus the Holy Spirit looks backward and forward, sees as it were with a glance what Christ has said and will say, and exhibits the rays in a spiritual prism, and concentrates them in one focus, in order to show more clearly the light of His divine teaching. See below, xii. 13.

— ἀριστήσῃ] The ἄριστον was a morning meal.

— ἀνέπεσεν] went and reclined on the couch, without first washing.

38. οὐκ ἐβαπτίσθη] Our Lord did not wash before the meal, in order that the Pharisee might wonder; and in order that He might teach the necessity of the inward washing of the soul.

39. Εἶπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος] But the Lord said. He entertained His host with a spiritual feast. He converts meals for the body into banquets for the soul.

— Νῦν] Now,—marking, perhaps, their degeneracy from the ancient law and from earlier times. You who boast yourselves better than your fathers are worse than they; Grot., who refers to ἡ γενεὰ αὐτῆ (see v. 50); the climax of moral depravity. But it may rather be, that νῦν is used here to bring out the contrast between inward and outward cleansing, as exemplified in the matter then actually present, a domestic meal. Now,—even now—while you are so careful to cleanse these vessels on this table, you are careless about yourselves.

— ὑμῶν] of yourselves, contrasted with ποτηρίου. You take more care of the outside of your cups, than of the inside of yourselves. Cp. Juvenal, xiv. 62—70.

41. τὰ ἐνόντα] those things which are within. What is within your vessels; and what is within yourselves,—your own souls.

He compares the Pharisees to their own vessels on the table, the word σκεῦος, Hebr. קֵלִים, being often used for the human body. See on 1 Thess. iv. 4.

He blames them for cleansing the outside of the vessel, while the meats and drinks within it are the produce of extortion and rapacity. So it is with themselves.

First, therefore, cleanse that which is within, τὰ ἐνόντα. Give what is within your vessels,—i.e. your meat and drink,—in charity; the opposite to rapacity, by which they are too often acquired. Give your heart. And therefore the Prophet not only says, “deal out thy bread” (Isa. lviii. 7), but also, “draw out thy soul to the hungry” (lviii. 10). Give what is within in alms; deal that out in acts of love to God and man, which is the true almsgiving, and brings a blessing to the doer as well as to the receiver; and when the heart is thus cleansed, then all will be clean.

“Fac misericordiam,” says S. Aug. (Serm. cvi.), “à te incipe. Mendicat à te anima tua: fac eleemosynam cum animā tuā. Miserere animæ tuæ, placens Deo. Da illi (i.e. animæ tuæ) panem.—Quem panem? Ipse tecum loquitur, Crede in Christum; et mundabuntur quæ intus sunt et quæ foris sunt.” — τὰ μνημεῖα τὰ ἄδηλα—οἶδαν] the tombs that do not appear, so that men approach them unconsciously, and know not when they walk over them, and incur pollution unawares. Elz. has οἱ before περιπατοῦντες, but it is not in A, B, D, E, G, H, K, S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Λ.

45. καὶ ἡμᾶς] even us. Hence some distinguish between the Scribes and Lawyers; but see Vorst., Heb. p. 84, and probably the meaning is, that by censuring the Scribes by name, He had taxed not only the Pharisees, but the Lawyers also. Not only dost thou censure the Pharisees, but us, the most learned of the nation. See Cyril.

46. οὐαὶ] See Matt. xxiii. 4.

49. ἡ σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ] the wisdom of God, Christ Himself; as appears from Matt. xxiii. 34. The Divine Logos is the Sender of the Prophets, and spake by their mouths,—e. g. of Zacharias (2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 22), to whose words Christ refers.

51. Ζαχαρίου] See on Matt. xxiii. 35.

52. οὐαὶ] See Matt. xxiii. 13.

— ἤρατε] ye took away. On αἶρειν, auferre, see Luke vi. 29, 30; xi. 22. John i. 29; x. 18; xix. 15. "Vobis vindicastis—doctrinam divinæ cognitionis vobis usurpatis." (S. Ambrose.)

— τὴν κλεῖδα τῆς γνώσεως] the key of knowledge. By which the treasures of the Holy Scriptures are unlocked and opened to the people (τὴν διὰ τοῦ νόμου χειραγωγίαν, Theoph.), and the key by which the kingdom of heaven is opened to them.

53. ἀποστοματίζειν] to question him; literally, to catechize Him; to make Him give answers by word of mouth to them, as if He was their pupil, and they His teachers, hearing Him say a lesson! See the passages from Suidas and Pollux, cited by Weist. p. 732.

Cp. XII. 1. [ζύμης] See Matt. xvi. 6, 11, 12. Mark viii. 15. 1 Cor. v. 6, 8.

3. ταμείους] secret chambers. See Matt. vi. 6; x. 27. Mark iv. 22. Kuinoel thinks that the sense is, "Whatsoever ye have hitherto preached privately, henceforth preach publicly."

But the meaning appears rather to be, Whatever you have said privately, especially in your ministry, will be known publicly; and you will be rewarded accordingly at the Great Day, by your Father who heareth and seeth in secret. See Origen here.

4. Μὴ φοβηθῆτε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποκ.] Fear nothing from them. This precept is a divine protest against the notion of a sleep of the soul after death;

Our Lord distinguishes between the state of the body after death, and the state of the soul after death. The body may be killed, but the soul cannot. But the state of the soul would not be different from that of the body, if the soul sleeps after death. For the body sleeps, and will be awakened at the Day of Judgment; therefore the soul would be as much killed as the body, if it slept after death; therefore it does not sleep, but retains its consciousness. It passes immediately on its dissolution from the body either to Paradise (see xxiii. 43), or to a place of misery and torment (see xvi. 23, and on 2 Cor. xii. 2).

The insertion of these precepts (4—12) delivered to His Apostles at their sending forth (Matt. x. 26—38) seems to be suggested here by what is related in xi. 54, that the Pharisees were conspiring against Him. Cp. Matt. x. 28.

On the Bolice forms ἀποκτενόντων and ἀποκτενόντων, the readings of many MSS., see Winer, p. 76. One of them, probably, may be the true reading here.

5. γέενναν] hell; a stern speech to friends, but spoken in the sternness of love.

— τοῦτον] this person, δεικτικῶς, i. e. Me, the Judge of all. See on Matt. xvi. 18.

6. στρουθία] See Matt. x. 29.

8. Πᾶς ὃς ἂν ὁμολογήσῃ] See Matt. x. 32.

10. πᾶς ὃς ἐρεῖ λόγον] See Matt. xii. 32. Mark iii. 28.

11. Ὅταν δὲ προσφέρωσιν] See Matt. x. 19. Mark xiii. 11. Luke xxi. 12.

13. Εἶπε δὲ τις] some person said, who had felt our Lord's power. Here is another example of the beautiful and instructive method in which this Gospel is written. Incidents occurring to Christ at this time are as it were texts, on which the Holy Spirit delivers Sermons collected from materials of discourses spoken at other seasons of Christ's ministry. See above, x. 1. 17. 25; xi. 1. 37; xii. 1.

The present incident becomes a text for a Sermon on Covetousness (13—34). And thus the Holy Spirit teaches us to consider every event of our lives as an occasion for applying to ourselves the words of Christ. He instructs us to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the Holy Gospel, in such a manner, that we may be able to bring its precepts to bear on the principal occurrences, public and private, of our own lives and of the world's history.

15. πάσης] So A, B, D, K, L, M, Q, R, U, X. Elz. has τῆς.

17. τοὺς καρπούς μου] my fruits. He profanely calls them my fruits, and promises himself the enjoyment of them for many years (S. Cyril), when they were to be taken from him that night.

Compare the speech of Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 11), who says, "Shall I take my bread, and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers?" and on the very next day his heart died within him and he became as a stone, and in ten days after he died. Contrast the words in Deut. viii. 13—18, and David's language, 1 Chron. xxix. 14.

18. καθελῶ μοῦ τὰς ἀποθήκας, κ.τ.λ.] I will pull down my barns and build greater. Observe μοῦ emphatic. He talks of his barns, his fruits, his goods, although he had only a few hours to breathe!

He will house there all his goods: there is no mention of any thing for God and the Poor. "Vanum consilium!" says S. Aug. (Serm. xxxvii. 9). "Stulte! in quo tibi sapiens videris, quid dixisti? . . . Nesciebat pauperum ventres apothecis suis esse tutiores. Recondebatur perituros fructus perituros, nihil largiens Domino, ad quem fuerat exiturus. Quam frontem habiturus est in illo Iudicio cum audire coeperit Esurivi, et non dedisti mihi manducare?" (Matt. xxv. 42.) How different are the Christian's barns! ἔχεις ἀποθήκας τὰς τῶν πτωχῶν γαστέρας, says Theoph. — γενήματα] fruits. Matt. xxvi. 29. Mark xiv. 25. 2 Cor. ix. 10.

20. Ἄφρον] Thou fool! who thinkest thyself so wise! Ἄφρων is opposed to φρόνιμος, prudent (on which see xvi. 8), and is the word used by the LXX for נָבָל (nabal), stultus, and with a reference to the history of Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 25. 36—38), to whom the Fool in this Parable bears a striking resemblance in his words, acts, and end. (Vitringa, Trench. p. 337.)

Similarly the man, who sows the seed in the ground, and does not infer from it the truth of the Resurrection, is addressed as Thou fool! by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 36.

— ἀπαιτοῦσιν] they claim as their due. See note above, vi. 38. Cp. below, xii. 48, αἰτήσουσι.

21. μὴ εἰς Θεὸν] not for God. Observe the accusative; contrast it with ἐαυτῷ. As Beng. says, "Deo nihil accedit aut decedit." That man is rich toward God who lays up treasure in heaven (cp. 1 Tim. vi. 17), and so he is rich indeed. By being rich εἰς Θεόν, he becomes rich for ever.

22—31. μὴ μεριμνᾶτε, κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. vi. 25—31.

23. ἡ ψυχὴ] ravens. Whose parents are careless of them. Cp. Job xxxviii. 41. Ps. cxlvii. 9. Rosenm. refers to Aristotle and Pliny, on the ἀστοργία κοράκων.

25. ἡλικίαν] age, term of life. See Matt. vi. 27.

27, 28. Κατανοήσατε τὰ κρίνα—Εἰ δὲ τὸν χόρτον κ.τ.λ.] Consider the lilies how they grow.—If God so clothe the grass, how much more will He clothe you? This may also be applied as an assurance of a glorious Resurrection. If in each successive spring, after the winter's frost and death, God clothes the flowers of the field with the apparel of such fresh verdure and beautiful colours, will He not much more clothe you with the bright raiment of a glorious body, like to that of the Angels (xx. 36), and of Christ (Phil. iii. 21)? See S. Cyril here.

29. μὴ μετεωρίζεσθε] Be not ye like vessels tossed aloft on the changeable tide and billows of worldly anxiety, ambition, and vanity. "Ne fluitem dubiæ spe pendulus horæ" (Horat. Epist. i. 18. 110); and "Magno curarum fluctuat æstu" (Virg. Æn. viii. 19); μετέωρος dicitur de navibus in alto navigantibus Polyæn. Strateg. iv. p. 246, εἰς τὸ πέλαιος μετεωρίζονται, in altum provehantur. Diod. Sic. p. 448, B, μετέωρον πλεουσῶν αὐτῶν, cum in medio mari navigarent; add. Thucyd. i. 48. Etiam de navibus, quæ in mari ventis ac tempestate gravissimè jactantur Diod. Sic. 340, B, μετέωροι διεφθάρσαν. Hinc factum est, ut poneretur quoque de fluctuatione animi, inter spem metumque dubii atque suspensi, de iis, qui animo sollicito, suspensio, dubio, sunt, ut metaphora petita sit à navibus, quæ vento et fluctibus in alto jactantur. Notabilis hanc in rem est locus Philonis de Monarch. p. 817, A, quem Loesnerus attulit: γινῶθι δὲ σαντὸν καὶ μὴ συμπεριφέρειν ταῖς ὑπὲρ δύναμιν ὁρμαῖς καὶ ἐπιθυμίαις, μηδὲ σε τῶν ἀνεφίκτων ἔως αἰρέτω καὶ μετεωρίζετω τῶν γὰρ ἐφικτῶν οὐδενὸς ἁμοιρῆσει. Cp. 2 Macc. v. 17, ἐμετεωρίζετο τὴν διδουίαν. (Kuin.)

32. τὸ μικρὸν] the little flock,—especially in its beginning, and despised as such by the world; but yet the flock of Christ the Good Shepherd, Who will judge all Nations, and separate the Sheep from the Goats. Matt. xxv. 32.

33. Πωλήσατε τὰ ὑπάρχοντα] Sell your possessions. See Matt. xix. 21, and below, xviii. 22. Do not hoard them for yourself; do not (like the rich fool, vv. 18, 19) call them your fruits; do not consider yourself as the proprietor of your goods, which are not 'res Mancipi,' but for use; not κτήματα, but χρήματα. Regard others as the proprietors of them, and yourself as their steward; regard them not as yours, but as God's (see 1 Chron. xxix. 12—14. Dan. ii. 20; v. 23), for He can recall them in a night (v. 20). Be rich to Him; dedicate them to Him; divest yourself of them; alienate them; devote them to God, and dispose of them in mercy to Christ (see Matt. xxv. 40); and so lay up your goods in purses that will never wax old.

S. Basil says (in Homil. de Avaritiâ), "It is the bread of the hungry which thou receivest, it is the garment of the naked which thou hoardest in thy chest, the shoes of the beggar which rot in thy keeping. Art thou not a robber for counting as thine own what thou hast received in order to distribute?" "Our Lord's command," says also S. Basil, regul. brev. 92, "teaches us not to cast away as evil what we have, but to distribute." And S. Cyril here, "In order that you may obtain the eternal riches, despise this world's wealth;" and Bede adds, "this is not a command that no money be kept by the Saints for their own use (see on Acts ii. 44), since we read that our Lord Himself had a purse, and gave alms therefrom (John xiii. 29), but that righteousness should not be neglected for fear of poverty."

This world's wealth has many enemies who spoil it; but no one can hurt the wealth that is laid up in heaven; for its Keeper is God, Who sleepeth not. Trust your wealth to Him, and you will receive it again with increase. (Cyril.)

35. ὀσφύες περιεζωσμένοι—λύχνοι καιόμενοι] loins girded for active service (see John xiii. 4), and lamps burning, in order to receive your Lord coming at night. Cp. Matt. xxv. 1. Eph. vi. 14. 1 Pet. i. 13. And see the Homily of Greg. M. here, xii. 50, p. 142. "To be girded (says S. Cyril) signifies activity; to have the light burning signifies knowledge and love. See also S. Aug. (Serm. cviii.): "Lumbos accinctos habere, ab omnibus illicitis concupiscentiis abstinere; debemus fervere et lucere operibus bonis, hoc est lucernas ardentibus habere."

37. περιζώσεται] Christ will gird Himself to serve them who stand with their loins girded to receive Him. (Cyril.)

—παρελθὼν] having come forward, and near to them. See xvii. 7, and Acts xxiv. 7, the passages quoted by Welstein here, p. 739.

38. ἐν τῇ τρίτῃ φυλακῇ] in the third watch. St. Luke, writing for Greek readers, divides the night into three watches, as the Greeks did (Xenoph. Anabasis, iv. ed. Hutch. p. 262, note); but St. Matthew and St. Mark, writing for Jews and Romans, divide it into four, as was customary with them. See Tounson, p. 198.

—ὁ φρόνιμος] Not merely the faithful, but the prudent. The Article ὁ is found in B, D, E, H, K, P, Q, S, V, Δ, Δ, and brings out the great truth that faithfulness is prudence, and that faithlessness is folly.

47. πολλὰς] many; sc. πληγὰς, stripes. Similar ellipses are found in 2 Cor. xi. 24. Cp. ἀπὸ μᾶς (Luke xiv. 18), i. e. γνώμης (Matt. x. 42); ψυχροῦ, sc. ὕδατος, μαλακὰ, sc. ἐνδύματα (Matt. xi. 8). Cf. Rev. iii. 4, ἐν λευκοῖς. On the accusative after δαρήσεται, cp. Matt. xx. 22, βάπτισμα βαπτισθῆναι, and Glass. Phil. S. p. 398.

As to the doctrine that there will be different degrees of glory and misery hereafter, see above on Matt. x. 15, and below on 1 Cor. iii. 15; and see Chrys. Hom. xli. in 1 Cor., ἐν βασιλείᾳ πάντες οὐ τῶν αὐτῶν ἀπολαύσονται. S. Ambrose in Luc. vi., "Sicut incrementa virtutum item incrementa præmiorum." Cp. S. Aug. Enchir. cap. 113; and de Civ. Dei, ii. 30; and on Ps. cl.; and others quoted by Gerhard, Loci Commun. vol. ix. p. 702; De vitâ æternâ, § 129.

49. Πῦρ ἦλθον βαλεῖν] I came to cast fire on the earth. And yet He commanded His disciples to say, "Peace be to this house" (x. 5). And He is the Prince of Peace, and the announcement at the Nativity was "Peace on earth" (ii. 14); and He said to His disciples, "Peace I leave with you, My Peace I give unto you" (John xiv. 27); He is our Peace (Eph. ii. 14). Yet still, notwithstanding all this, such is the world's sinfulness and the Devil's malice, that the Gospel of Peace itself will be made an occasion of strife; and He warns us that this will be the result,—in order that we may not be staggered and perplexed by it. See above on Matt. x. 34, and xviii. 7, and below, xvii. 1.

—τί θέλω εἰ ἤδη ἀνήβη;] what will I, if it hath been already kindled? If others have kindled it, what is My will, but to suffer in it? They may kindle the fire, but they cannot do this except by My permission, and they cannot force me to suffer in it; but I suffer in it willingly,—I give My life for the life of the world. (John vi. 51.)

Our Lord uses two metaphors,—one from fire, the other from water. The sense is as follows: Such is the effect of human corruption and Satan's malice, that My Coming, which is an embassy of Love, will be the signal of a conflagration of strife. See Tertullian c. Marcion. iv. 29, "Ipse Christus interpretabitur illius ignis qualitate. Putatisne venisse Me pacem mittere in terram? Non, dico vobis, sed separationem: Igitur ignem eversionis intendit, qui pacem negavit. Quale prælium tale et incendium." I myself, who am Love itself, shall be the first object of its fury. The fire is already kindled which is to consume Me as its victim. But τί θέλω; what do I will? I, by whose will the furious elements have been quelled,—I, who said to the Leper, θέλω, καθαρίσθητι (Matt. viii. 3).—What do I will? To do my Father's Will—to suffer (Matt. xxvi. 39). I lay down My life willingly; No one can take it from Me against My Will (John x. 18). What is My desire, if it has been already kindled, that is, lit by others? He thus guards us against the supposition that He is the Author of the fire. No, it is kindled by the malice of Satan and of man. And Christ is its Victim. But He is a willing Victim. Far from shrinking from the fire in which, like the Paschal Lamb roasted by fire, He is to be immolated as a holocaust, He is ready to be offered; He is now about to give Himself up for the sacrifice. He is now going up to Jerusalem to be there slain.

Or, to change the figure, I have a baptism to be baptized with, the baptism of a sea of suffering, the baptism of My own Blood. (See Matt. xx. 22.) But τί θέλω; what is my will? To pass through the Red Sea of my own Blood; I long for that time. See Theoph. and Euthym. here. S. Irenæus, i. 18, "valde propero ad illud." I am straitened till it is fulfilled; for so, and so only, can the World be saved. It is the Red Sea, which I, who sum up the true Israel in Myself (see Matt. ii. 15), must pass through, that they may be freed from the Egyptian bondage of Satan, and may enter the Canaan of God.

Christ's Death was His Baptism. In it He was buried; He was, as it were, drowned (Ps. xlii. 9), and then He rose again, emerged, as it were, from the waterflood, with His body now prepared for glory and immortality. And therefore we are baptized into His death, "buried with Him in Baptism, wherein also we are risen together with Him." See on Col. ii. 12. Well therefore might He yearn for this consummation.

Our Lord, the true and faithful Martyr (Rev. i. 5; iii. 14), thus set the example, according to which the Apostles, who were tried and purified like silver in the fire of suffering (see on Mark ix. 49), looked forward with joy to the time when they would be offered up (see 2 Tim. iv. 6), and welcomed the fire and the wild beasts with holy exultation. See S. Ignat. ad Rom. cap. 5, πῦρ, καὶ σταυρὸς, θηρίων τε συστάσεις, κ.τ.λ. Cf. ad Rom. 4. Smyrn. 4, ἐγγὺς μαχαίρας, ἐγγὺς Θεοῦ μεταξὺ θηρίων, μεταξὺ Θεοῦ. They could say, We went through fire and water, and Thou broughtest us forth into a wealthy place (Ps. lxxvi. 11).

50. πῶς συνέχομαι] how am I straitened. Since it is to be, let it be soon. "What thou doest, do quickly," said Christ to the traitor (John xiii. 27). The nearer He is to His passion, the greater His yearning for it. Compare St. Paul's words, Phil. i. 23. 2 Tim. iv. 6. As to the word συνέχω, cp. viii. 37. Acts xviii. 5. 2 Cor. v. 14. ὥσπερ ἀγωνιῶ, διὰ τὴν βραδύτητα. (Euthym.)

53. πατήρ ἐφ' νύμφη—θύμη ἐπὶ τὴν πενθερὰν αὐτῆς] Why in the former case is ἐπὶ with a dative and in the latter with an accusative? In the former He is speaking of natural relationships, in the other of affinity. In one case the division grows up from within, in the other it appears to be stirred up from without. The parents fall out of themselves with their own children; the mother-in-law is excited against her daughter-in-law.

54. Ὅταν ἴδῃτε] Matt. xvi. 2.
—τὴν νεφέλην] the cloud which portends rain (1 Kings xviii. 44).

56. Ὑποκριταί] Hypocrites. Ye who deceive others and yourselves. See on Matt. xxiii. 13.

57. Τί δὲ καὶ ἀφ' ἐαυτῶν οὐ κρίνετε τὸ δίκαιον;] Why of your own selves do ye not judge what is right? On the design of such appeals in Scripture to Natural Light and Reason, see Hooker, II. iv. and III. viii. Cp. notes on 1 Cor. x. 15; xi. 13. 1 Thess. v. 21; and see Origin and Bede here.

58. ὥς γὰρ ὑπάγεις] See on Matt. v. 25, 26. The ἀντίδικος here is interpreted by S. Aug. (Serm. cix. 3) to be the Word of God. “Adversarius est nobis, quamdiu sumus et ipsi nobis. Si peccas, dicit tibi, Noli. Adversarius est voluntatis tuæ, donec fiat auctor salutis tuæ. Quamdiu tu tibi inimicus es, inimicum habes sermonem Dei. Esto tibi amicus, et concordas cum ipso. Audi, et concordasti; et finita viâ (i. e. vitæ tuæ) non timebis iudicem. Pro Iudice, invenies Patrem; pro ministro sævo, angelum tollentem in sinum Abrahæ; pro carcere, Paradisum.”

Otherwise, the Word which Christ has spoken, that will condemn you at the last Day (John xii. 48).

For the Latin codrânτης St. Luke uses the Greek λεπτών. (See xxi. 2; and above, Introduction, p. 166.)

CH. XIII. 1. ὧν τὸ αἷμα Πιλάτος ἔμιξε] whose blood Pilate mingled with that of their own sacrifices; i. e. when they came to the Temple to offer them.

The suggestion of the narrators is; God must have been specially angry with these Galileans who were cut off by a heathen, in God's house, at His altar, and when engaged in an act of worship to God. The Argument is similar to that of Job's friends. Job iv. 7; viii. 20; xxii. 5

On Pilate's acts of cruelty, see Joseph. Ant. xviii. 14. Bell. Jud. i. 2, and ii. 9, and on his character generally, Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iv. p. 306, and notes.

The Galileans were remarkable for their restless and turbulent spirit; a spirit which displayed itself at Jerusalem in the courts and area of the Temple at the time of the Passover, and other religious festivals, when the city was most crowded by worshippers, and the popular zeal was inflamed against the heathen power of Rome. To quell these outbreaks the citadel Antonia overhanging the Temple was garrisoned by the Romans. See Acts xxi. 34. Joseph. xv. 11. 4; xvii. 9. 3, and Weststein. Perhaps it was on the occasion of one of these riots that Pilate put those Galileans to the sword.

3. ἐὰν μὴ μετανοήτε] except ye repent. A special prophetic warning to the Jews, who did not repent, and perished.

He proceeds in the Parable of the Fig-tree, to declare the future judgments hanging over them.

4. πύργος ἐν τῷ Σιλωὰμ] the tower, near the fountain of Siloa (Isa. viii. 6), or Siloam, in the valley, on the s.e. of Jerusalem (Nehem. iii. 15). Cp. Joseph. B. J. ii. 16; v. 12; vi. 8; and S. Hieron. ad Isa. viii. 6. Jerem. ii. 23; xix. 2; xxxii. 35. Robinson's Palest. ii. 147: see further on John vii. at end of the chapter, and ix. 7.

The mention of both these incidents here agrees with the opinion that our Lord was now near Jerusalem (see above on x. 1, and note x. 30, and xiii. 6).

If men are overtaken by destruction even when sacrificing to God in the Temple, and when they think themselves safe in the Tower, let no one put off his Repentance; for “except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.”

—ὀφειλέται] debtors. See Matt. vi. 12. Luke xi. 4.

6. Συκὴν] a fig-tree. The Jewish People is represented in the barren leafy fig-tree, afterwards withered by Christ (see Matt. xxi. 19—21. Mark xi. 13—21); they who imputed special guilt to these Galileans; they to whom Christ had come now for three years, looking for fruit. Here also is a note of time and place which seems to confirm the opinion that our Lord was now near Jerusalem, at the end of the third year of His Ministry. See S. Ambrose here, and Theoph.

This Parable of the Fig-tree ought to be viewed in connexion with the withering of the Fig-tree, which was a Parable in action, relating to the same subject (Matt. xxi. 19). The Parable delivered now is the warning of future Judgment on Jerusalem, and a prelude to it. The withering, which took place in the ensuing spring, just before our Lord's Crucifixion, is a rehearsal, as it were, of the execution of the Judgment denounced in the Parable. This consideration may perhaps do something to remove the objection stated by some, that the three years in the Parable cannot refer to our Lord's Ministry, because the Jewish Nation was not destroyed in the next year, but forty years after.

At the beginning of his own ministry the Baptist had said, “Behold, the axe is laid at the root of the tree,” iii. 9. (Cyriil. 6—13.) On these verses, see the exposition of Greg. M. Hom. in Evang. xxxi.

7. ἵνατί καὶ τὴν γῆν καταργεῖ:] Why does it not only bear no fruit, but (καί, also) hinder the land from bearing any, by occupying the place of a better tree? It is itself sterile; and (so to speak) it sterilizes the soil. (καταργεῖ = ποιεῖ ἀεργόν, Eur. Phoen. 760. Ezra iv. 21. 23; v. 5; vi. 8.) See Welstein.

9. καὶ μὲν ποιήσῃ καρπὸν] if so, well. Examples of a similar apostrophe may be seen in 2 Sam. v. 8. 1 Chron. iv. 10. Mark ix. 23. Luke xix. 42.

11. γυνή] The woman, bowed by infirmity, may represent the Church raised and invigorated by Christ. See S. Ambrose, who observes the succession of incidents here, the Jewish Nation threatened in the Fig-tree: the Church restored in the Woman. "In Synagogæ typo arborem excidi jubet, in typo Ecclesiæ feminam salvat."

12. ἀπολέλυσαι] thou hast been loosed. Observe the perfect tense, expressive of Christ's Omnipotence, and of the efficacy of Faith. Compare ἀφένται σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι, v. 20; vii. 47.

15. Ὑποκριταί] So A, B, E, F, G, K, L, M, S, T, U, Γ, Δ, Α.—Elz. ὑποκριτά. Cp. v. 17.

16. ἦν ἔδωκεν ὁ Σατανᾶς] whom Satan bound. Satan, the Enemy, is the Author of all evil, physical and moral, in the World. See Matt. xiii. 28. 39. 2 Cor. xii. 7. Here is an answer to the question, πόθεν τὸ κακόν;

— τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ σαββάτου] on the Sabbath day. See S. Iren. iv. 19, who shows that in doing these works of mercy on the Sabbath Day, to the glory of God who instituted the Sabbath, Who is ever working the greatest good on the Sabbath Day, for the spiritual health of man for whom "the Sabbath was made," Christ did, in the highest sense of the word, keep the law of the Sabbath. Cp. on John v. 17, and see S. Ambrose here.

18. Ἐλεγε δέ] He said. See Matt. xiii. 31—33. St. Luke had just related that all His enemies were ashamed, and all the people were rejoicing in His acts. Here seems to be the clue for the introduction of what follows, viz. that, as now all Christ's enemies were confounded, and all the people rejoiced in all His works, so, as He Himself prophesied, it will be at the end; namely, although the Gospel may be despised now as a mere grain of mustard-seed (see Matt. xiii. 31), yet it will spread its branches through the world; though it is now but a little leaven, it will leaven the whole lump.

Thus these Parables are connected with what follows; If the Gospel is thus to be generally diffused, will they who are saved be few? And they are connected with the warning that the gate of life is narrow, and that entrance is not to be gained without striving (v. 24), and that all who do evil will be cast out (v. 27); and that many who now hear the Gospel but do not obey it, and who are invited to eat and drink at Christ's table, will plead in vain at the great day, that they have had Christ's Word and Sacraments; and that some of the first in privileges here, will be last at the judgment hereafter; and that many among the children of the Kingdom, who rely on their fleshly lineage from Abraham (see Matt. iii. 9. John viii. 33—56), will be cast out; and many of the Gentiles shall come in from all the ends of the Earth (v. 29, 30), and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the Prophets in the Kingdom of God.

Therefore let none of the servants of Christ ever despond, but look with faith and hope, as well as with godly fear, to the end.

19. κόκκῳ—κῆπον] A grain cast in a garden waxes a great tree, and covers the earth.

"Except a grain (κόκκος) fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit" (John xii. 24). The grain (κόκκος, 1 Cor. xv. 37) is not quickened except it die. The body of Christ sown in the garden of Calvary (John xix. 42) is the seed of the Church—of its life of grace here, and of its resurrection to glory hereafter. (Cp. S. Ambrose and Burgon. here.)

22. εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ] to Jerusalem. He goes of His own accord to Jerusalem, in order to be there for the Passover, and to suffer there (see above, on x. 1). Where there were most diseased in soul, there the Physician of souls goes. (Theoph.) Thither the Good Shepherd goes, to lay down His life for the sheep.

23. εἰ ὀλίγοι οἱ σωζόμενοι:] whether those who are saved are σωζόμενοι; Ὁ δὲ εἶπε πρὸς αὐτοὺς, ²⁴ Ἀγωνίζεσθε εἰσελθεῖν διὰ τῆς στενῆς πύλης, ὅτι πολλοὶ, λέγω ὑμῖν, ζητήσουσιν εἰσελθεῖν, καὶ οὐκ ἴσχύσουσιν. ⁽¹⁷¹⁾ ²⁵ Ἄφ' οὗ ἂν ἐγερθῇ ὁ οἰκοδεσπότης καὶ ἀποκλείσῃ τὴν θύραν, καὶ ἄρξῃσθε ἔξω ἐστάναι καὶ κρούειν τὴν θύραν λέγοντες, Ἡ Κύριε, Κύριε, ἄνοιξον ἡμῖν καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς ἐρεῖ ὑμῖν, Οὐκ οἶδα ὑμᾶς πόθεν ἐστέ. ²⁶ Τότε ἄρξεσθε λέγειν, Ἐφάγομεν ἐνώπιόν σου καὶ ἐπίομεν, καὶ ἐν ταῖς πλατείαις ἡμῶν ἐδίδαξας. ²⁷ Καὶ ἐρεῖ, Λέγω ὑμῖν, οὐκ οἶδα ὑμᾶς πόθεν ἐστέ, ἀπόστητε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, πάντες οἱ ἐργάται τῆς ἀδικίας. ⁽¹⁷²⁾ ²⁸ Ἐκεῖ ἔσται ὁ κλαυθμὸς καὶ ὁ βρυγμὸς τῶν ὀδόντων, ὅταν ὄψῃσθε Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ, καὶ πάντας τοὺς προφήτας ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὑμᾶς δὲ ἐκβαλλομένους ἔξω. ²⁹ Καὶ ἡξουσιν ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν καὶ δυσμῶν, καὶ ἀπὸ βορρᾶ καὶ νότου, καὶ ἀνακλιθήσονται ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ. ⁽¹⁷³⁾ ³⁰ Καὶ ἰδοὺ εἰσὶν ἔσχατοι, οἱ ἔσονται πρῶτοι καὶ εἰσι πρῶτοι, οἱ ἔσονται ἔσχατοι. ⁽¹⁷⁴⁾ ³¹ Ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ προσήλθόν τινας Φαρισαῖοι λέγοντες αὐτῷ, Ἐξελθε καὶ πορεύου ἐντεῦθεν, ὅτι Ἡρώδης θέλει σε ἀποκτεῖναι. ³² Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, Πορευθέντες εἶπατε τῇ ἀλώπεκι ταύτῃ, Ἴδου ἐκβάλλω δαιμόνια καὶ ἰάσεις ἐπιτελῶ σήμερον καὶ αὔριον, καὶ τῇ τρίτῃ τελειοῦμαι. ³³ Πλὴν δεῖ με σήμερον καὶ αὔριον καὶ τῇ ἐχομένῃ πορεύεσθαι ὅτι οὐκ ἐνδέχεται προφήτῃ few? The present participle is used by way of anticipation, in a future sense, as in S. Clement of Alexandria's treatise, τὸ σωζόμενος πλοῦσιος, vol. ii. p. 935, ed. Potter. So ἀποφωρτισμένοι, Acts xxi. 3. καταργουμένων, 1 Cor. ii. 6, and οἱ ἀπολλύμενοι, and οἱ σωζόμενοι, 2 Cor. ii. 15. ἀπολλυμένων, 1 Pet. i. 7. λυομένων, 2 Pet. iii. 11; and see Winer, Gramm. N. T. p. 322.

On the connexion, see on v. 18. Perhaps the inquirer supposed that salvation was only for the Jews; and could not reconcile that prevalent opinion with our Lord's previous discourse.

To these questions concerning others, our Lord replies, by exhorting the inquirers to work out their own salvation by doing their own duty, and so diverts them from curious and unprofitable speculations. Cp. John xxi. 21, 22. Acts i. 6—8; and see above, on x. 29, and below, on xvii. 37.

31. Ἡρώδης] Herod. The tetrarch of Galilee. This incident is not at variance with what has been said on x. 1, and on xiii. 4. 6,—namely, that our Lord was now not far from Jerusalem. For, Herod was Ruler of Peræa as well as of Galilee; and John the Baptist had been put to death at Machærus, where Herod had a Palace (Joseph. B. J. vii. 6. Antiq. xvii. 8 and 11), about ten miles east of Jericho, and thirty east of Jerusalem.

St. Matt. xix. 1; xx. 29, and St. Mark x. 1. 46, speak of our Lord being now in Peræa (τὰ ὄρια τῆς Ἰουδαίας πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου), whence He passed over the river Jordan, and so came to Bethany, and thence to Bethany and Jerusalem for His Passion. (Luke xviii. 35. Matt. xx. 29. Mark x. 46.) Herod had put John to death, not in Galilee, but Peræa; and if our Lord was now, as seems probable, in Peræa or near it, it was very likely that the Pharisees (who were themselves plotting His destruction, see on v. 32) should endeavour to intimidate Him with a threat of Herod's anger, and to alarm Him with the prospect of a death like that of His forerunner the Baptist.

What follows (vv. 33—35) concerning Jerusalem seems to prove that the incident must have occurred in its neighbourhood, which our Lord would not quit, because He must die at Jerusalem (v. 33).

32. ἀλώπεκι] fox. As to Herod's character formed on the model of that of Tiberius, in subtlety and dissimulation, see Luke iii. 19. Mark viii. 15. Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4. "Personam egit," says Welstein, "servi apud Tiberium, domini apud Galilæos, amici Sejano, Artabano, fratribus suis Archelao, Philippo, Herodi alteri, quorum studia erant diversissima et inter se, et à studiis Herodis ipsius."

Our Lord asserts His own divine prophetic character by open rebuke of the Ruler of His own Country. In the discharge of the same office, which authorized and required the utterance of language not suitable to other lips (Acts xxiii. 5. 2 Pet. ii. 10. Jude 8), He denounced woes also on the appointed Teachers of the Nation, the Scribes and Pharisees. (Matt. xxiii. 15. 23—29. Luke xi. 42—52.)

—τενὴρ] this fox. Our Lord does not say ἐκέλευ, but ταύτη, i. e. this here; meaning, perhaps, to intimate, that there was as much subtlety in those, who (under a semblance of friendship, but desiring to rid themselves of Him, Who weakened their influence with the people flocking to hear Him) told Him of Herod's intentions, as in Herod himself. The Pharisees were identified with Herod, in conspiring against Christ. They in their wily hypocrisy were "this fox." There was more of astuteness and hypocrisy in this pretended friendship of the Jewish teachers in Jerusalem, than in the open enmity of the tetrarch of Galilee. The message, therefore, was for them as well as for Herod. Attend closely to the expression,—"Go and tell this fox." Our Lord veiled His meaning, as He was wont. The words seem to be directed to Herod, but they refer also to the Pharisees. They who are the bearers of the message to Herod are to deliver it also to themselves. See Cyril, p. 468.

—σήμερον] The sense is, the times and seasons are in My hand, not in yours or in Herod's. When "My hour is come," then I will lay down My life: and this will be at a time when you and Herod will kill Me,—but, as far as the time is concerned, against your own will. See Matt. xxvi. 5.

—τελειοῦμαι] I am perfected. Cp. John xix. 28, τετέλεσται. τελειοῦσθαι is the word specially applied to the inauguration of a Priest. Christ, the Great Universal High Priest of the World, was perfected by suffering, and entered into the Holy Place with His own Blood, and being thus perfected became the Author of eternal salvation to all who obey Him, and so He was the Son perfected for ever. See Heb. ii. 10; v. 9; vii. 28.

The word τελειοῦσθαι is also specially applicable to the glorious consummation of a Martyr's death. See the ancient inscription concerning St. Thomas, in Routh, Rel. Sac. i. 376, ὁ ἅγιος Θωμᾶς λόχι (λόγχη) ὑπὸ Ἰνδία τελειοῦται.

You and Herod may unite with Pontius Pilate, and imagine that you have put an end to Christ; but His end is the beginning of His Glory, His Death is the entrance into Life: when you suppose that you have destroyed Him, then He is perfected.

33. Πλὴν δεῖ με—πορεύεσθαι] Besides, and yet—i. e. notwithstanding Herod and you desire to destroy Me here and now, I must needs continue to walk; you cannot arrest My progress in preaching and working, till I go up to Jerusalem. Christ is Lord of place and time: and though they seek to kill Him now and here, He proceeds undisturbed in His course, till He goes and offers Himself as the Lamb of God at the Passover at Jerusalem. It is as impossible for them to arrest His course, as that of the sun in the heaven.

The word πορεύεσθαι, as here used by Christ, is the Hebr. הָלַךְ, to walk, i. e. to proceed in a certain track (הַלֵּךְ) of life, action, and beneficence. He takes up the same word as had been used by them, but gives it a higher sense. δεῖ, says S. Cyril, means not necessity, but will. What Christ wills, must be.

—οὐκ ἐνδέχεται] it is not possible that a prophet should perish out of Jerusalem. What a severe sentence from the all-seeing Judge on Jerusalem, the Holy City, the seat of Judgment, the seat of the House of David (Ps. cxxii. 5)! It was full of Judgment; Righteousness lodged in it, but now murderers. (Isa. i. 21.) It is become the "sentina iniquitatis, laniena prophetarum," the sink of iniquity, the shambles of God's prophets, and claims a monopoly of sin. (1 Thess. ii. 15.)

34. Ἱερουσαλήμ] See Matt. xxiii. 37.

35. ἀφίεται ὑμῖν ὁ οἶκος ὑμῶν] your house,—that Holy House which was God's House, but is become your house, being made "a den of thieves," that is left to you, being soon about to be deserted by God. (Theophyl.) See on Matt. xxiv. 15.

—οὐ μὴ με ἴδῃτε] ye shall not see Me. This prophecy was to have a double fulfilment, first on Christ's triumphal entry (see Matt. xxi. 9. Mark xi. 9. Luke xix. 38, and Cyril here); and secondly (one yet future), in the conversion of the Jews. See on Matt. xxiii. 39.

CH. XIV. 1. Φαρισαίων] of the Pharisees. Though our Lord knew their malice (see xiii. 32), yet He vouchsafed to be their guest, that He might feed them with the bread of life and with the instruction of His wonderful works. (S. Cyril.)

3. ἀποκριθεὶς] answering their thoughts.

5. υἱὸς] son. So A, B, E, G, H, M, S, U, V, Γ, Δ, Λ; and so S. Cyril in his newly-recovered Commentary, p. 471, 3. Elz. υἱός. But υἱὸς ὑμῶν has a special force here. You rescue your children from a pit on the Sabbath; may not I deliver My children, who are also sons of Abraham, from the bonds of Satan on the Sabbath? Cp. xiii. 16.

There is another reason for preferring the reading υἱός. The argument proceeds from a thing of greater value to one of less. You deliver your children, and even your oxen, on the Sabbath. Shall not I much more deliver My creatures and My children?

If υἱός were the true reading, it should follow after βοῦς (as in xiii. 15), and not precede it. The Scriptures often say "ox and ass" (Exod. xxiii. 12. Deut. xxii. 10. Isa. i. 3; xxxii. 20), but never "ass and ox."

There is also (as Tregelles observes, p. 200) a reference here to the Law of the Sabbath, as given Deut. v. 14, where son stands first among rational creatures, and ox among irrational.

7. Ἐλεγε δέ] He said. These Parables (7—24) are naturally connected with the occasion, and show how the repast of the body may be made the banquet of the soul.

12. μὴ φώνει] call not; i. e. prefer mercy. On this mode of teaching the paramount importance of a particular duty by comparing it with another, by means of a prohibition or negative, see on Matt. ix. 13.

—καὶ γένηταί σοι ἀνταπόδομα] and a recompense be made thee. "Hospitalium esse remuneraturis affectus est avaritiae." (S. Ambrose.)

14. μακάριος ἔσῃ] thou shalt be blessed. Because they cannot recompense thee. Let us therefore (says Chrysostom) not be disappointed and troubled at not receiving a recompense from men on earth; rather let us be troubled when we receive it, lest we learn to look only for reward on earth, and so lose our reward in heaven.

—ἀναστήσει τῶν δικαίων] the resurrection of the just. When all shall rise (Bede), and the just be rewarded, and thou with them. The dead in Christ shall rise first (1 Cor. xv. 23. 1 Thess. iv. 16), and be first judged and rewarded (Matt. xxv. 34. 41).

15. φάγεται ἄρτον] See on Matt. xv. 2.

16. πολλούς] many; i. e. the whole Jewish People, by the Baptist, by His Apostles, by His Disciples, and by Himself. On this use of πολλοί see Matt. xx. 28.

18. ἀπὸ μιᾶς] i. e. γνώμης. See on xii. 47.

— Αγρὸν ἡγόρασα, κ.τ.λ.] I bought a field. All these excuses had been anticipated and refuted by our Lord's teaching that there is another field for which we ought to sell all and buy it (Matt. xiii. 44); another plough to be followed (Luke ix. 62); another yoke to be taken on themselves (Matt. xi. 29); and now He teaches that there is another marriage-feast to be preferred before all earthly nuptials—a marriage-feast in which the soul is not only a guest, but is espoused as a bride to Christ (2 Cor. xi. 2).

— ἔχε μὲ παρητημένον] have me excused. There is an emphasis on the pronoun me. Whatever may be the case with others, who can and ought to come, I am obliged to ask thee to excuse me.

It has been said that this phrase is a Latinism, 'excusatum me habes' (Martial, ii. 79); but, as Meyer observes, ἔχω is often used in Greek writers to signify a relative possession: 'have me as yours;' but in a certain relation, i. e. as one excused by you on my entreaty. The applicant does not wish to detach himself from the lord, he wishes to be accounted his friend and dependent, but on terms of his own.

Here is the point of application to many who are willing to be Christ's on terms of their own making; who will not accept His offers of grace in His Way, e. g. by the Word and Sacraments, but think to be saved in a way of their own.

21.] "πλατείας latiores, ῥύμας angustiores vias." (Rosen.)

— πτωχοὺς καὶ ἀναπήρους, κ.τ.λ.] beggars and maimed. Such were all in Heathen lands. Without the Gospel the world is a vast Hospital of incurables (Eph. ii. 12).

23. ἀνάγκασον] compel. Use so much zeal and importunity, that they may feel constrained to come in (2 Tim. iv. 2). And the word shows the great power of the Gospel which would convert the Heathen from vice and idolatry to God. (Theoph.)

On the use of ἀναγκάζω, see Gal. ii. 3. 14; vi. 12. That this text does not authorize the application of violence in propagating religion, see Grot., and above, note on ix. 55. "Aliter compulsi Saulus pro Judaismo insaniens, aliter Paulus servus Jesu Christi." (Beng.)

24. οὐδεὶς τῶν ἀνδρῶν] none of those men. On the rejection of the Jews and the reception of the Gentiles, see Matt. xxi. 43; xxii. 8. Acts xiii. 46.

25. ὄχλοι πολλοί] great Multitudes were following Him. But He foresaw that Multitudes would fall away from Him, and that Multitudes would soon cry "Crucify Him" (Matt. xxvii. 22. Luke xxiii. 21). He shows that He reads their hearts and foresees the future; and winnows them (as Gideon did his 32,000, reduced to 300, Judges vii. 1—8) by prophecies of trial and tribulation.

26. οὐ μισεῖ] doth not hate. See on Matt. ix. 13, and cp. Matt. x. 37. We must hate all things,—our friends, our relatives, our own lives, if they draw us off from Christ. (Theoph.) We are to love our enemies; and that man is best loved, who, if he tempts us from God by words of carnal wisdom, is not heard. (Greg. Hom. 37 in Evang.) That which is bettered by being neglected or thwarted, as an evil counsellor in his evil counsel, is best loved by being hated. We must not allow other men's evil to overcome our good, but endeavour, for their sakes as well as our own, to overcome evil with good (Rom. xii. 21). Cp. S. Ambrose here.

— μοῦ] of Me; μοῦ is emphatic, and so placed also in v. 27 and v. 33. He may be a man's disciple without such sacrifices as these; but he cannot be Christ's.

28—31. πύργον—πόλεμον] tower—battle. Our Lord had been giving high and heavenly precepts, and tells us that if we would erect our tower, i. e. build up our lives and elevate ourselves to their spiritual altitude, we must first sit down and count the cost; we must frame our account for a large amount of difficulty and suffering. (Cp. Gregor. Moral. 37 in Evang.)

He had been speaking also of spiritual warfare against the powerful Enemy of our souls. We must prepare our forces accordingly. (S. Cyril.) Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, cannot be My disciple. (See v. 26.)

28. τὰ εἰς ἀπαρ.] So A, E, G, K, M, S, U, I, Δ, Λ, Lr.—πρὸς, Elz. But it is necessary to calculate and count not only whether we have what tends toward (πρὸς), but what will reach to (εἰς) completion.—πρὸς has a proper place in v. 32.

34. Καλὸν τὸ ἄλῃς, κ.τ.λ.] Salt is good. If a man, who ought to teach others, and to preserve them from corruption, lose his savour and become reprobate, how shall he be seasoned? (Bede.) See on Matt. v. 13, 14. Mark ix. 50. Heb. vi. 1—7.

CH. XV. 1. Ἦσαν—ἐγγίζοντες] Here is another example of our Lord's Teaching, suggested by a particular incident, and then illustrated and explained by the Evangelist by means of other discourses delivered by Christ at other times. See above, x. 1; xii. 13; xiii. 4.

The first two Parables, that concerning the Lost Sheep and the Piece of Silver, refer directly to the objection of the Pharisees (in v. 3). The third parable has a wider scope (v. 11). See note there.

It may be observed here generally, that the Holy Spirit, writing by St. Luke to the Gentiles, is specially careful to record, and loves to dwell upon in this Gospel, the merciful sayings and acts of our Blessed Saviour to—Foreigners, e.g. Samaritans (ix. 52; x. 33; xvii. 16).

Despised Jews, as Publicans (xv. 1; xviii. 10; xix. 5).

Penitent sinners generally (vii. 39—50; xxiii. 40).

The Gentile World (xv. 11). See the Introduction to this Gospel, p. 161. 167. On this passage to v. 10, see the Homily of Greg. M. in Evang. xxxiv. p. 1601.

2. διεγόγγυζον] were murmuring eagerly: “διὰ certandi significationem addit.” Hermann ad Viger. p. 856. (Meyer.)

4. τὰ ἐνεννηκονταενέα ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ] the ninety and nine in the wilderness. ἐρημος is pasture-land, woodland, &c., opposed to the city,—not necessarily a barren wilderness. It is used by LXX for Hebr. מִדְבָּר (midbar), which is a large plain for pasture. See Gesen. in v., and above, Matt. v. 1.

The ninety and nine left by the “Good Shepherd” (John x. 11. 14. 16) are the myriads of heaven. (Cyril.) “Angelorum, Archangelorum, &c., innumerales greges,” S. Ambrose, who adds, “Dives Pastor, cujus omnes nos centesima pars sumus.”

The one lost Sheep is Mankind. “Ovis illa, quæ perierat in Adam, levatur in Christo.” Cp. Isa. liii. 6. Ps. cxix. 176. (S. Ambrose.)

5. ἐπὶ τοὺς ὄμους] on His Shoulders; for He bare our sins on His own body on the Tree (1 Pet. ii. 24. Isa. liii. 4—6. Heb. ix. 28). “Humeri Christi crucis brachia sunt,” says S. Ambrose. “Illic peccata mea deposui, in illâ patibulî nobilis cervicē requievi.”

6. οἶκον] His home—heaven is Christ's home and the home of Christians. He who is our Divine Head, ascended into Heaven, and has raised us His members to Heaven, and made us to sit in heavenly places with Himself. Eph. i. 20; ii. 6.

—τὸ πρόβατόν μου] See on v. 9.

7. ἐνὶ ἁμαρτωλῷ μετανοοῦντι] one sinner repenting; that is, He does not joy over the sinner as a sinner, but over him repenting; He joys over his repentance; over the sinner ceasing to be a sinner.

On these modes of speaking, in which human affections are ascribed to Almighty God, see Glass. de Ἀνθρωποπαθείᾳ, Phil. Sacr. Lib. v. Tract. i. c. 7, p. 726.

—ἢ ἐπὶ ἐνεννηκονταενέα] rather than over ninety and nine. See on Matt. xviii. 13, where μάλλον is expressed. See below, xviii. 14. On the ellipsis of μάλλον, see Ecclus. xxii. 15. 2 Mac. xiv. 42. Ps. cxviii. 8, 9. (Valck.)

—οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχουσι μετανοίας] This is to be explained from Matt. xviii. 13, τοῖς μὴ πεπλανημένοις.

Perhaps also there may be a tacit censure of the Pharisees (vv. 1, 2), who imagine themselves to have no need of repentance, and have no desire for it; χρεῖαν ἔχω is not careo, but eegeo; and involves a sense of need, and a craving for its supply. See Matt. ix. 12, where the phrase οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχουσι occurs in this sense. See note there.

8. τίς γυνή] a certain woman. The Church of Christ. (S. Ambrose.) See note on v. 9.

—δραχμὴν] a drachma. Man, made in the image of God, and engraven with the divine superscription. (See on Matt. xxii. 21.) Cyril. “Non mediocris hæc drachma, in quâ Regis est figura. Imago Regis census Ecclesie est. Nos drachma Dei sumus.” Cp. Aug. in Ps. cxxxviii. “Quid est drachma? Nummus in quo imago Imperatoris nostri.” (S. Ambrose.)

—ἄπει λύχρον] lights a candle and sweeps the house; for the rooms of ancient houses were very dark, as may be seen by the specimens of them at Pompeii.

—σαροῖ τὴν οἰκίαν] Even as early as the time of Greg. M. the Latin Version used in the Church of Rome had here ‘evertit domum’ for ‘everrit.’ See his homily on this passage, Hom. xxxiv. p. 603, “Domus evertitur, cum conscientia perturbatur.”

9. εὐρούσα] There is the same order here as in other parables of Christ (Matt. xiii. 3—33), where first He describes His own office as the Sower of the Seed, of the good grain in the field, of the mustard-seed. And then subordinately and last of all He portrays that of the Woman (v. 33), i. e. His Church, infusing the leaven of His Gospel into the mass of human society till the whole is leavened.

So here; first Christ is represented as the Shepherd, and the sheep is called His sheep (τὸ πρόβατόν μου, v. 6), for He came forth from Heaven to seek and to save it, and to bring it back on His shoulders.

The Sheep is Christ's; but the Woman lights a candle (God's word) and sweeps the house where she herself dwells (Tert. Præsc. Hæret. xiv.), and she does not call the piece of silver her own. The penitent sinner, stamped with God's image, though marred and bedimmed, is not her's, but God's; and she owns that ἀπόλλυμαι. ¹⁸ Ἀναστὰς πορεύσομαι πρὸς τὸν πατέρα μου, καὶ ἔρῳ αὐτῷ. Πάτερ, ἡμάρτον εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ ἐνώπιόν σου, ¹⁹ οὐκέτι εἰμὶ ἄξιος κληθῆναι υἱὸς σου, ποίησόν με ὡς ἓνα τῶν μισθίων σου. ²⁰ Καὶ ἀναστὰς ἦλθε πρὸς τὸν πατέρα ἑαυτοῦ. Ἔτι δὲ αὐτοῦ μακρὰν ἀπέχοντος εἶδεν αὐτὸν ὁ πατήρ αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐσπλαγχνίσθη, καὶ δραμὼν ἐπέπεσεν ἐπὶ τὸν τράχηλον αὐτοῦ καὶ κατεφίλησεν αὐτόν. ²¹ Εἶπε δὲ αὐτῷ ὁ υἱὸς, Πάτερ, ἡμάρτον εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ ἐνώπιόν σου, καὶ οὐκέτι εἰμὶ ἄξιος κληθῆναι υἱὸς σου. ²² Εἶπε δὲ ὁ πατήρ πρὸς τοὺς δούλους αὐτοῦ, Ἐξενέγκατε τὴν στολὴν τὴν πρώτην, καὶ ἐνδύσατε αὐτόν, καὶ δότε δακτύλιον εἰς τὴν χεῖρα αὐτοῦ καὶ ὑποδήματα εἰς τοὺς πόδας· ²³ καὶ ἐνέγκαντες τὸν μόσχον τὸν σιτευτὸν θύσατε, καὶ φαγόντες εὐφρανθώμεν· ²⁴ ὅτι οὗτος ὁ υἱὸς μου νεκρὸς ἦν, καὶ ἀνέζησε· ἀπολωλὼς ἦν, καὶ εὗρέθη. Καὶ ἤρξαντο εὐφραίνεσθαι. ²⁵ Ἦν δὲ ὁ υἱὸς αὐτοῦ ὁ πρεσβύτερος ἐν ἀγρῷ· καὶ ὡς ἐρχόμενος ἤγγισε τῇ οἰκίᾳ, ἤκουσε συμφωνίας καὶ χορῶν· ²⁶ καὶ προσκαλεσάμενος ἓνα τῶν παίδων ἐπυνθάνετο τί εἴη ταῦτα; ²⁷ Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτῷ, Ὅτι ὁ ἀδελφός σου ἦκει, καὶ ἔθυσεν ὁ πατήρ σου τὸν μόσχον τὸν σιτευτὸν, ὅτι ὑγιαίνοντα αὐτὸν ἀπέλαβεν. ²⁸ Ὁργίσθη δὲ, καὶ οὐκ ᾔθελεν εἰσελθεῖν. Ὁ οὖν πατήρ αὐτοῦ ἐξελθὼν παρεκάλει αὐτόν. ²⁹ Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπε τῷ πατρὶ, Ἴδου τοσαῦτα ἔτη δουλεύω σοι, καὶ οὐδέποτε ἐντολήν σου παρήλθον· καὶ ἐμοὶ appears to be its proper place; but it is not found in A, E, F, G, H, K, M, P, Q, S, V, X, Γ, Δ, Λ.

18. ἐρῶ] I will say. "Etsi Deus novit omnia, vocem tamen tuæ confessionis expectat." (S. Ambrose.)

21. εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ ἐνώπιόν σου] against heaven and in thy sight. Observe, he persevered in the resolution expressed before, in his exile (v. 18): he was not spoiled by the father's kindness.

This is the language of true repentance and godly sorrow, not proceeding only from dolor amissi, but from dolor admissi: not from a sense only of pœna, but of culpa, and that not in the sight of men, but of God. See Pp. Sanderson's Sermon on Ahab's Repentance, vol. iii. p. 13, and notes below on 2 Cor. vii. 10.

The penitent says that he has sinned against heaven, and so acknowledges that heaven, and not earth, is his home; and that he will no longer wallow in the mire of this lower world, but seek the things that are above, and have his conversation in heaven.

22. στολὴν τὴν πρώτην] stolē is a long robe, covering the whole person: see Mark xii. 38. Luke xx. 46. And τὴν πρώτην is τὴν τιμιωτάτην (Euthym.), the best. So Athen. 369, πρώται ἐσθῆτες. (Valck.)

In a spiritual sense the returning prodigal receives "principalem stolam, quam Adam peccando amiserat" (Jerome, Gen. iii. 7), the white stolē, or robe of Christ's righteousness, which covers the whole man (see Rev. vi. 11; vii. 14), in which Christians are clothed at baptism, when they put on Christ. Cp. 2 Cor. v. 21. Gal. iii. 27. Eph. iv. 24.

— δακτύλιον] a signet ring—a pledge of the Spirit (Aug.), a seal, σφραγίδα, and an emblem of the spiritual marriage by which the soul is espoused to Christ. Clem. Alex. ('Quis dives,' &c.) and others (see Bingham, xi. l. 6) call Baptism τὴν σφραγίδα τοῦ Κυρίου, 'signaculum fidei' (Tertullian, Apol. 21), and 'signaculum similitudinis Christi.' (Jerome.) It may be a consignation of the grace begun in Baptism, and consummated in Confirmation. And perhaps the words ἐπὶ τὴν χεῖρα and εἰς τοὺς πόδας may be added, not without meaning, to show that now is the time for Christian labour with the hand, and for Christian progress with the feet, in the "ways of God's laws, and in the works of His commandments."

— ὑποδήματα] shoes, with which we walk in the way of holy obedience. Eph. vi. 15.

It is observable that long robes, στολαί, and signet rings (cp. James ii. 2. 1 Macc. vi. 15) and shoes, were not allowed to be worn by slaves, but were badges of free men (see Rosenm.); therefore they are appropriately introduced here to show that the Father in His love does not make the returning prodigal to be one of his hired servants (v. 19), but restores him to liberty as His son. A beautiful emblem of the blessedness of true repentance, and of God's pardon, delivering from the slavery of Satan, and restoring the penitent to the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. viii. 21).

23. τὸν μόσχον τὸν σιτευτὸν] the fattened calf. Observe the article repeated, denoting something extraordinary. (Beng.)

"Vitulum saginatum ideoque votivum." (Valck.) This fatted calf represents the sacrifice of Christ, by Whom alone, offered for us, we are reconciled to the Father. Eph. ii. 16. Col. i. 20—22. It may also be applied to the commemorative sacrifice of the Holy Eucharist, in which the meritorious efficacy of that One all-sufficient sacrifice—offered once for all on the cross—is represented and pleaded before God, and its benefits are applied to the penitent and faithful soul. Hence S. Jerome says, "Vitulus Ipse Salvator est, Cujus carne pascimur, sanguine potamur;" and S. Ambrose, "Occiditur et vitulus saginatus, ut carnem Domini, spirituali opimam virtute, per gratiam epuletur;" and S. Aug. "Vitulus ille in corpore et sanguine Dominico et offertur Patri et pascit totam domum." Cp. Cyril here, p. 347, ed. Mai.

The Μόσχος, or calf, thus interpreted, as significant of the propitiatory Sacrifice and Atonement made by Christ upon the cross, will hardly fail to remind the reader, that to the Evangelist St. Luke,—who alone records this parable,—has been assigned the symbol of the calf, among the four living creatures of Ezekiel and St. John (Ezek. i. 5. 10; x. 14. Rev. iv. 7), by the expository teaching of the ancient Church. See for example Iren. iii. 11, τὸ κατὰ Λουκᾶν εὐαγγέλιον ἅτε ἱερατικοῦ χαρακτήρος ὑπάρχον ἀπὸ τοῦ Ζαχαρίου τοῦ ἱερέως θυμῶντος τῷ Θεῷ ἤρξατο· ἥδη γὰρ ὁ σιτευτὸς ἦτομαξέτο μοσχὸς ὑπὲρ τῆς ἀνευρέσεως τοῦ νεωτέρου παιδὸς μέλλων θύεσθαι.

And with good reason. For this Evangelist appears to have written with a special purpose of displaying the propitiatory efficacy of the sacrifice offered by Christ for the sins of the world. St. Matthew had revealed Him as King; St. Mark as the Man Christ Jesus; St. Luke exhibits Him as our Victim; St. John fully manifests Him as God; and so the Gospel is complete. See above, Introduction to the Four Gospels, and to this Gospel, p. 163.

25. ὁ υἱὸς ὁ πρεσβύτερος] the elder son. "Major filius, populus Israel secundum carnem in agro est; in hæreditariâ opulentia Legis et Prophetarum."

— συμφωνίας] music, even of Angels (vv. 7. 10. Burgon.).

28. Ὁργίσθη—εἰσελθεῖν] He was enraged by what he heard, and would not go into the house, because his younger brother was there! The Jew will not enter the Church, because the Gentile is there. "Irascitur vivere fratrem, quem putabat extinctum; foris stat Israel." (Jerome, iv. 156.) See Acts xvii. 5. 13; xxii. 21; xxviii. 27. As S. Ambrose says, "Stat foris; non excluditur; non ingreditur, ignorans voluntatem Dei de vocatione Gentium. Ubi cognovit, invidet et torquetur Ecclesiæ bonis. Foris enim Israel audit choream et symphoniam, sed irascitur, quia hic concinit plebis gratia, et consona populi jubilatio; sed bonus Pater etiam hunc salvare cupiebat."

29. οὐδέποτε ἐντολήν] I never transgressed thy commandment. Cp. the language of the Jews to our Lord, John viii. 33. 41; cp. Rom. ii. 17. 19; x. 3; cp. xviii. 11.

As if it were no breach of a commandment to murmur at the salvation of a brother, and that brother the heathen world!

— δουλεύω] I slave: as if to be God's people were slavery, instead of being perfect freedom!

— ἐμοὶ οὐδέποτε ἔδωκας ἔριφον] to me thou never gavest a kid: ἐμοὶ, to me, is emphatic; to me, thy dutiful son, contrasted with this renegade! With what stern irony is the murmuring spirit of the Jewish people represented in this dialogue! And they are the words of Him who is describing what He best knew.

Thou never gavest to me a kid—but God has given them a Lamb—the true Passover—the LAMB of God who taketh away the Sins of the World (John i. 29. 36). Why do you ask for a kid, when you have the LAMB? (Jerome.)

30. ὁ υἱός σου] thy son. He would not say my brother. Contrast with this the language of the Servant (v. 27) and of the Father (v. 32), and contrast also ἦλθεν, he came, with ἀνέζησε (v. 32), he rose again.

— σοῦ τὸν βίον] Remark the emphatic position of σοῦ,—thy living—uttered with rancour against both the father and the brother,—“ad augendam invidiam.”

31. πάντοτε μετ' ἐμοῦ] ever with me. Cp. Rom. iii. 1, 2; ix. 4.

— πάντα τὰ ἐμὰ σά ἐστιν] all that is mine is thine. The Law, the Prophets, the services of the Temple in possession, and all the promises of the Gospel; the means of grace and hopes of glory in reversion; all are thine if thou wilt be mine.

32. ὁ ἀδελφός σου οὗτος νεκρὸς ἦν καὶ ἀνέζησε] this thy brother was dead and arose again. See what seems to be an affecting reference to these words, Rom. xi. 15.

CH. XVI. 1. Ἐλεγε δέ] Many different interpretations have been given of this parable of the unjust steward. See an account of them in S. Jerome ad Algasiam 6, t. iv. p. 197. Kuinoel's and Meyer's notes here, and in Trench, p. 423.

The clue to its correct exposition may be found in the fact, that it was addressed to the disciples (v. 1); in the statement that the men of this world are, in regard to their generation (see below, note on v. 8), more prudent (φρονιμώτεροι) than the children of light are with a view to another world; and in the consequent admonition (implied though not expressed), that the present world, and the eagerness, and diligence, and indefatigable earnestness of its children in pursuing their ends, which are uncertain and fugitive, ought to be exemplary to us, and should continually act as stimulants upon Christians, exciting them to show no less zeal and industry in striving to attain their ends, which are eternal in duration, and infinite in value. Thus our Lord teaches us to elicit good out of the evil we see around us; to educe food from poison; and to make the children of Mammon examples to ourselves in serving God. Cp. August. Quæst. Evang. ii. 34.

To this is added the exhortation—arising from the subject of this parable—to use all earthly treasure as an instrument for securing everlasting happiness.

— Ἄνθρωπος] A man. Our Lord begins four parables here with the words ἄνθρωπος, or ἄνθρωπός τις, xiv. 16; xv. 11; xvi. 1. 19. In two of them the ἄνθρωπος is Almighty God; in the two latter a rich man. The former two specially describe our benefits from God; the latter two our duty to Him.

— οἰκονόμον] a villicum, bailiff; suggesting to us that we are stewards of God. Cp. 1 Cor. iv. 1. (S. Ambrose.)

— διεβλήθη] was accused: the word is not always used in a bad sense. See LXX in Dan. vi. 24, and Joseph. Antt. vi. 10.

— διασκορπίζων] wasting, 'dissipans,' 'dilapidans.' It is not said that he was guilty of embezzlement and speculation.

2. Τί τοῦτο ἀκούω] What is this that I hear of thee? Kühner, ii. § 841. Meyer.

— τὸν λόγον] the account, or reckoning, which perhaps had not been lately called for.

3. ἐν ἑαυτῷ] in himself, ‘solus secum.’ See xviii. 4. This intimates a secret device to be communicated only to some who would be accomplices in the fraud and profit by it; and so their services might be counted on; an act of collusion.

4. ἔγνων τί ποιήσω] I resolved what to do. A soliloquy; a sudden thought strikes him and he resolves what to do. Christ hears our secret thoughts; and will reveal them at the Great Day.

5. ἕνα ἕκαστον] each, 'one by one.' He summoned them singly and privately one after the other, in order to secure greater secrecy; here was one mark of his worldly prudence.

6. βάτους ἐλαίου] measures of oil. The tenants, like the modern mélayers, paid their rent, or portions of it, in kind. See the same usage referred to in another parable, Matt. xxi. 34—41. 2 Tim. ii. 6.

Τὸ βάτος, ἡ (bath), Ezek. xlv. 10, 11. 14, was the tenth of an homer; and was for liquids what the ephah was for solids (see Matt. xiii. 33), and held seventy-two sextarii, about nine gallons. (Joseph. Antt. viii. 2. 9. Winer, s. v. Maasse, ii. p. 41.)

— σοῦ τὸ γράμμα] thy bill. Sol is emphatic here and in v. 7. And he makes him write the bill, his own bill (chirographum or syngrapha), that he may have the evidence of his hand-writing, as a proof that it was his act, and so protect himself, and secure the tenant on his side. Another proof of his worldly shrewdness.

— ταχέως] quickly, on the spot; to prevent the effect of any future demurs and compunctions misgivings on the part of the tenant's conscience. Cp. the words of Herodias' daughter, Matt. xiv. 28. Mark vi. 25.

7. Ἐπειτα ἐτέρῳ] Next he said to another, when the first had given him the bill, and had retired, and left him alone, to have a private colloquy with another of his master's tenants.

— Ἐκατὸν κόρους] A hundred measures: κόρος is the Hebr. ῶ (kor), the same in size as the homer. See Ezek. xlv. 11—14; ten Attic medimni, Joseph. Antt. xv. 9. Winer, ii. p. 42.

8. Καὶ ἐπῆνεσεν ὁ κύριος] The land-lord (not Christ) praised him.

— τὸν οἰκονόμον τῆς ἀδικίας] the fraudulent steward. On this use of the genitive for an adjective, see on Matt. xxiv. 15; below, v. 9, μαμωνᾶ ἀδικίας. xviii. 6, ὁ κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας. Cp. Vorst. de Hebr. p. 252.

is mentioned lest it should be supposed that shrewdness can be a substitute for honesty. He praised him because he had acted prudently, φρονίμως.

In some expositions of this Parable, it is taken for granted that the landlord discovered the artifice of the steward described vv. 5—7.

But the supposition seems to impair, if not to destroy, the beauty of the parable;

How could the steward be said to have acted prudently, shrewdly, φρονίμως, if his device was detected and exposed? Is it probable, that his master would have allowed him to profit by the fraud, or that the debtors, who would be forced to pay the sums due, and perhaps be punished in person, would receive him into their houses? Is it likely, that in such a case our Lord would have propounded the steward as an example of worldly wisdom? No; it is no where said, or hinted in the parable, that the landlord discovered the mode by which the steward had ingratiated himself into the affections of his tenants. What he knew, was the result. He saw, and saw with surprise and admiration, that his steward, though a wasteful person (v. 1), had so contrived matters, that he was none the worse for being put out of the stewardship; that he was neither forced to dig nor to beg; and though deprived of his office by his master, was received as a welcome guest by his master's dependents! He must therefore be a very shrewd and clever person, and deserve credit on that account.

We know the method, by which the steward managed to ingratiate himself with the tenants; but we must remember that we are reading a parable delivered by One who reads the secrets of all hearts, and from Whom no artifice is hid. And we are thus reminded, that, though the steward's earthly master did not see or discover the collusion of the steward with each of his tenants in succession, and even praised the result as a proof of prudence, yet we have to do with a Landlord Who sees all things, however secret, and will hereafter call all men to give an account of their stewardship, and bring to light all the hidden things of darkness; and then all mere worldly wisdom will be confounded, and end in misery and shame.

These considerations remove all objections, such as were raised by some sceptics of old—such as Julian and Porphyry—against the phrase, “the lord commended the unjust steward.” The lord knew him only as a wasteful person (v. 1); he knew nothing at all of his collusion with the tenants. He only saw its result, viz. his reception into the tenants' habitations.

— υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου the children of this world. As to this use of υἱὸς see on Matt. ix. 15. Luke x. 6; and on υἱὸς φωτός, children of light, John xii. 36. Eph. v. 8. 1 Thess. v. 5. 8.

— εἰς τὴν γενεάν τὴν ἐαυτῶν in regard to their generation, which is merely transitory: but there is a generation which is everlasting. They are more prudent and shrewd in regard to their contemporaries, persons, and things, than the children of Light are in regard to the persons and things of their generation; e. g. in regard to God Himself and heaven, which is eternal. On the latter use of γενεά as applied to an age of man see Matt. xii. 39. 41, 42. Luke xi. 31, 32. 50, 51; and on its higher sense see Matt. xxiv. 34.

On this text see Bp. Sanderson, Sermons, i. 374; iv. 49.

9. Καγὼ ὑμῖν λέγω] And I say to you. You have heard what the earthly κύριος or lord said to his steward; now hear what I your heavenly Κύριος or Lord have to say to you who are My stewards; and who will be called by Me hereafter ἀποδοῦναι τὸν λόγον τῆς οἰκονομίας, —to render the account of your stewardship.

— ποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς φίλους] make for yourselves friends from the mammon of unrighteousness. Make the poor your friends, who, by alms received from you, and by prayers offered for you, will be,—not indeed an efficient, but an instrumental, cause of your reception into heavenly habitations. See Matt. xxv. 34—45. Cp. S. Greg. Nazian. Orat. xiv. pp. 255—285, on the duty of Christian Almsgiving; and Barrow's Spital Sermon, preached in Easter Week, 1671,—two rich storehouses of arguments for appeals to love of Christ and the poor in Him.

And, in a higher sense, make God your friend—make Christ your friend—by a right use (not a διασκοπισμὸς, v. 1) of their goods entrusted to you as their steward; i. e. by employing what you have received from them, in body, mind, and estate, in the divine service and for the divine glory, by works of piety and charity. See Luke xii. 42, on the πιστὸς οἰκονόμος.

— ἐκ τοῦ μαμωνᾶ] out of the mammon of unrighteousness. Observe ἐκ, out of; i. e. out of what at first may seem to promise no such result, elicit true riches from it, by securing God's friendship thereby. ἐκ marks a cause or source, 1 Cor. ix. 14, ἐκ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ζῆν. Luke xii. 15, ζῶ ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων. Cp. Rom. i. 4. James ii. 18. Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 352.

On the word μαμωνᾶς see Matt. vi. 24, μαμωνᾶ τῆς ἀδικίας, —the same thing as ἄδικος μαμωνᾶς, v. 11 (where see note); i. e. that wealth which often is procured unjustly (Jerome), and which the steward used dishonestly, and which is often a temptation to fraud; for the love of money is the root of all evil (1 Tim. vi. 10), and which is itself deceptive as being also uncertain (1 Tim. vi. 17) and fugitive. Cp. Prov. xxiii. 5, and “fundus mendax,” Horat. Od. iii. 1. 30; and “spem mentita seges,” Ep. i. 7. 87, as opposed to the “justissima tellus” of Virgil, Georg. ii. 460.

S. Aug. says (Serm. xiii.), on the true use of money, “Perde, ne perdas; dona, ut acquiras; semina, ut metas; has ‘divitias’ noli appellare, quia veræ non sunt, paupertate plenæ sunt, et semper obnoxie casibus. Ergo illæ sunt veræ divitiæ, quas, cum habuerimus, perdere non possumus. Quamdiu in terrâ sunt divitiæ, non sunt. Sed divitiæ vocat illas Mundus; Iniquitas vocat. Deus ideo mammonam iniquitatis vocat; quia divitiæ illas vocat Iniquitas.”

— ὅταν ἐκλίπητε] when ye fall, i. e. die. ἐκλείπω is used in this sense by LXX. Gen. xxv. 8, 17; xxxv. 29. Ps. civ. 29. Jer. xlii. 17. 22. Tob. xiv. 11. Judith vii. 22. Cp. Bp. Pearson, Pref. in LXX, p. 248, ed. Churton.

Some MSS. of high authority, A, B, D, L, R, X, and some Versions have ἐκλείπτω or ἐκλίπη here, and then the sense would be, When the wealth of this world shall fail you. But ἐκλείπτω or ἐκλείπη is found in E, F, G, H, K, M, P, S, U, V, Γ, Δ, Λ, and (as already said) this use of ἐκλείπω as an euphemism for death, is familiar to Hellenistic Greek, being of common use in the LXX; and the comparison in the parable clearly is between the dismissal of the unjust steward from his office and our removal from this life, and our last reckoning at the Judgment day.

— εἰς τὰς αἰωνίους σ.] into the everlasting habitations, opposed to the houses of clay into which the steward was received by his tenants. The friends, therefore, are pre-eminently God and Christ, to whom alone belong the everlasting habitations, and who will say, at the Great Day, to them on the right hand, “inherit the kingdom,” Matt. xxv. 34. See above, note on ποιήσατε — φίλους.

This Parable may be applied to the Clergy as stewards of God's Mysteries. Hence S. Jerome ad Algas, p. 196, “Passus dispendia dominus laudat dispensatoris prudentiam, quod adversus dominum quidem fraudulentem, sed pro se prudentem egerit. Quamto magis Christus, qui nullum damnum sustinere potest, et pronus est ad clementiam, laudabit discipulos suos, si in eos qui in se credituri sunt, misericordes fuerint! Si iniquitas benè dispensata vertitur in justitiam, quamto magis sermo divinus, in quo nulla est iniquitas, qui et Apostolis creditus est, si benè fuerit dispensatus dispensatores suos levabit in cælum.”

10. ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ] in what is least; for such is all earthly substance when compared with heavenly wealth, which is greatest; and the use we make of our earthly substance, which is least, is our trial whether we are fit to be admitted to possess what is greatest, that is, the everlasting wealth of heaven. These words are referred to by Clemens R. ii. 8, λέγει Κύριος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ, εἰ τὸ μικρὸν οὐκ ἐτήρησάτε, τὸ μέγα τίς ὑμῖν δώσει; λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν ὅτι ὁ πιστὸς ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ καὶ ἐν πολλῷ πιστὸς ἐστί.

11. Εἰ οὖν ἐν τῷ ἀδίκῳ] If you have not been faithful stewards of your earthly substance, which is illusory, God will not trust you with what is real; i. e. the wealth of eternity. Cp. S. Jerome, iv. 197, ad Algas, where is an exposition of this parable.

12. ἐν τῷ ἄλλοτρίῳ] in that which is another's; for your worldly wealth is not yours, but God's; you are not landlords, but stewards for a time, and liable to be called to your account at any moment (see above, xii. 20), and to be put out of your stewardship; and if you have not been faithful in that earthly trust which

13. οὐδὲλς—δύναται] See Matt. vi. 24.

14. Φαρισαῖοι φιλάργυροι] the Pharisees were lovers of money (see Matt. xxiii. 14), making Mammon their friend instead of God (see above, v. 9); and regarding worldly wealth and glory as the criterion of God's favour; "felicitatem in hac vitâ et divitias maximi pendentes," and allowing the love of the world to absorb the love of God. Cp. John xii. 43. James ii. 1—8. Joseph. Antt. xiii. 3. Jahn, Archæol. § 319.

—ἐξεμυκτήριζον] were sneering at Him; 'subsannabant, naso suspendebant,'—used by LXX for Hebr. צָחַץ (laugh). (Ps. ii. 4; xxii. 7.)

15. βδέλυγμα] an abomination; from βδελύσσω, abominor; and specially an idol. See Matt. xxiv. 15. That which you worship—mammon, your idol—is abhorred as a false god by the Most High. For, πλεονεξία is εἰδωλολατρεία, Col. iii. 5.

16. Ὁ νόμος κ.τ.λ.] The Law and the Prophets might indeed seem to promise earthly rewards; but now a spiritual Kingdom, with heavenly promises, is set up, and every one who desires to be saved must press into it with a holy violence; that is, it is not to be gained without the same anxious care and vehement endeavour, which the children of this world employ for the attainment of an earthly kingdom. See Matt. xi. 12.

And yet no one tittle of the Law, rightly understood, shall fail; for the Gospel is the perfection of the Law. See on Matt. v. 17.

—βιάζεται] presses by force. See Matt. xi. 12, 13. Cp. Luke xiii. 24. Xen. Cyr. iii. 3, εἰ βιάσαιντο εἶσο.

17. δέ] I have come with the Gospel; but not to take away the Law (Matt. v. 17).

18. Πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων] Every one that putteth away his wife and marieth another committeth adultery.

It is supposed by some that there is no connexion between this paragraph and what precedes or follows. But this is not probable. See above, x. 1; xii. 13; xiii. 18.

This sentence was indeed uttered by our Lord on other occasions (see on Matt. v. 31—33; xix. 9). Its repetition shows its importance; and it is fitly introduced here because it is relevant to the subject in hand, viz. the use to be made by men of the earthly blessings which God gives them, with a refutation of the Pharisaic errors on this point. This appears as follows:—

In God's Law, to which Christ had just been referring, Stealing and Adultery are connected. Thou shalt not commit adultery; thou shalt not steal; and, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife (Exod. xx. 14, 15, 17). Of all the earthly treasures committed in trust to man, none is so precious, none to be treated with so much reverence, as Woman—God's first and best gift to Man in Paradise (Gen. ii. 21—25). "House and Riches are the inheri-ance of fathers, and a prudent wife is from the Lord" (Prov. xix. 14; xviii. 22). "Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies" (Prov. xxxi. 10). "So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies, even as the Lord loveth the Church" (Eph. v. 25—28).

Accordingly, Christ connects Adultery with Covetousness. And in like manner St. Paul couples the one with the other. See on 1 Thess. iv. 6.

The Pharisees asked Christ,—Whether it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? (Matt. xix. 3;) and it was their practice (especially of those among them who belonged to the school of Hillel) to treat wedlock as a mere secular bargain, and to tie and untie the marriage knot at pleasure, and to sacrifice Matrimony to Mammon.

These considerations may serve to explain the introduction of that declaration in this place.

—ἀπολειμμένην] any divorced woman generally. An absolute prohibition from Christ Himself against marrying any woman that has been divorced. Such marriages are adulterous. See above on Matt. v. 32; xix. 9.

19. πορφύραν καὶ βύσσον] the purple, the outer attire; the dress of princes and nobles. Cf. Matt. xxvii. 28; the βύσσος, or fine linen of Egypt, being the inner clothing.

On this Parable, or parabolic history, see S. Gregor. Homil. xl. in Evangel. S. Chrys. Hom. quatuor de Lazaro, v. 220—260. S. Aug. Sermon. xiv. and xxvi. and xli.

20. Λάζαρος] Lazarus. Very appropriate as a name for a beggar, if derived from λᾶ (lo), non, and ἔζω (ezer), auxilium, 'quasi auxilio egens;' or, if it is the same word as ἑλεάζαρος, ἔζω ἵπ, it means, 'God (and not man) is my help.'

From the mention of this name some have supposed that this is not a Parable, but a History. (Cp. Cyril, p. 357.) And some have proceeded to assign an historical name (Niveus) to the rich man.

But the name Lazarus, by its etymology, seems to suggest that it was adopted on account of its meaning. Cp. Ezek. xiii. 4.

The beggar has a name; the rich man has none. There may be also something of a moral and spiritual meaning here (as suggested by some of the Fathers), viz. that Christ gives His saints 'a new name' (Rev. iii. 12); but that the name of the wicked, famous though they be in this world, is blotted out (Ps. lxx. 28).

On the connexion between the Parable of Lazarus and the Raising of Lazarus at Bethany, see on John xi. 1.

—ἐβέβλητο] had been laid,—to attract pity.

21. ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ κύνες] Such was his destitution, that even the very dogs, who were regarded as unclean animals by the Jews, were allowed to come and lick his sores, as if he were a corpse; and he was left to become almost food for the dogs before his death. (Cp. S. Chrys. Hom. de Lazaro.)

The only attention, and (so to speak) medical dressing which his sores received, was from the dogs, who came and licked them. (Cyril.)

— κόλπον Ἀβραάμ] Abraham's bosom. Immediately after his death, his soul on its separation from the body was carried by Angels to the place of peace and joy, where the faithful rest, and recline, as it were, at a spiritual banquet in the bosom (see John xiii. 23. 25; xxi. 20) of the Father of the Faithful (Gal. iii. 9. Rom. iv. 11. 16). Cp. S. Aug. de Anima, iv. 16, in Joann. Tract. xvi. The expression, "Bosom of Abraham," as the place of rest of faithful souls, was already familiar to the Jews. See Josephus de Macc. ii. p. 514, where the Maccabees say, οὐτω θανόντας ἡμᾶς Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ ὑποδέχονται εἰς τοὺς κόλπους αὐτῶν. (Wetst.) "Quid Abraham sinus nisi secretam requiem significat patrum?" *Greg. This place here called Abraham's bosom, is called Paradise Luke xxiii. 43. See note there. It was called "the Garden of Eden" by the Jews. See Lightfoot here.

On the intermediate state of the disembodied spirit, which does not sleep, but is in "rest and felicity," see the remarks and passages from the Fathers quoted by Bp. Bull, Sermon on Acts i. 25 (Serm. iii. vol. i. pp. 49—82).

The Office for the Burial of the Dead, in the Book of Common Prayer, particularly the last two prayers, declares the mind of the Church of England on this subject.

See also an excellent volume by the Rev. T. K. Miller, "Things after Death," Lond. 1848, pp. 1—64, and the notes on this Gospel below, xxiii. 43, and John xi. 11.

It is observable that the Holy Spirit, writing by St. Luke to the Gentiles, has been specially studious to record in this Gospel portions of our Lord's teaching, which might serve to correct the erroneous notions derived from heathen, mythological, and poetical representations of the Nekyia, Tartarus, &c., concerning the state of the soul immediately after death. Cp. Grotius, on Luke viii. 55, and Luke xxiii. 40. 43, and Townson, on the Gospels, pp. 192—196, and above, Introduction, p. 159.

— ἐτάφη] was buried; perhaps in a splendid mausoleum, with a laudatory epitaph. Not so Lazarus. Cp. S. Chrysost. Homil. ii. de Lazaro.

23. ἐν τῷ ἄδῃ] in Hades; the place of departed, disembodied spirits. (See on Acts ii. 27, and Wetstein here.) This place is to be carefully distinguished from γέεννα, or hell, properly so called (see Matt. v. 22. 29, 30).

This place of disembodied spirits is divided into two separate regions (see v. 26), between which there is an impassable gulf fixed for ever; and, therefore, to the general term ἄδης, is added here ἐν βασάνοις, in torments, to indicate that his soul was in a state of anguish, "having a dreadful expectation of a far greater torment to come;" "a fearful looking for of Judgment" (Heb. x. 27), while the soul of the beggar Lazarus is in rest and joy. (Cp. Bp. Bull, Sermon above quoted, p. 60.)

Hence it appears, that such as we are at our death, such shall we be at the judgment-seat of Christ. Clem. R. l. c., μετανοήσωμεν ἕως ἔρχομεν καιρὸν μετανόας· μετὰ γὰρ τὸ ἐξελεῖν ἡμᾶς ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου οὐκέτι δυνάμεθα ἐκεῖ ἐξομολογήσασθαι ἢ μετανοεῖν ἔτι. S. Cyprian, Fell. p. 163, "Qualem te invenit Dominus cum vocat, talem te judicat." See on Matt. v. 26, and below, v. 26.

— ἐν βασάνοις] in torment; long before the day of Judgment; 1800 years at least.

Hence it appears from Christ's words, that the wicked who died under the Law were punished in another state of being; and that the righteous were comforted, by virtue of His death, even before His Passion. And may not its efficacy have extended backward to those who lived up to the natural Law which was given them?

24. δακτύλου—γλῶσσαν] finger—tongue. "God is a Spirit," and yet, in order to give us an idea of His attributes, He speaks in the Holy Spirit of the Heart, Arm, Hand, Finger, and Mouth of God.

So here, in order that we may have some notion of the condition of disembodied spirits, our Lord uses words connected with body, in order to express the anguish, torment, and agony of the soul, and more appropriately, because the soul of Lazarus (and all the souls of the faithful) are represented as resting in "Abraham's bosom."

"Anguish, torment, agony," are all words derived from bodily suffering (angor, tormentum, ἀγωνία), and yet are usually applied to the soul.

The tongue appears to be specified, because he had specially sinned by sins of the palate, surfeiting and gluttony; and perhaps by proud and wicked words, their usual accompaniments.

On this question, why words relating to the body are used in this Parable which refers to the condition of the disembodied soul, see also the disquisition of Methodius, in Amphilochii Opera, p. 328—334.

— ἐν τῇ φλογὶ ταύτῃ] in this flame. The pains of the wicked immediately after their death, are to their pains after the resurrection, only as pains produced by a flame, compared with those of a lake of fire.

25. ἀπέλαβες] thou tookest off as thy portion and treasure, and spentest, so that nothing now remains.

On this text see the Sermon of Bp. Andrewes, ii. 78.

— σὺ] Omitted in some MSS. and Editions; but it adds to the force of the speech. There is a double contrast here.

— Λάzaρος ὁλοῖς τὰ κακά] Lazarus exhausted his evils; as thou thy good things—the sum total of them—in the other life.

To correct the notion that wealth, as such, excludes from happiness hereafter; or that poverty, as such, ensures fruition of that happiness, it is observed by the Fathers, e. g. S. August. in an admirable Sermon (Serm. xiv.), that the beggar Lazarus is carried by the Angels into the bosom of the rich man Abraham (Gen. xiv. 14; xxiv. 1), who made God his friend (2 Chron. xx. 7) by a right use of the riches of this world.

On other doctrinal and practical uses to be made of this statement, see Bp. Bull's Sermon above quoted.

26. χάσμα μέγα] a great gulf. "Inter hunc divitem," says S. Ambrose here, "et pauperem chaos magnum est, quia post mortem nequeunt merita mutari." See also S. August. Quæst. Evang. ii. 88. Matt. xii. 32.

27. Ἐρωτῶ σε οὖν] I pray thee therefore. This consideration for his father's house seems to bring out more forcibly the doctrine of the parable, that exemption from flagrant sin, such as the Pharisees indulged in, and social kindness and good nature, are not enough to save us from future torment; but that we must regard ourselves and all our substance, time, and talents, as God's property, to be used in His service, and that if we fail to do this, He will not only not "receive us into everlasting habitations," but consign us to torments immediately on our departure from this world; and those torments will be increased in intensity at the Great Day, when our bodies will be raised and reunited for ever to our souls.

28. ἕχω πέντε ἀδελφούς] I have five brethren still living on earth. Here is another proof that this Parable describes the condition of the disembodied soul, in the interval immediately after

29. Μωϋσέα καὶ τοὺς προφῆτας] Moses and the Prophets, i. e. the Old Testament. See Matt. xi. 13. Luke xxiv. 44, and Holtinger, Thesaur. Philol. pp. 454—456. Smith, Discourses on Prophecy, p. 301, and the authorities cited in the Editor's Lectures on the Canon of Scripture, Lect. ii. pp. 30—40.

Here is a remarkable testimony from Christ Himself, speaking by the Father of the faithful in the world of departed Spirits, that the Jews have "Moses and the Prophets;" i. e. that the "Canon of the Old Testament" is, what it was believed by the Jews to be, viz. the Word of God, speaking by Moses and the Prophets; and that it had been preserved in purity and integrity by the Jewish Church to our Lord's age, whence it has come down to our own; that it is genuine, authentic, and divine, and not, as some, contradicting Christ, would now have us believe, a mere farrago of fragments put together by writers more recent than "Moses and the Prophets;" and that its testimony is so cogent, that they who will not receive it as such, are in so hardened and desperate a state, that they would not be persuaded, even though one rose from the dead.

Our Lord intimates also, that men come into the torments of Hades, as the Rich Man did, because they will not hear the Holy Scriptures delivered to them by God, and guarded by the Church. See next note.

31. οὐδὲ ἐάν τις ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀναστῇ] not even though one rose from the dead. One did rise from the dead, and his name was Lazarus, raised by Christ. (John xi. 44.) But the Chief Priests did not believe; they even "consulted that they might put Lazarus to death." (John xii. 10, 11.) And Another rose from the dead. He, who raised Lazarus, raised Himself. Still, they would not believe, but sought to kill them who preached the Resurrection of Christ. (Acts iv. 2, 3.)

All this was, because they would not hear "Moses and the Prophets." What then will be the condition of those, who refuse to hear Moses and the Prophets, Christ and the Apostles, speaking in the Old and New Testaments?

CH. XVII. 1. Ἀνένδεκτον] It is impossible. οὐκ ἐνδέχεται, Luke xiii. 33. The circumstances of the case do not admit of any other result. See note on Matt. xviii. 7, and on Luke xii. 49.

On the use of the τοῦ, see on Acts x. 25.

2. λυσιτελεῖ] it is profitable. "Tributum solvit, utilitatem affert." (Valck.)

— μύλος ονικός] Matt. xviii. 6. B, D, L, have λίθος μυλικός.

3. ἐάν ἀμάρτη] Matt. xviii. 15—21.

5. Πρόσθετε ἡμῖν πίστιν] Add faith to us; not, 'increase our faith,'—'appone nobis fidem,'—give faith in addition to our other privileges, powers, and virtues. For a further exposition see below on v. 19.

6. ἐλέγετε ἔν] ye would have said.

— τῇ συκαμίνῳ ταύτῃ] to this mulberry-tree; 'morus nigra sanguinea,' Virg. Ecl. vi. 22. 'Morus nigrum,' Horat. Sat. ii. 4. 22. See Billerbeck, Flora Classica, p. 229. Winer, Lex. ii. p. 62. It seems to be derived from the Hebr. שִׁיקְמָה (shikmah), which is rendered in the LXX by συκαμίνος, 1 Chron. xxvii. 28, and in other places. The συκομορέα of Scripture is the Ficus Egyptia. On the meaning of the sentence see Matt. xvii. 20. Mark xi. 23. 1 Cor. xiii. 2.

— ὑπήκουσεν ἔν] would have obeyed you. On this verse, where the particle ἂν occurs twice, Valck. makes a memorable remark, viz. that this use of ἂν is only found seven times in the Psalms and Prophetic Books (Isa. i. 9. Ezek. iii. 6. Obad. v. 5. Ps. liv. 13; lxxx. 15; cviii. 9; cxiii. 3).

Would this remark aid in settling the question concerning the date and authorship of the translation of the Books in the LXX? This use of ἂν is rare in St. Matthew and St. Mark; more common in St. Luke and St. John. On the very rare occurrence of ἂν with the infinitive in the N. T., and, in certain cases, with the optative, see on 2 Cor. x. 9.

7. Τίς δὲ ἐξ ὑμῶν] But who of you? The reason why ye have not faith is, that ye consider God as your Debtor for service rendered by you, instead of humbly regarding yourselves as indebted to Him for all your power to serve Him, and as unprofitable servants,—servants of whom He has no need, and who cannot be profitable to Him (Job xxii. 2; xxxv. 7. Ps. xvi. 2. Rom. xi. 35),—i. e. as not laying your Master under any obligation, even though you should do all that He commands you; for that is what you owe to Him, ὁφείλετε, v. 10. "Non est beneficium sed officium facere quod debetis" (Senec. Controv. ii. 13). All your power of working in His service, and all your future reward for service, is of His free grace alone. See Rom. i. 5; iv. 4; xi. 6. 1 Cor. xv. 10. Eph. iii. 7, 8, 16. Cp. Bp. Beveridge and Professor Browne on Art. XIV. "on Works of Supererogation."

The connexion, therefore, with the preceding verse is,—'You ask for Faith. Faith is a grace; grace is a gift of God; and to him that hath shall be given, and he shall have more abundantly.' (Matt. xiii. 12. Mark iv. 25. Luke viii. 18.) You must therefore have grace,—you must be sensible that you have no merit of your own, for you are not your own (1 Cor. vi. 19; vii. 23); that you owe all service to God, whose you are by nature and grace. "Nemo in operibus gloriatur," says S. Ambrose, "quia jure Domino debemus obsequium; et dum vivimus debemus semper operari;" and you must be conscious that you can do nothing without God; that without Him you are unprofitable; and you must pray for His grace—and rely on Him, and ascribe to Him alone all that you can do; and then you will have faith, and be able to remove all the obstacles in your way. Cp. Matt. xvii. 20, and below, v. 19.

thanks ? The Apostle St. Paul seems to refer to this question, and to put the matter in the true light, when he says of himself (1 Tim. i. 12), χάριν ἔχω τῷ ἐνδυναμώσαντί με Χριστῷ. 2 Tim. i. 3, χάριν ἔχω τῷ Θεῷ ᾧ λατρεύω.

10. ὅταν ποιήσητε] when ye have done all that has been commanded you ;—which will never be ; but Christ reminds us how high the standard of duty is, in order to teach us humility.

— δοῦλοι ἀχρεῖοί ἐσμεν] we are unprofitable servants. Yet Christ says, “Cast ye the unprofitable servant into the outer darkness” (Matt. xxv. 30),—and He also says, “Well done, good and faithful servant” (xxv. 21. 23). Therefore, though man cannot be profitable to God (see note on v. 7), yet one servant may be more unprofitable than another ; and all are obliged to be δοῦλοι πιστοὶ καὶ ἀγαθοί : and in order that they may be so, they must be sensible that of themselves they are ἀχρεῖοι, and pray for God’s grace to make them σκευὴ εἰς τιμὴν ἡγιασμένα, ἐν χρηστῇ τῷ Θεῷ εἰς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἡτοιμασμένα (2 Tim. ii. 21).

What God will reward in us hereafter is not our desert, but His grace in us. “Coronabit gratiam suam,” says S. August. When, therefore, we say that we are unprofitable servants, we speak of ourselves abstractedly considered as ourselves, and not of God’s grace in us, which makes us εὐχρηστους εἰς διακονίαν. (2 Tim. iv. 11. Phil. 11.)

Of ourselves we are ἀχρεῖοι, and yet we shall be condemned if we are ἀχρεῖοι (see Matt. xxv. 30) ; for it is our duty to improve the grace of God that is given us, so that we may not be ἀργοὶ καὶ ἔκκαρποι in the day of the Lord (2 Pet. i. 8). Hence it is true that “Miser est quem Dominus servum inutilem appellat, beatus, qui se ipse.” (Beng.)

— ὃ ὠφείλομεν] what we ought to do. Why boastest thou ? Dost thou not know that thou art in danger if thou payest not thy debts ? and if thou payest them, thou hast no claim to thanks. (S. Cyril.)

So even if we did all that is commanded us, we should not have conferred a favour on God, but have only paid a debt ; and since we leave undone many things that we ought to do, and do many that we ought not, we have more need to plead for pardon, than to ask for reward.

11. Καὶ ἐγένετο] The lesson on the need of grace, and on the duty of thankfully ascribing all the good that we can do to God’s grace preventing and following us, introduces naturally the succeeding narrative on the blessedness of gratitude to God, in the case of the Samaritan leper, and on the prevalence of the sin of ingratitude in the world, exemplified by the nine.

— διὰ μέσου] between Samaria and Galilee. Our Lord was now going up to the Feast at Jerusalem. He was not willing to scandalize the Samaritans, who would be offended by seeing His face set to go up to Jerusalem (see above, ix. 52, 53).

And He would not give offence to the Jews by preaching to the Samaritans. (Jerome.) He gave the first offer of salvation to the Jews.

Thus He gave a remarkable practical illustration of His own precepts in this chapter concerning offences (xvii. 1, 2). He went along the boundary line of Galilee and Samaria, having Galilee on the left hand and Samaria on the right. He then crossed the Jordan, perhaps at Scythopolis, where was a bridge, into Perea, and then went southward till He crossed the Jordan again near Jericho, and so came to Jerusalem. (See Welstein).

Illustrations of this use of διὰ μέσου may be seen in the Editor’s “Athens and Attica,” cap. xxiv.

He travelled between Galilee and Samaria, rejected by one and not received by the other, and He went to Jerusalem to be crucified. “He came unto His own, and His own received Him not.” (John i. 11.) It is said by some (e. g. Meyer, p. 432 ; cp. him on Matt. xix. 1) that St. Luke’s account is inconsistent with that of St. Matthew and St. Mark (x. 1), who say that our Lord went by Perea. But this is an error. St. Luke’s account is supplementary to theirs, not at variance with it.

12. ἔστησαν πόρρωθεν] they stood afar off ; perhaps crying, “Unclean, Unclean !” See Levit. xiii. 45.

14. ἐπιδείξατε ἑαυτοὺς] See on Matt. viii. 4.

— τοῖς ἱερεῦσι] to the Priests, i. e. of Jerusalem. It is imagined by some that Christ sent the Samaritan to a Samaritan priest. But Christ sent the Samaritan to the Priests—the Jewish priests — and thus taught him a salutary lesson to the soul, viz. “that salvation is of the Jews” (John iv. 22). And the obedience of the Samaritan was more exemplary on this account.

15. ὑπέστρεψε] he turned back, before he had shown himself to the priest ; and so the paramount importance of Thankfulness is brought out more forcibly. Hence it appears that Gratitude to God, and, in like manner, other Moral Virtues grounded on Love and Faith, have an obligation prior and superior to that of all positive law. Cp. on Matt. ix. 13, and Luke vi. 1—9 ; xiii. 10—16 ; xiv. 3. 5.

17. οἱ δέκα] Were not the ten cleansed ? but the nine—where are they ?

18. ἄλλογενής] stranger. The Samaritan is so called because of his Assyrian extraction. (Cyril, p. 367.) See above on x. 31.

Although our Lord, not willing to give offence to the Jews and Samaritans by going through Samaria to the Feast at Jerusalem (see on v. 11), did not go to the Samaritans, yet the Samaritans are welcomed by Him. The one Samaritan leper comes back to Christ and is blessed, while the other nine lepers pass on, and forfeit the blessing.

19. ἡ πίστις σου] thy faith hath saved thee. This word faith is the clue which connects this history with the request of the Apostles in v. 5. Our Lord’s reply to them here may be thus paraphrased : You ask me to give you Faith in addition to your other privileges and supposed virtues. Look not merely to the giver, but look also to yourselves the recipients. I cannot give, unless you are rightly disposed to receive ; you must banish all thoughts of your having any merit of your own, to which faith is to be added (see v. 5). And think not that faith is a thing to be added ; imagine not that it is to be merely an appendage (ἐν προσθήκῃς κρείε) to other graces and virtues. No ; it is the root and ground of all virtue. You must begin with believing in Me. And say not, “add to us ;” suppose not, that it is to be added to you, as if you were something in yourselves. No ; you must empty yourselves of yourselves, before you can receive an infusion of divine grace, giving you faith.

The Holy Spirit enforces this lesson by recording the history of the grateful Samaritan ; and so teaches Christ’s disciples by the example of a stranger (v. 18), of whom it is declared by Christ that he had faith, a saving faith by which he removed the sycamine tree of his own leprosy, a Scriptural image of sin, and had shown that Faith, by clear-sighted appreciation of the great duty of thankful ascription of all praise and glory to God alone (v. 15).

The Holy Spirit, writing by St. Luke to the Gentiles, records, with particular prominence and emphasis, portions of our Lord's teaching which inculcate the duty of Prayer (see above, v. 16), a duty little understood and still less practised by the Heathen world. He also recommends, in a similar manner, that of Thanksgiving, which was still less understood and practised than that of Prayer. There are some Prayers in Homer's Poems, but how few Thanksgivings! See above, Introduction, p. 160.

20. μετὰ παρατηρήσεως] with observation. παρατηρεῖν is used by the LXX for the Hebr. שמר (shamar), 'to keep watch,' and the sense is, Do not suppose that the Kingdom of the Messiah is such, that its approach is to be observed from a watch-tower, like the march of a victorious army coming on with triumphal pomp and retinue. No; it is within you; its way must be prepared in your hearts. (Cyril.)

21. ἐντὸς ὑμῶν ἐστίν] it is within yourselves. "The word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it." (Deut. xxx. 14.) Ask not about times and seasons; but rather be in earnest for the kingdom of heaven, in the preparation of your own hearts for its reception. Make a road for it there. Prepare a highway for it there. (See above, iii. 4.) It depends on yourselves, on your own wills, and on your own tempers, whether you will receive it or no. See Cyril, p. 542.

22. ἐπιθυμήσετε] ye shall desire. He had spoken to the Pharisees, and now He adds, The time is coming when even you, my disciples, in your troubles, will desire earnestly to see even a single one of the days of the Son of Man, and ye shall not see it. You will expect Me to interfere, and rescue you, and destroy your enemies. (Cyril.) But the End is not yet. "In patience possess ye your souls." When I come, it will be unexpectedly; and so far from destroying Mine enemies at once, I must first suffer much from them; and the world will go on, eating and drinking, careless of Me and of My coming (as in the days of Noah and of Lot), till I shall come like Lightning from Heaven.

26—28. ἡμέρας Νῶε—Δῶτ] days of Noë—Lot. On these two Judgments, one by Water, the other by Fire, as types and rehearsals of the circumstances of the Universal Judgment by Fire of the Great Day, see 2 Pet. ii. 5, 6. Jude 7.

27. Ἦσθιον] Were eating and drinking—this was their life.

29. ἐβρεξε] ὁ Θεὸς, Matt. v. 45, God rained fire. The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrhæ is not attributed in Scripture to the agency of Water (i. e. to the waters of the sea of Sodom) drowning them, but of Fire (Gen. xix. 23—28). But the soil itself was also convulsed, and the waters of the Jordan, which before flowed through that region, were pent up in the Lacus Asphaltites, or Dead Sea,—a striking emblem of the Lake of Fire. See above, on Mark ix. 49.

31. Ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ] In that day. ἡμέρα is here used, in a larger sense, for the time, whether longer or shorter, in which Christ is now coming to every man singly by death.

— ἐπὶ τοῦ δώματος] on the housetop. The Holy Spirit here records these sayings of our Blessed Lord independently of any explicit reference to the taking of Jerusalem, and thus teaches us that they not only relate to that event (see on Matt. xxiv. 17—20), but have a general meaning, applicable to all ages of the Spiritual Jerusalem, or Christian Church; and especially to the Latter Days.

He that is on the housetop, devoted to a holy life of prayer and meditation, let him not descend to earthly cares and interests. (Ambrose.) He that "has put his hand to the plough" (Luke ix. 62) and is engaged in the field of the Church, let him not turn back to the world, but rather forget the things that are behind and press forward (Phil. iii. 13). S. Aug. Qu. Evang. ii. 41. Theoph. See note on Matt. xxiv. 17—26.

32.] On this text see the Sermon of Bp. Andrewes, ii. 61.

33. ζωογονήσει] 'vivipariet' (Acts vii. 19), an expressive word, derived from animal parturition, bringing forth to air and life what was before concealed in the womb. That day shall come as the pains of labour (ὠδίνες) on a woman in travail (see on Matt. xxiv. 8); but to the saints of God it shall be the birth of the soul and body to life and glory everlasting. See S. Ignat. ad Rom. c. 6, and notes below on Acts ii. 24.

34. δύο ἐπὶ κλίνης μιᾶς, κ.τ.λ.] two men in one bed. Not out circumstances, but our hearts, will determine our future condition. (S. Cyril.) See on Matt. xxiv. 40.

35. ἀλήθουσai] grinding. Perhaps a reference to the trials of the fearful night in Exod. xi. 5. (Euseb.)

36. δύο ἔσονται ἐν τῷ ἀγρῷ· ὁ εἰς παραληφθήσεται καὶ ὁ ἕτερος ἀφεθήσεται] This stands as v. 36 in Elz., but it is not in A, B, E, G, H, K, L, M, Q, R, S, V, X, Γ, Δ, Λ, Lr. Probably it has been brought into the text of some MSS. from the margin, where it had been written as a parallel from St. Matthew.

CH. XVIII. 1. πάντοτε προσεύχεσθαι] Here follows a Lesson,—

1. On the Duty of Prayer (vv. 1—8).

2. On the right manner of Prayer (vv. 9—14).

3. On the duty of Intercessory Prayer, and on the privileges of Benediction (vv. 15, 16).

See above on Luke v. 16. Bp. Andrewes, Preparation to Prayer, v. p. 354. Dr. Barrow's Sermon on 1 Thess. v. 17, and Sermon vi. vol. i. p. 107, and below, xxiv. 53.

— ἐγκακεῖν] to faint. Said properly of a coward (κακὸς) in battle. Prayer is here spoken of as a militia or warfare. The arms of the Church are Prayers. The Church Militant is the Church Suppliant. Her congregations for public Prayer are her armies of Soldiers storming the Gates of Heaven with a siege of prayers. "Hæc vis Deo grata est." (Tertullian.)

Some MSS. have ἐγκακεῖν here, e.g. E, G, M, R, S, V, X, Γ, Δ; others have ἐγκακεῖν or ἐγκακεῖν, e.g. A, B*, D, H, K, Q, L, U, Δ. See 2 Cor. iv. 1. 16.

3. ἤρχετο] used to come often. 'Ventitabat.' (Grot.)

4. ἤθελεν] So A, B, D, L, Q, R, X, Lr. and preferable to ἠθέλησεν, as showing a habit.

— ἐν ἑαυτῷ] in himself, secretly. Our Lord by this expression, frequently used in His Parables (see xvi. 3, 4, and xviii. 11), reminds us that He is the Searcher of hearts—a doctrine very necessary for the Gentiles. Cp. Horat. 1 Epist. xvi. 54—62.

— τὸν κ.τ.λ.] "Symbolum athei potentis." (Beng.)

5. διὰ γε] 'at certè.'

— εἰς τέλος] The Authorized Version has 'by her continual coming,' and this seems to be the true meaning; i.e. lest coming to the end—διατελὲς, εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς (Heb. x. 1. 12. 14), never ceasing to come—she bruise me; εἰς τέλος = Hebr. לְעוֹלָם (lanetsah), 'in æternum' (Ps. ix. 18; x. 11; xlv. 23).

— ὑπωπιάζ[ω] bruise me, 'sugillet me.' S. Aug. Quæst. Evang. ii. 45, 'obtundat me.' See on 1 Cor. ix. 27, ὑπωπιάζω μου τὸ σῶμα, a word derived from pugilists, who strike the face under the eyes (ὕπωπον), and make it black and blue by contusion. See the examples in Weiststein. Hence, in popular language, it means, like Latin obtundo; to worry, to bore to death.

The unjust Judge represents himself as the injured person—as ὑπωπιασμένον by a poor widow!

6. ὁ κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας] On this use of the genitive, see on xvi. 8, τὸν οἰκονόμον τῆς ἀδικίας, and on Matt. xxiv. 15.

7. Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς κ.τ.λ.] The righteous Judge of all (2 Tim. iv. 8. Heb. xii. 23) shall not He make τὴν ἐκδίκησιν, His award, that award which is determined, and shall not He judge the cause of His elect, who cry to Him on earth, and whose spirits pray to Him from under the altar, where they have been slain as sacrifices to Him? (Rev. vi. 10. 2 Esdr. xv. 8, 9. Eccles. xxxv. 17.)

The case of the Widow is that of the Christian Church, now a Widow in the world, and subject to persecution and distress, till the return of Her Lord, who is the righteous Judge of quick and dead; "donec Sponsus è celo redeat ad judicium." (Aug.)

S. Augustine asks,—How is this saying of Christ to be reconciled with His precept to pray for our enemies (Matt. v. 44)? The Vindicta desired, he says, is to be effected "conversione ad iustitiam, aut amissâ per supplicium potestate, quâ nunc adversus bonos valent."

Perhaps, however, the true solution of the question is to be found in the meaning of the words ἐκδικεῖν and ἐκδικήσις, used here and in Rev. vi. 10; of which the essential sense is 'doing justice to an injured party,' and the infliction of punishment on any other party is only per accidens.

The word 'avenge' in our authorized Version is from the Vulgate 'facere vindictam,' and may suggest an improper meaning, unless explained from the original.

Indeed, the drift of the whole passage is to discourage and forbid revenge; for it commands Prayer, i.e. the laying of all our griefs before God, who forbids us to avenge ourselves (Rom. xii. 19), and requires us to forgive, if we desire to be forgiven (Matt. xviii. 35).

— καὶ μακροθυμῶν ἐπ' αὐτοῖς] although He is long-suffering over them, and delays to execute vengeance in their cause. For this use of μακροθυμεῖν, see Eccles. xxxii. 18, LXX, and cp. Rom. ii. 4. 1 Pet. iii. 20. 2 Pet. iii. 9; and see James v. 7—10 on the sense of μακροθυμία and μακροθυμῶ.

On the use of ἐπὶ see Acts xi. 19, θλίψις ἐπὶ Στεφάνῳ. (Glass. Phil. p. 562. Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 373.)

For μακροθυμῶν some MSS.—A, B, D, L, Q, X,—have μακροθυμεί, a reading which deserves consideration. They cry unto Him night and day, and yet He delays to execute vengeance in their cause.

The best illustration of this text is to be derived from the prayer of the disembodied souls of the Elect of God, under the Altar (Rev. vi. 9, 10), which cry with a loud voice, saying,—How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge (ἐκδικεῖς) our blood on them that dwell on the earth? i.e. on the Powers of this World.

8. ἐν τάχει] speedily. And yet eighteen centuries are passed since these words were spoken; and what is described as near is not yet come. Cp. Rev. i. 3; xii. 10. Rom. xiii. 12. Phil. iv. 5. Heb. x. 25. 37. James v. 8, where the day of Judgment is described as close at hand. For so it is, in the eye of Almighty God, who thus speaks in the Scriptures inspired by Him, and to whom a thousand years are as one day (2 Pet. iii. 8); and because it is near at hand relatively; as all events in time are when compared with eternity, for which man is designed; and so (as Augustine says) the Creation itself, which took place 4000 years before, is to an immortal being but an event of yesterday; and because, in fact, the day of Judgment comes to each man at the day of his death, which cannot be far from any one.

These considerations are necessary for the proper interpretation of Scripture Prophecy, which partakes "of the nature of its Divine Author;" with Whom a Millennium is but a Moment.

— Πλὴν] And yet—though the day of retribution is so near at hand—will the Son of Man, when He cometh, find the faith on Earth? No; "the Love of many will wax cold in the latter days, and many will depart from the faith." Matt. xxiv. 12. 1 Tim. iv. 1. (Cyril.)

The Earth is here contrasted with the children of Light and with the Kingdom of Heaven. The tribes of the Earth will wail because of Him. Cp. Rev. i. 7; iii. 10, τοὺς κατοικοῦντας ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, and xiii. 8. 14; xiv. 6; and xviii. 3, οἱ ἔμποροι τῆς γῆς, and see below on xxi. 35. The tribes of the Earth are they who have their hearts and their treasure here below, upon earth, and not above, in heaven.

The World will have little faith in God's retributive Justice. It will say, "Where is the promise of His Coming?" (2 Pet. iii. 3, 4.) Men will forget Him and live worldly lives, and magnify themselves as if God were not King and Judge of the Earth, and as if they had no account to render to Him. And even many of the good will faint through fear (Matt. xxiv. 12). Therefore "pray always," and do not lay down your arms in this divine warfare. "Ut oremus credamus, et ut ipsa non deficiat fides, quā oramus, oremus. Fides fundit Orationem; fusa Oratio fidei im-petrat firmitatem." (S. Aug. Sermon. xc.)

9. ἐφ' ἑαυτοῖς] in themselves, not in God.
— τοὺς λοιποὺς] the rest of the world. Cp. v. 11, οἱ λοιποὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων.

10. εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν προσεύξασθαι] to the Temple to pray. Probably at one of the stated times of prayer, sacrifice, and offering of incense in the Temple, on which see Acts ii. 15; iii. 1; x. 9. Lightfoot on the Temple Service, chap. ix. vol. i. p. 946. Jahn, Arch. § 396. For an exposition of this parable, see Basil. Seleuc. p. 180.

11. σταθεὶς] having taken his stand like a statue. "Notat Pharisei superbiā, qui in loco Templi conspicuo instar statue stans erectus, magnā cum affectatione pietatem mentiebatur, oppositē ad modestum Publicanum, qui, oculis in terram dejectis, in angulum quendam se abdidit." (Valck.)

— πρὸς ἑαυτὸν—προσηύχετο] was praying with himself; that is, secretly, whispering as it were with his own voice into his own ear, "Labra movens, metuens audiri," while he was recounting his own merits in prayer! He prayed with his eye fixed on himself, and only glancing, as it were, at God.

There is a contrast in this respect, as in others, between the Publican and the Pharisee; the Publican was not ashamed to confess himself openly to be a sinner. All could hear his ejaculation, "God be merciful to me the sinner."

The Pharisee prayed to himself. His prayer was such as could not be made audible to men; and yet (such is the force of self-deceit!) it is offered to God! Such a prayer is well described by Horat. (Epist. xvi. 60), and better still by Persius (Sat. ii. 5):

"At bona pars procerum tacitū libabit acerrā.
Haud cuivis promptum est murmurque humilesque susurros
Tollere de templis, et aperto vivere voto."

"Quid rogaverit Deum quære in verbis ejus, nihil invenies; ascendit orare; noluit orare, sed se laudare: parum est non Deum laudare, et se laudare, insuper et roganti Publicano insultare." Aug. (Serm. cxv.)

Our Lord, by revealing to us the secret prayer of this Pharisee, reminds us that in praying to Him we are dealing with One who reads the heart.

— οἱ λοιποὶ] the rest of mankind; "omnes præter ipsum." (S. Aug.)

He censures God in his prayer: Thou hast not one righteous on earth but me, ἐγὼ Σὺ μόνος τῆς ἀρετῆς θησαυρός· ἔρημος ἂν εἴη δικαιοσύνης ἡ γῆ, εἰ μὴ ταύτην ἐπάτουν ἐγώ. Basil. Seleuc. (p. 183.)

"Gratias agit de malis quæ in aliis videt!" Bernard (De Grad. Humil.)

A remarkable proof of self-deceit. He had begun with deceiving others with a specious show of sanctity. He ends with deceiving himself; and he even thinks to deceive God. He draws a flattering portrait of himself, and holds it up for admiration to the eyes of God. And this is his prayer!

Because he had tampered with the truth, God gave him over to a reprobate mind, and he had become a prey to the Tempter; the God of this world blinded his eyes. Therefore, "Thou blind Pharisee!" says Christ, to such deceivers and deceived as this. (Matt. xxiii. 26.)

Here is a solemn warning to all to revere the voice of Conscience, and to obey God's Word, and to cherish the motions of the Spirit of Truth in the soul, and to pray for a clean heart, and to be cleansed from secret faults.

Here also is a solution of the mystery, which would otherwise be very perplexing, that men can quiet their consciences, and go up to the Temple to pray, and attempt to deceive the Omniscient, and yet be easy in their minds, and claim veneration from the world. They, like the Pharisees, have indulged themselves in spiritual pride, and have despised others, and have not conformed with meekness and humility to God's holy will and words, and they are punished by self-delusion. They are deceived by the Tempter into attempting to deceive God.

— οὗτος ὁ τελώνης] this Publican! He would not miss the opportunity of calling his neighbour by a contemptuous name ('this Publican'), even in his prayers, and even when that neighbour was beating his breast in penitential sorrow and prayer.

12. δις τοῦ σαββάτου] twice in the week; on Monday and Thursday. See Theophylact, Lightfoot, and Weststein here; and Buxtorf, De Synagog., ch. xiv. p. 279: "Nam Mosem die quinto montem Sinai secundo descendisse, et die Lunæ descendisse." Theophyl. adds correctly: σαββατα αὐτὸν ἐβδομάδα (the week) ἔλεγον πληθυντικῶς, ὅθεν καὶ μίαν σαββάταν τὴν παρ' ὑμῖν κυριακὴν ἐκάλουν, παρὰ γὰρ Ἑβραίοις τὸ μίαν σημαίνει ταύτην τῷ πρώτῃ.

— ὅσα κτῶμαι] whatsoever I acquire. He boasts of his wealth. "De omnibus rebus meis utcumque minutis decimas pendo." This was in the true spirit of the Pharisees, who said, "Show me my duty, and I will do it; and show me what is more than my duty, and I will do that." It was his duty to pay tithe (Numb. xviii. 21. Deut. xiv. 22), but not of mint, anise, and cummin; and, in his minute and scrupulous curiosity about that, he forgot the weightier matters of the Law.

13. μακρόθεν ἐστὼς] standing afar off. In the same court as the Pharisee, that of the Israelites (see v. 11, οὗτος ὁ τελώνης), but not pressing forward toward the Holy Place.

— ἔτυπεν εἰς τὸ στήθος] was beating on his breast, and had his eyes fixed on the ground, while the Pharisee was standing as a statue. What a contrast!

Our Lord, who reads the heart, and therefore needs no interpreter of it, and teaches "that God is a Spirit and must be worshipped in spirit and in truth" (John iv. 24), yet does not omit to specify and approve these outward acts of the Publican as fit exponents of inward devotion. Man is composed of body and soul. And God, who made both, requires no less the reverence of the body than the devotion of the soul. He detests profaneness no less than He abhors hypocrisy. Christ twice drove the buyers and sellers even from the outer courts of the Temple, which was less holy than the Church.

It cannot, therefore, be doubted, that where decent and edifying outward forms are prescribed by competent Authority, there compliance with those forms is pleasing in His sight, and is an essential part of duty to Him. Cp. 1 Cor. xi. 4—16.

— ἱλάσθητί μοι ἔλεος μοι γένοιτο (Phavorin.), 'propitius esto.' Cp. on Matt. xvi. 22.

— τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ] the sinner. The Pharisee was the saint in his own eyes, and the Publican was the sinner. To the Pharisee, all the rest of the world were sinners (v. 11), and he singled out his neighbour the Publican for condemnation as such. The Publican thought of no one's sins but his own. He was the sinner above all in his own sight, and as such he smote on his breast, and prayed for pardon, God be merciful to me the sinner. Cp. St. Paul's language, 1 Tim. i. 15, and see on Rom. v. 7.

14. δεδικαιωμένος—ἢ] justified, acquitted and pardoned, not more than the other, but rather than the other.

The ellipsis of μᾶλλον is seen in Gen. xxxviii. 26, δεδικαιώται ὁ ἄμαρ ἢ ἐγὼ, 'rather than I.' Ps. cxviii. 8, ἀγαθὸν πεποιθέναι ἐπὶ κύριον ἢ ἐπ' ἀνθρώπων. Matt. xviii. 8; above, xv. 7. See Glass. Phil. S. p. 274. And this comparison is tantamount to a strong negative of the second member of the sentence. See the examples, ibid. p. 465 1 Cor. vii. 9. 1 Pet. iii. 17, i. e. in this case the Pharisee was not justified, but condemned. As Euthym. here well says, ὁ ἱκαιοῦσας μόνον ἑαυτὸν κατεδικάσθη παρὰ Θεοῦ, ὁ δὲ καταδικάσας μόνον ἑαυτὸν ἐδικαιώθη παρὰ Θεοῦ, and Tertullian, c. Marc. iv. 36, "Alterum reprobatum alterum justificatum descendisse," and S. Aug. "Superbia in Pharisæo de templo damnata descendit, et humilitas in Publicano ante Dei oculos approbata descendit."

— ἢ γὰρ ἐκεῖνος.] So the majority of the best MSS., A, E, G, H, K, M, P, Q, S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Δ, and about 150 Cursives: ἢ ἐκεῖνος, the reading of Elz., is only in a few Cursives. B and L have παρ' ἐκεῖνον. The γὰρ, Winer says, G. G. p. 216, is without example. But γὰρ serves to mark transition; and perhaps it is introduced for euphony, to soften the harsh hiatus between ἢ and ἐκεῖνος, and to strengthen the assertion. See Luke viii. 17, 18; ix. 24—26; xix. 10. Acts xvi. 37, οὐ γὰρ ἄλλ' ἐλθόντες. John vii. 41, μὴ γὰρ ἐκ τῆς Γαλιλαίας ὁ Χριστὸς ἐρχεται; ix. 30, ἐν γὰρ τούτῳ θαυμαστόν ἐστιν. Gal. i. 10, ἄρτι γὰρ ἀνθρώπους πείλω;

Indeed, if we regard γὰρ etymologically, i. e. as formed of γε ἔρα (Hoogeveen), the sense of ἢ γὰρ here is obvious.

15. Προσέφερον κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xix. 13—15. Mark x. 13—

In ramo nihil commiserunt, sed in radice perierunt. Benedicat pusillos cum magnis. Causam parvulorum Domini commendamus majoribus. Nihil habent mali nisi quod de fonte traxerunt. 35. Ἐγένετο δὲ, κ.τ.λ.] On the time and place of the healing of the blind man, see on Matt. xx. 29—34, and on Mark x. 46—52.

— Ἱεριχὼ] Jericho, in the tribe of Benjamin (Joseph. Antt. xviii. 21), on the borders of Ephraim (xvi. 17), in a fair and fertile, well-watered country, celebrated for its balsam and its palm-trees (Strabo, xvi. p. 763. Plin. v. 14. Reland, pp. 384. 829. Lightfoot, Works, ii. 43); 150 stadia east from Jerusalem, and 60 west from the river Jordan. Robinson, Palestine, ii. pp. 273—304. The city had been much beautified by Herod (Joseph. Antt. xvi. 5), who had a palace there; and it was now the next city to Jerusalem in importance. It is now called Richa or Ericha, and is almost deserted.

38. Ἰησοῦ Τίε Δαυὶδ] Jesus, thou Son of David! See the blind man's faith. The crowd had said (v. 37), that "Jesus of Nazareth" passeth by. But the blind man would not address Him by that title; but he invokes Him as 'Jesus, the Son of David.' The crowd was blind, the blind man saw, and condemned the blindness of the crowd.

CH. XIX. 1. διήρχετο] He was passing through; i. e. He was not going to make any stay there; but was induced to wait awhile, v. 5. 7. 9, at the house of Zacchæus.

2. Ζακχαῖος] Zacchæus. The name (which occurs in the Talmud, see Lightfoot) shows him to have been a Jew, and therefore more obnoxious to his countrymen, as an instrument in the hands of the Romans, for exacting taxes from them; being, as he was, a chief of the hated order of Publicans, and rich, perhaps, by means of his profession; and he dwelt at Jericho, a wealthy commercial city, the next in importance in Judæa, after Jerusalem.

According to a later tradition (Const. Apost. vii. 46), he became first Bishop of Cæsarea, in Palestine.

4. ἀνέβη ἐπὶ συκομορέαν] he climbed up into a sycamore-tree. The tree here mentioned is the 'ficus sycomorus,' the Egyptian fig, in leaves and aspect like the white mulberry. Plin. xiii. 14. Dioscor. i. 182. It has a knotty stem, and grows to a considerable height, and shoots out its boughs wide, with thick foliage. Hasselquist, Reise, &c. p. 535. Billerbeck, Flora, p. 229. Winer, R. W. B. ii. p. 26.

— ἐκεῖνης] So A, B, E, F, G, H, K, L, M, Q, R, S, U, V.—Elz., δὲ ἐκεῖνης. Cp. ch. v. 19.

This history of Zacchæus has spiritual instruction for us. He was little in stature, and he could not see Christ for the crowd. But this difficulty stimulated his efforts to gratify his desires. He mounted the tree. Christ, who read his heart, saw him, and rewarded him, and became a guest at his house. Often by reason of the crowd of worldly affairs, and on account of our spiritual lowness of stature, we cannot discern Christ; but there are sycamores planted in the road, by which He will pass. He has given us the means of grace,—Prayer, Scripture, Sacraments. These are the Trees which He has planted by the way side of life. Let the crowd and our own littleness excite us to run before, like Zacchæus, and to ascend the tree; and then, like him, we shall see Christ, and He will come and abide with us.

Pusillitatem nostram, ad videndum Dominum, turba præpedit, quia infirmitatem humanæ mentis, ne lucem veritatis intendat, curarum sæcularium tumultus premit. Sed prudenter sycomorur ascendamus; per sycomorur Dominus transiens cernitur. (S. Gregor. 27. Moral. in Job xxxvii.)

God always rewards us, if He sees us eager for good. (Theoph.)

5. ἀναβλέψας ὁ Ἰησοῦς, κ.τ.λ.] Jesus looked up and saw. He who had seen the heart of Nathanael beneath the thick foliage of the fig-tree (John i. 48), reads that of Zacchæus in the shade of the sycamore, and more than grants his prayer. Etsi vocem invitantis, Jesus non audierat, viderat tamen affectum. Ambrose. He promises to come to his house, having already visited his heart. See also S. Cyril here, and S. Chrysostom, Homil. de Zacchæo.

— Ζακχαῖε] Zacchæus. Christ, the Good Shepherd, knows all His sheep, and calleth them all by their names. John x. 3.

7. καταλῦσαι] to be a guest with; hence the inn or lodging, diversorium, in which Christ was born is called κατάλυμα (see above, ii. 7); and so is the Guest Chamber for refreshment, where He ate the Paschal Supper, and instituted the Holy Eucharist. See below, xxii. 11.

8. Σταθεὶς] Having taken his stand. We are left by St. Luke to judge of our Lord's Sermon at the table of Zacchæus by its effects. Perhaps Zacchæus had been reclining at meat, and listening to our Lord's teaching on the use of Money, and was convinced of his own past failings in this respect; and he then arose and stood forth in the presence of the guests, and spoke as follows; and became an example of confessing Christ before men, and of making public dedications of body, and soul, and goods to Him. Wisely therefore has the Church adopted his words in her Communion Office, at the Offertory.

— Ἰδοὺ] Behold! 'henceforth I give;'—present tense for future, to show that what is said is as good as done,—'the half of my goods to the poor.' He does not delay till to-morrow. He is not a Doson. Here is a public confession, and a public vow of restitution and dedication to God.

— ἀποδίδωμι τετραπλοῦν] I restore fourfold, voluntarily, of my own accord; what the Law requires of a person publicly convicted of fraud. Exod. xxii. 1. 9. Thus "he will be the Law unto himself" (Rom. ii. 14). And he thus vindicates Christ from the cavils of those who said He was gone to be a guest with a sinner (v. 7).

"Non dimittitur peccatum, nisi restituatur ablatum." Aug. (Ep. liv.)

9. υἱὸς Ἀβραάμ] a son of Abraham by faith (Matt. iii. 9. John viii. 39. Rom. iv. 11—16. Gal. iii. 7. 9); though despised by those who call themselves the children of Abraham.

10.] See Athanas. de Incar., pp. 47, 48.

11. προσθεὶς εἶπε] He went on to deliver a parable. See Vorst., de Hebr., p. 591. Job xxix. 1. Cp. xx. 11.

12. ἐπορεύθη εἰς χώραν μακρὰν κ.τ.λ.] he set out to a far country. As the members of the family of Herod and others from the East resorted to Rome to obtain kingdoms for themselves from the Emperors, and to return to Palestine and their own land. See Wetstein here, and Joseph. Antt. xiv. 25; xv. 10. Comp. on the parable of the five talents, Matt. xxv. 14—30.

13. ἕως ἔρχομαι] The present tense of the indicative mood marks more forcibly the uncertainty of the time of Christ's Advent, and that He is always coming to every man. Cp. John xxi. 22. 1 Tim. iv. 13. Some MSS. (A, B, D, K, L, R) have ἐν φ.

14. πρεσβείαν] embassy. As the Jews sent counter embassies to Rome to frustrate the appeals mentioned in a preceding note (on v. 12), e.g. in the case of Archelaus. (Joseph. Antt. xvii.)

The mention of this antipathy and opposition on the part of the citizens brings out more clearly the character of the servants; as the hostility of the citizens of the World against Christ tries and displays the temper of Christians, who are His citizens,—dwellers in the City of God, the spiritual Jerusalem, the Church.

16. ἡ μνᾶ σου] thy pound has gained. He does not say, I have gained. The good servant ascribes all the increase to his lord's money. Cp. St. Paul's words, 1 Cor. xv. 10. It is God's grace in us which enables us to labour; and all the fruits of our labour are due to Him. See on xvii. 5—10.

17. ἴσθι ἔχων] 'scias te habere.' (Valck.)

— δέκα πόλεων] of ten cities. On this parable as illustrating the different degrees of bliss in heaven, according to different degrees of growth in grace on earth, see Bp. Bull's Sermon vii. vol. i. pp. 168. 189. Cp. Matt. xix. 27, 28. 1 Cor. xv. 41, 42. 2 Cor. ix. 6.

See also below on John xiv. 2.

20. σουδαρίῳ] napkin. The Latin word sudarium (from sudor), Catull. xii. 14, passed into many eastern dialects. See John xi. 44; xx. 7. Acts xix. 12. Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. p. 442. Wetstein.

There is a difference between this case and that of the unprofitable servant in St. Matt. xxv. 25. There the servant alleges fear, lest he should lose what his master had given him; and therefore he has gone and hidden it in the earth. Here the servant also alleges fear (v. 21); but says that he kept it stowed away in a napkin,—i.e. he claims credit for care and vigilance.

The Gospel speaks of the dead body wrapped in a σουδαρίον (John xi. 44; xx. 7); fitly then the pound which he kept as dead was so unwrapped. (Theophyl.)

On the sin of wrapping up the Conscience, as if it were a dead corpse, in the folds of a napkin, such as the Papacy provides for its children, and requires them to use on pain of damnation, see Bp. Sanderson, de Conscient. Præl. iii. 5. 27, 28.

23. τράπεζαν] See Matt. xxi. 12; xxv. 27. A, B, L, have μοῦ τὸ ἀργύριον, a reading worthy of consideration.

27. τοὺς μὴ θελήσαντάς] those who willed not that I should be their king. A prophetic reference to the punishment in store for those who would soon cry, "we have no king but Cæsar" (John xix. 15. Ps. ii. 2—6.)

29—44. Καὶ ἐγένετο κ.τ.λ.] See on Matt. xxi. 1—17. Mark xi. 1. On the form Ἐλαιῶν see xxi. 37.

no man ever yet sat. The colt tied, on which no man ever yet had sat, but now loosed by the Apostles of Christ, and ridden by Him into Jerusalem, the Holy City, was a type of the Heathen World, as yet untamed and untrained, but brought by the Apostles to Christ, and submitting itself to Him guiding it into the City of God. See Cyril here, and note on Matt. xxi. 7. John xii. 14. 20.

33. οἱ κύριοι the masters. St. Mark says only τινὲς τῶν ἐσθῆκότων (xi. 5). Here seems to be a mark of the later composition of St. Luke's Gospel. See Mark ii. 15. 25, 26; v. 36—38, compared respectively with Luke v. 29; vi. 3, 4; viii. 50, 1, and Townson on the Gospels, Disc. v. sect. 1.

40. οἱ λίθοι the stones. And so the stones did cry out when one stone was not left upon another, according to his prophecy (xix. 44), and proclaimed His truth, justice, and power in thus punishing those that rejected the Divine Stone who became the Head Stone of the corner (xx. 17).

41. ἰδὼν τὴν πόλιν ἔκλαυσεν when He saw the city He wept over it. Christ shed tears (ἐδάκρυεν) at the grave of Lazarus (John xi. 35). But now, He did much more than this, when He looked at Jerusalem, and beheld, as it were, its death—its grave, He ἔκλαυσεν, wept. Cp. Matt. xxvi. 75. Mark xiv. 72. The sight of the City brought tears into His eyes, and He wept, as David did on the same mountain (2 Sam. xv. 30). Christ wept in the hour of His triumph, and near the spot where He was about to ascend in glory to heaven. He wept not for Himself, but for Jerusalem, and for her approaching calamities. (See below, xxiii. 28.) He wept in the place where her enemies began to besiege her (Matt. xxiv. 3) for her sins in rejecting Him; He wept on that spot, in divine foreknowledge of the miseries which they would there inflict upon her. Christ here proves His twofold nature by weeping as man for what He foretold as God.

A, B, D, H, L, R, Γ, Δ, have αὐτήν; cp. xxiii. 28, μή καλεῖτε ἐπ' ἐμὲ, πλὴν ἐφ' ἐαυτὰς καλεῖτε.—Elz. has αὐτῇ; but καλεῖν ἐπὶ with an accusative is confirmed by the LXX. See Num. xi. 13. Jud. xi. 37, 38; xiv. 17. See Wetstein, p. 815.

42—47.] See Greg. M. Hom. in Ev. xxxix.

42. εἰ ἔγνως—ὀφθαλμῶν σου] A remarkable saying: Thou art called Jerusalem. Thy Name means, "they shall see peace" (οἰνὴν ἰατρίαν). Cp. Ps. cxxii. 6, 7. And David said, O pray for the peace of Jerusalem; literally, the things that belong to her peace. And so God intended it should be, for He sent to thee the Prince of Peace to preach Peace. But thou hast closed thine ears and thine eyes. Thou hast not known, i. e. not considered the things that belong to thy Peace; and now they are hid from thine eyes.

— εἰ ἔγνως καὶ σὺ, κ.τ.λ.] If thou hadst known, even thou, for whom so much love has been shown by God, hitherto in vain; if thou hadst known at least in this the day of thy visitation, when thy King and Saviour comes to visit thee in person for the last time (see v. 44), then how blessed would it be! The Apostrophe is full of pathos. See on xiii. 9, and cp. Isa. xxix. 1—8.

43, 44. χάρακα—περικυκλώσουσι—συνέξουσί σε—ἐδαφιοῦσι] a trench and rampart; they will surround, encircle, and hem thee in on every side, and they will dash thee prostrate to the ground, and thy children within thee. These circumstances are remarkable, and the prophecy in these respects was signally fulfilled by the Roman general Titus and his army, against his own intention and desire. He earnestly wished to be spared the labour and delay of making the trench round the City. He also earnestly wished to spare the City and Temple; and it was with great reluctance that he destroyed the city; and the Temple was burned in contravention of his express command. (See Joseph. B. J. v. 12. 2—vi. 7. 13. Cp. Euseb. iii. 5—9, and the passages collected by Archbp. Newcome, Observations, chap. iii. sect. i.)

ἐδαφιοῦσι is a stronger word than to 'lay even to the ground,' it is equivalent to προσκρούσουσι, they will dash on the ground. Hesych. Phavorin. Cp. Ps. cxxvii. 9.

In such military works as these here mentioned, the first operation consisted in digging the trench, and with the earth thus excavated, the agger, or χωμα, or mound, was formed; then, in the lower parts of the agger thus made, wooden stakes (pali, χάρακες) were fixed, to prevent the slipping down of the earth of the mound. The whole work was sometimes called χάραξ, as here. See Isa. xxxvii. 33, οὐ μὴ κυκλώσῃ ἐπ' αὐτήν. Cp. Deut. xx. 19, 20. Cp. Wetstein, p. 789.

45, 46. Καὶ εἰσελθὼν κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxi. 12, 13. Here is another instance of St. Luke's practice in dispatching a subject; preferring internal connexion to exact order of time. He describes the cleansing of the Temple immediately after the narrative of the triumphal Entry; but it did not take place till the day after. See Mark xi. 12. On this practice of anticipation, see on Matt. xx. 29.

Also, by connecting this act and speech of Christ with His preceding prophecy on the destruction of Jerusalem, St. Luke points out the cause of that destruction, viz. the sins of the Jews themselves in the City and Temple. See on Matt. xxiv. 15.

11. προσέθετο πέμψαι] A Hebraism borrowed from the LXX: προσέθετο, ἤρξατο (yasaph); 'addidit.' See Glass. Philol. S. p. 411. Vorst. de Hebraism. p. 590; above, xix. 11. Acts xii. 3. Cf. Gen. xviii. 20. Cp. LXX.

16. Μὴ γένοιτο] An ejaculation of their consciences applying the parable to themselves.

20. Καὶ παρατηρήσαντες κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxii. 15—22.

— ἀπέστειλαν ἐγκαθέτους] they send forth liars in wait. "ἐγκαθέτοι propriè dicuntur ii, qui subsidunt in loco aliquo, aliusque insidias faciunt. Lex. Cyrill. Brem. ap. Albertium ad Hesych. T. i. p. 1542, b, ἐφεδρος, ἐγκαθέτος, ἐπικαθήμενος, κατασκοπος. Insidiatores." The word is used by the Septuagint in Job xix. 12; xxxi. 9; it is derived from ἐν, κατὰ ἡμῖν, and signifies emissaries who are set in ambush against a person. Plu-tarch, Pyrrh. p. 389, uses the verb: ἦσαν τινες οὓς αὐτὸς ὁ Πόρρος ἐγκαθεῖν προσποιουμένους εἶναι Μακεδόνας.

The ἐγκαθέτοι here mentioned were Pharisees or Herodians, as had been specified by St. Matthew (xxii. 15—22) and St. Mark (xii. 13—17); but St. Luke does not specify them as such, as being persons in whom his own readers would have less interest.

21. οὐ λαμβάνεις πρόσωπον] λαμβάνειν πρόσωπον is a phrase borrowed from the LXX for Hebr. שֵׁט פָּנִים (seth panim), 'to accept persons' (Lev. xix. 15. Mal. i. 8). St. Matthew and St. Mark have here οὐ βλέπεις εἰς πρόσωπον.

22. φόρον δοῦναι] to give tribute. St. Matthew and St. Mark never use φόρος, which is used by St. Luke here and xxiii. 2, and by St. Paul, Rom. xiii. 6, 7. In the present passage St. Matthew and St. Mark have κῆνος, census, which is never used by St. Luke.

Here is one of the slight varieties which mark the adaptation of the different Gospels to different classes of persons respectively, and indicate the consequent modification of the Evangelical phraseology. See above, Introduction to St. Luke, p. 165, 6, and to the Gospels generally.

27. Προσελθόντες κ.τ.λ.] See on Matt. xxii. 23—32.

34. Οἱ υἱοὶ] St. Luke here omits our Lord's words as recorded by St. Matthew (xxii. 29), ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, which were specially relevant to Jewish readers; and records the argument derived from the difference of this world and the next, an argument applicable to all.

36. οὔτε] Some Editors have substituted οὐδὲ here from A, B, L. But οὔτε seems preferable. It is not much to say they cannot even die; which may be said of evil spirits; but the words 'for neither can they die' supply the reason why they do not marry.

42. ἐν βίβλῳ Ψαλμῶν] in the Book of the Psalms. This addition is not in St. Matt. xxii. 43 or St. Mark xii. 36; but is inserted here as conveying information necessary to Gentile readers. He omits οἱ γραμματεῖς after λέγουσι (v. 41) as less interesting to them.

45. Ἀκούοντας κ.τ.λ.] See Mark xii. 38—40.

CH. XXI. 1. Ἀναβλέψας κ.τ.λ.] He looked up and saw those who were casting their gifts into the treasury; rich men. See Mark xii. 41—44. In describing these offerings, St. Mark here uses χαλκὸν, the Roman æs; and specifies that the sum cast in by the poor widow made a Roman quadrans. St. Luke simply says, δύο λεπτά, and explains to his readers that what they were casting in were δῶρα, offerings to God (vv. 1, 4).

5. Καὶ τινων κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxiv. 1—51; xxi. 1—46. Mark xiii. 1—37.

— καὶ ἀναθήμασι] and votive offerings. St. Luke alone mentions that our Lord's attention was invited to the ἀναθήματα, or votive offerings, such as golden crowns, shields, censers, phialae, lychnuchi, and οἰνοχοαὶ καὶ ἀμφορίσκοι. Such ἀναθήματα had been presented to the Temple of Jerusalem by Herod, and even by heathens, such as Ptolemy Euergetes, and also the Roman emperors. See Joseph. B. J. ii. 17; vi. 5. Ant. xii. 8; xv. 11; xvii. 6; xix. 6. Philo, Legat. ad Cai. ii. p. 592.

These offerings showed the reverence of the Powers of this world for Jerusalem and the Temple; and yet Christ foretold that Jerusalem and the Temple would be destroyed, by some who had adorned it with offerings.

6. Ταῦτα ἃ θεωρεῖτε] On the construction, cp. Matt. vii. 24; xii. 36. John vi. 39; vii. 38; xv. 2. Winer, G. G. p. 506.

8. Ὁ δὲ εἶπε] But He said. This full prophecy of Christ, concerning the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, and also concerning His own Coming, is recited by the three Evangelists,—St. Matthew, xxiv. 4—44, St. Mark, xiii. 5—37, and St. Luke here; but is not noticed by St. John, though he was present at its delivery, Mark xiii. 3. The reasons of which seem to be, that as far as the prophecy concerned Jerusalem, it had been fulfilled when he wrote; and as far as it related to Christ's Second Coming, the narratives of the preceding Evangelists were sufficient, or St. John, who had heard the prophecy, would have added something to them. His silence is significant of approval.

11. λιμοὶ καὶ λοιμοὶ] For instances of similar paronomasias see Heb. v. 8, ἔμαθεν ἀφ' ὧν ἔπαθεν. Rom. xi. 17, τινὲς τῶν κλάδων ἐξεκλάσθησαν. Matt. xxi. 41, κακοὺς κακῶς ἀπολέσει. Acts viii. 30, γινώσκεις ἃ ἀναγινώσκεις; Philem. 20, ὀναίμην—Ὀνήσιμος. See above on Matt. xxvi. 2; below, xxii. 15; and cp. Winer, p. 560.

13. ἀποβήσεται ὑμῖν εἰς μαρτύριον] it will turn out to you as a testimony to them. See Mark xiii. 9, μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς, a testimony, by which some of them will be convinced and converted, as Sergius Paulus, the governor of Paphos, and Dionysius the Areopagite (see Acts xiii. 7—12; xvii. 34), and others condemned, as Felix, Acts xxiv. 22—27.

14. Θέσθε] On the use of θέσθαι in this sense, see Luke i. 66; ix. 44. Acts v. 4; xix. 21.

15. ἐγὼ δώσω] I will give. In Mark xiii. 11, this is said to be the work of the Holy Spirit, because He proceeds from the Son, and is sent by Him. See on John xv. 26.

16. καὶ] even by them, not only by strangers.

19. Ἐν τῇ ὑπομονῇ] by your patience save your souls, gain your lives; while others, by want of faith, are destroying theirs. See xvii. 33. Matt. x. 39; xvi. 25.

— κτήσασθε] a contrast to ἀπόληται in the preceding verse. You may gain your life where you seem most likely to lose it. See Matt. x. 39. Luke ix. 24.

A, B, have κτήσεσθε, ye shall acquire,—a reading entitled to attention.

20. Ὅταν δὲ ἴδῃτε κυκλομένην] When ye shall see Jerusalem surrounded by armies. Our Lord gave two signs; one described by Matt. xxiv. 15, and Mark xiii. 14, viz. the Abomination of Desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, set up in the City of Jerusalem, in the "Holy Place" of the Temple. The other sign here mentioned by St. Luke, was the blockade of the City from without, by the hostile armies of Rome.

The former sign was intimately connected with the latter. For it was the profanation of the Temple by the Jewish army within the City, and by the sins of the Priests and the people in the City, which had rejected and crucified Christ, that gave power to the Roman army without; and brought it to besiege and destroy the City for the execution of God's justice and wrath for its sins. See on Matt. xxiv. 15, and on Mark xiii. 14, and Luke xix. 45.

21. οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ] they who are in Judaea, not in Jerusalem only, but in Judaea also; and, indeed, few were then able to escape from the City (see Josephus). In consequence of this warning, the Christians escaped to Pella, in Peræa. See on Matt. xxiv. 16.

— μὴ εἰσερχέσθωσαν] let them not enter in,—to Judaea. It would have been well for the Jews, if they had listened to this warning. But instead of doing so, they were deluded by a fanatical spirit, excited by their False Prophets, and by vain hopes of the Messiah's coming; and they imagined that the City and Temple were impregnable. Instead of quitting Judaea, they flocked to the city of Jerusalem for the Passover, and so were caught by the Romans as in a net; and the City became a prey to Famine, Pestilence, and Civil War; and an immense multitude—far beyond the ordinary population of the City—was destroyed, at that very season, and at that very Festival, at which they had crucified Christ. Cp. Euseb. H. E. iii. 5—7.

22. πάντα τὰ γεγραμμένα] all things that are written, especially in the Prophet Daniel, ix. 26, 27. See on Matt. xxiv. 15.

23. ἀνάγκη] tsarah, 'angustia' rendered by ἀνάγκη in the LXX, Job v. 19, and passim.

24. στόματι μαχαίρας] pi chereb, Gen. xxxiv. 26. Deut. xii. 15. Heb. xi. 34.

— αἰχμαλωτισθήσονται] shall be carried captive into all nations. The first Passover, or Type, was killed in obedience to God's command; and in forty years the Promised Land was entered, and the People of Israel were settled by Joshua in Canaan, from which the seven Nations were rooted up by God to make room for them. Christ, the last Passover, or Antitype, the true Passover, was slain in rebellion against God; and in forty years the Promised Land was forfeited, and trodden under foot by the Gentiles, and the Jews were carried captive into all Nations, and so remain till this day. See the different results, even in this world, of Obedience to God and of Rebellion against Him. Cp. the remarks at the end of Chronological Synopsis below, prefixed to the Acts of the Apostles, and Burgon. p. 531.

— Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἔσται πατουμένη] Jerusalem shall be trodden under foot by, and remain subject to, them. So καταπατεῖν, 1 Macc. iii. 52. Gentile Nations shall tread it down, and trample it under foot, until the times (καιροί, seasons) of the Gentiles are fulfilled; i. e. "till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." (Rom. xi. 25.)

καιροί are the seasons for bringing forth fruit to perfection: see Matt. xiii. 30. Mark xi. 13; xii. 2. Luke xx. 10. Acts xiv. 17. They are the spiritual spring, summer, and autumn in which the Gentile Nations are ripening to maturity under the showers of grace, and in the sunshine of the Gospel. And when that harvest is gathered, then the blindness which has fallen on Israel will be removed. Rom. xi. 15. 25. 2 Cor. iii. 14—16. Zech. iii. 9; viii. 8. Isa. xxxii. 13—15; lxi. 8.

Others (e.g. Meyer) suppose καιροί to be seasons of judgment and vengeance upon the Gentiles. And doubtless the season for bearing fruit being a season of trial, is to many a season of judgment, as well as of mercy to others.

25. σημεῖα] On these verses, see Greg. Moral. xl. Homil. in Evang. p. 1436. They have a double sense:

1. Literal; as applied to Jerusalem.

2. Spiritual; as applied to Christendom, or the Spiritual Sion.

The Sun of righteousness, Christ, will show signs of His power; the Moon, i. e. the Christian Church, illumined with His beams, will show signs of His coming. And some Stars, i. e. Luminaries of the Church, will fall from their place. S. Ambrose says, "Plurimis à religione deficientibus clara fides obscurabitur nube perfidiae; quia mihi Sol. Ille coelestis meā fide vel minuitur vel augetur. Et quemadmodum menstruis cursibus Luna vel terrae oppositu, cum fuerit à regione Solis, vanescit, sic et sancta Ecclesia, cum luminis coelestis vitia carnis obsistunt, fulgores divini luminis de Christi radiis non potest mutuari." See on Matt. xxiv. 29.

Our Lord transfers His words from the capture of Jerusalem, and applies them to the time of His Second Advent and the consummation of all things. S. Cyril, p. 653, 4.

— συνοχή] 'anxielas,' 'angor.' See on Matt. xxiv. 29.

— ἀπορίᾳ] "desperatione ob consilii inopiam utpote angustii implicitum, ex quibus explicare se nequeant."

— ἡχούσης] Some MSS., particularly A, B, C, L, M, R, X, have ἡχους, which has been received in some ancient Editions. If it is the true reading, the genitive ἡχους follows σημεῖα. But that reading seems to have proceeded from ἡχούσης altered into ἡχους ὡς— And ἡχου, not ἡχους, seems to be the form used in N. T. See Heb. xii. 19. The reading ἡχούσης is in D, E, G, H, K, S, U, V, Γ, Δ, Λ.

— θαλάσσης] the sea. Earth, in this verse, appears to represent men and nations in their worldly state (Matt. xxiv. 30), engrossed by low and earthly thoughts (see below, v. 35). The Sea represents them as tossed about on the tumultuous billows of internal and external troubles. And in both respects, whether as to Earth or Sea, the Nations of this world are distinguished from the children of the kingdom of heaven, i. e. of the Christian Church, which will be assailed by storms (v. 25), but is raised above earthly cares, and cannot be shaken by earthly vicissitudes.

26. τῇ οἰκουμένῃ] the world, as inhabited; i. e. cities and nations.

28. ἀνακίψατε] do you look upwards with faith, hope, and joy, while the men of this world are looking downwards to the earth (κατακύπτοντες εἰς τὴν γῆν), oppressed with earthly cares and lusts (v. 34), and poring on earthly treasures, and cast down with despair (see v. 26); for, when their destruction is at hand, then your redemption draweth nigh: "Levare capita, est mentes ad patriam coelestem erigere." (Greg.)

29. πάντα τὰ δένδρα] all the trees. Countries which have no fig-trees, have their parables (Matt. xxiv. 32) for watchful hearts.

30. προβάλωσιν] Cf. ὅταν παραῶ, Mark iv. 29, and ἐπιβαλὼν, Mark xiv. 72.

32. ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη] this generation, the Israel of God. See Matt. xxiv. 34; and cp. Euseb. here (Mai, p. 301), who compares Ps. xxii. 31; cii. 18.

34. βαρηθῶσιν] βαρυνθῶσιν, Elz. But βαρηθῶσιν is in A, B, C, E, F, G, K, L, S, V, and other Uncials. It is remarkable that in the N. T. βαροῦμαι occurs often (Matt. xxvi. 43. Mark xiv. 40. Luke ix. 32. 2 Cor. i. 8; v. 4. 1 Tim. v. 16), but βαρύνομαι never; whereas in the LXX βαρύνομαι is often, but βαροῦμαι very rarely, found.

35. ὡς παγίς] will come suddenly on them, as a snare or trap on birds or beasts enjoying repose (Eccles. ix. 12).

— τοὺς καθήμενους ἐπὶ π. π. τ. γ.] Those who are of the earth, earthly (1 Cor. xv. 47), and have not set their affections on things above (Col. iii. 2), and have not their conversation in heaven (Phil. iii. 20).

See above on xviii. 8. The expression καθῆσθαι ἐπὶ πρόσωπον τῆς γῆς is a double Hebraism. καθῆσθαι is the Hebrew yashab (yashab), to sit, to take their ease, rest, to dwell (Isa. ix. 2.
Matt. iv. 16). And ἐπὶ πρόσωπον τ. γ. is the Hebr. al-pney col-haaretz (al-pney col-haaretz), 2 Sam. xviii. 8. See Vorst. p. 170, and
p. 342. And it denotes that the persons so described have made earth their home, and say, “here is our rest.” Cp. Heb. xiii. 14.
Mic. ii. 10. Rev. xiii. 14.

³⁷. ἡλίζετο εἰς τὸ ὄρος] resorted for a lodging to Olivet, i. e. to Bethany (Matt. xxi. 17. Mark xi. 11). See below, xxiv. 50.
On the use of eis, see Matt. ii. 23, and on Mark i. 39. Luke xi. 7.

— εἰς τὸ ὄρος τὸ καλούμενον Ἐλαιών] to the Mount called Olivet. St. Luke shows by this mode of speech (which he had also used in xix. 29) that he is writing for other than Jewish readers. So in ii. 4 he explains that the city of David is called Bethlehem. Compare the next chapter, v. 1, where he speaks of “the Feast of unleavened bread,” which is called the Passover.
No Jew, writing to Jews, would have expressed himself thus. But such language is very suitable to the Evangelist of the Gentile World. Cp. Introduction, p. 165.

— Ἐλαιών] Elz. Ἐλαιών, gen. plur. But Ἐλαιών, Olivetum, in the nominative singular seems to be the true reading. (Cp.
xix. 29.) The Evangelists appear to prefix the article τὸν to Ἐλαιών after τὸ ὄρος. See Matt. xxi. 1; xxiv. 3; xxvi. 30.
Mark xi. 1; xiii. 3; xiv. 26. Luke xix. 37; xxii. 39. John viii.
1 (if genuine). St. Luke (and he alone) uses the form Ἐλαιών, Olivet (Acts i. 12), probably to be restored here and xix. 29. On this use of the nominative in proper names, see Lobeck, Phryn.
p. 517, and Meyer on Luke ix. 29. Winer, p. 164.

³⁸. ὠρθριζε] came early. ὠρθρίζω is the word used by the LXX for Hebr. hishkiym, from root shakam, ‘to rise early in the morning.’ Gen. xix. 27; xx. 8; and passim. The more Attic form was ὠρθρεύω. See Thom. Mag. in v., who says ὠρθρεύω—οὐκ ὠρθρίζω.

CH. XXII. 1. ἤγγιξε κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxvi. 1—5. Mark
xiv. 1, 2, 10, 11.

2. τό] See v. 4 and on Mark ix. 23.

3. Εἰσῆλθεν Σατανᾶς] The circumstance of this entrance of the Enemy is not mentioned by St. Matt. or St. Mark here. St.
Luke, writing for the Gentiles, had traced our Lord’s genealogy to Adam (Luke iii. 23, 38), and had shown that He is the promised Seed of the Woman, between which and the Seed of the Serpent God had put enmity (whence the name Satan, ἔχθρ, ‘enemy,’ or ‘adversary’), and which would bruise the Serpent’s head (Gen. iii.
15). He is careful to show how that primeval prophecy or prot-
evangelium was fulfilled by Christ.

He does this in the history of the Temptation (ch. iv.), then he records our Lord’s words, saying (x. 18), “I was beholding Satan

—the Enemy, τὸν Σατανᾶν—fallen as lightning from heaven,” and ascribing the diseases of the body which He healed to the agency of Satan (xiii. 16), and telling Peter (xxii. 31), that Satan desired to have them to sift them as wheat. And now the Holy Spirit reveals Satan—the ancient Enemy of Man—that Old Serpent—as the prime instigator of those who brought about the Crucifixion, by which he bruised the heel of the woman’s Seed, and through which his own head was bruised by the woman’s Seed.

4. στρατηγοῖς] the captains of the Temple; “templi praefectis; cum his agebat Judas, et hi speciatim commemorantur, quoniam horum erat, apparitorum ope, prehendere et in carcerem conicere Judæos, qui in legem peccarant, vid. ad Matt. xxvi. 47. infra v.

pliciter στρατηγοί, duces ac praefecti sacerdotum et Levitarum, summo pontifice conjungitur à Josepho xx. 6. 2, et ante reliquos synedrii assessores commemoratur Act. v. 24, coll. xxi. 37.”

(Kuin.) Cp. Winer, ii. p. 590.

6. ἄτερ ὄχλου] without a tumult, or popular commotion.
(Acts xxiv. 18.) See Matt. xxvi. 5. Mark xiv. 2.

7. ἐν ᾗ ἔδει θύεσθαι] on which day it was necessary that the Passover should be killed. Perhaps there is something of emphasis in the word ἔδει, it was necessary; as much as to say that our Lord sacrificed and ate the Paschal Lamb on the day appointed by the divine Law, but the Priests and Pharisees, who professed great zeal for the law, did not.

Our Lord ate the Passover with His disciples on the Evening of the Fourteenth of Nisan, being the Fifth day of the week (Thursday).

But the Rulers of the Jews, who conspired against Him, would not enter (on the next day) into the hall of Pilate, “lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover” (John xviii. 28). For, says Eusebius (as cited in Cat. Aur. p. 288, ed. Venet. 1775), “Ex quo Veritati insidiati sunt, verbum Veri-tatis à se expulerunt, non primâ die azymorum, quo die debebat immolari Pascha, manducantes solum sibi Pascha; erant enim erga aliud attentî (i. e. on killing Christ), sed die sequenti post illum, quæ erat azymorum secunda. Dominus verò primâ die azymorum, hoc est quintâ feriâ, Pascha cum discipulis peregit.”

The Chief Priests and Scribes were so busy in plotting the sacrifice of the true Paschal Lamb, that they omitted to sacrifice and eat the legal Passover at the proper time. The Evangelists relate, that they took counsel before the Passover to kill Jesus by subtlety without any public disturbance, and not at the Passover. They made their compact with Judas and dispatched their officers and servants with him to Gethsemane to take Jesus after He had eaten the Passover. Judas and the band (σπεῖρα) came by night from the Chief Priests and Scribes and Elders (Matt. xxvi. 47. Mark xiv. 43. John xviii. 3), and even some of the Chief Priests and Elders accompanied Judas to Gethsemane (Luke xxii. 52), and the others seem to have waited with impatience for our Lord’s arrest, and to have been ready to meet together immediately (Luke xxii. 66) to carry on His examination and to expedite His execution. And there does not appear to have been any available interval in which they could have separated and returned to their several households in order to eat the Passover, and then have come back to prosecute the trial and condemnation of their Divine Prisoner.

8. καὶ ἀπέστειλε κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxvi. 17—19. Mark xiv. 12—16.

10. κέραμιον ὕδατος] a pitcher of water. As to its symbolic significance here, see on Mark xiv. 13, and S. Cyril here, ἐνθα γὰρ ἂν εἰσέλθῃ τὸ ὕδωρ τοῦ ἁγίου βαπτίσματος, ἐκεῖ καταλύσει Χριστός.

12. ἀνάγαιον] So A, B, D, E, G, H, K, L, M, P, R, S, and other MSS.—Elz. ἀνώγειον. See Mark xiv. 15.

15. Ἐπιθυμία ἐπεθύμησα] I desired with desire: a Hebraistic expression, probably a literal translation of our Lord's words. Vorst. de Hebr., p. 624, who compares Matt. xiii. 14, ἀκοῇ ἀκούετε. John iii. 29, χαρὰ χαίρει. Acts iv. 17; v. 28; xxiii. 14, and see LXX in Gen. xxxi. 30.

These Hebraisms appear to be preserved by the Sacred Writers, for the sake of reminding the reader that he has before him a literal representation of the very words used by the speakers on the occasions described.

—πάσχα—παθεῖν] A paronomasia. See on Matt. xxvi. 2. Luke xxi. 11. Acts iv. 30; viii. 30.

18. οὐ μὴ φάγω] I will not eat any more of it until it be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God. Our Lord was now about to give a spiritual consummation or fulfilment (πλήρωσις) to the Paschal rites of eating and drinking, by changing them into a Sacrament of the New Covenant in the Gospel and the Church (ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ), in the Holy Communion of His Body and Blood. Henceforth the Levitical sacrifice was to cease, being transfigured into an Evangelical Sacrament in the Kingdom of God.

Having said these words, He proceeded to explain their meaning by instituting the Christian Passover,—the Holy Eucharist. I will no more partake in this figurative and typical eating of the Passover, which is now about to be fulfilled in the Kingdom of God,—that is, in the Church,—by the oblation of the true Passover on the Cross; and this is fulfilled in us who honour the true Passover. For it is not a lamb of the flock which sanctifies us, but it is He Himself being made a holy sacrifice for us, by the offering of bloodless oblations and the mystical Benediction in the Holy Eucharist, in which we are blessed and quickened with life. Cyril.

18. γέννηματος] On this use of γέννημα, see Phrynich. p. 236, Lobeck, and Vorst. de Hebr., p. 464.

19. Τοῦτό ἐστι] See Matt. xxvi. 26.

—τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν διδόμενον] that is being given for you. St. Paul says κλάμενον, being broken, 1 Cor. xi. 24. These words are not in St. Matthew and St. Mark. They serve to give greater clearness to what preceded.

It is observable that in the record of all the three Evangelists and St. Paul, our Lord uses the present tense. This is My Body which is being given, being broken (διδόμενον, κλάμενον). This is My Blood which is being shed (ἐκχυνόμενον). The bread (ἄρτος, loaf, 1 Cor. x. 17) blessed by Christ, and broken in His hand before He suffered (v. 19), and distributed by Him to His disciples, was a figure of His death, voluntarily accomplished by His own act, and a showing forth of it, and a conveyance of its blessings as already purchased and secured; as the bread now blessed in His name in the Holy Eucharist, and broken after His suffering, is a commemorative representation and showing of His death, and is the Communion of His body and blood, and an actual and effectual dispensation and application of all the benefits of His death to every penitent and faithful receiver.

On the varieties of the words, with which the Evangelists record what our Lord said and did in the Institution of the Holy Eucharist, see above, Introduction to the Gospels.

—τοῦτο ποιεῖτε] do this. See 1 Cor. xi. 24, 25. This commemorative sentence is not recited by St. Matthew and St. Mark; and St. John adds nothing to the history of the institution, and so canonizes the other accounts by his silence.

—εἰς τὴν ἐ. ἀνάμνησιν] for the recordation of Me. Ἀνάμνησις is more than remembrance of Me. Ἀνάμνησις is not simply remembrance, which may be involuntary,—but it is a deliberate inward act of the will (recordatio), showing itself by external signs. See on Mark xiv. 72, and cp. 1 Cor. xi. 25, 26. Heb. x. 3.

“Do this for My Commemoration.” This was a prospective precept for the future; for when He Himself was present with them there was no occasion for ἀνάμνησις.

On the form ἀνάμνησις ἐμῇ = ‘recordatio mei,’ cp. Rom. xi. 31, ὑμῶν ἕλεος, mercy toward you, and Rom. xv. 4. 1 Cor. xv. 31; xvi. 17. Winer, p. 139.

20. Ὡσαύτως] In like manner, with thanks and benediction. —μετὰ τὸ δειπνήσαι] after supper,—mentioned to distinguish this cup from the paschal cup, v. 17.

—Τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον] See on Matt. xxvi. 28.

21. Πλὴν] But, although I am now about to shed My blood for you and for all men.

22. κατὰ τὸ ὀρισμένον] Cp. on xvii. 1, and on Acts ii. 23, τῇ ὀρισμένῃ βουλῇ.

—παραδίδοται] Ps. xli. 9.

25. εὐεργέται] Cp. 2 Macc. iv. 2, where Onias is so entitled. So Ptolemy Euergetes; and cp. Milton, Paradise Regained, iii. 82, "Then swell with pride, and must be titled Gods, Great Benefactors of mankind," &c.

29. διατίθεμαι] I covenant to you. See Ps. lxxxi. 4, where LXX has διέθεμην διαθήκην. (Rosenm.) — βασιλείαν] See xii. 32. 2 Tim. ii. 12.

30. καθίσεσθε] ye shall sit. So the best MSS.—Ez. καθίσσθε. It is observable that the sitting on thrones is mentioned after the admission to sit at the table. See on 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3. — θρόνων] See Matt. xix. 28.

31. ἐξητήσατο] he asked. Therefore Satan cannot act except by God's permission. Cp. the case of Job, i. 12; ii. 5.

— ὑμᾶς] you, plural, not only σέ, thee; and specially Judas, whom He does not expose publicly, but whom He had warned secretly, vv. 21, 22. Perhaps Peter thence inferred that the Apostles would suppose that he himself was the person meant by our Lord when He said that "one of you shall betray me" (Matt. xxvi. 21. Mark xiv. 18. Luke xxii. 21. John xiii. 21), and therefore he was more eager to obtain an explicit declaration from Christ on this subject (John xiii. 24), and thought it requisite to be more forward in his own professions of fidelity (33, 34).

— σιναῖσαι] to sift. κοσκινεύσαι. (Hesych.) 32. ἐγὼ δὲ ἐδεήθην περὶ σοῦ] Satan asked for permission to sift you all (ὑμᾶς); but when He asked to sift you, I prayed specially for thee. The prayer was prophetic; it was specially needed by Peter, because Peter was specially in peril.

It is said by Roman Divines (e.g. Maldonat., à Lapide, and Mai here) that this prayer and precept of our Lord extends to all the Bishops of Rome, as St. Peter's successors, and that in speaking to St. Peter our Lord spake to them. Would they be willing to complete the parallel, and say that the Bishops of Rome specially need prayer, because they deny Christ? Let them not take a part of it, and leave the rest. St. Peter himself (2 Pet. iii. 16) has condemned such wrestings of Scripture as this, and such as that by which another verse in this chapter (v. 38) has been perverted to a like purpose, and where the words ἰδοὺ μάχαιραι δύο, behold, two swords, have been used by Popes themselves to authorize their claim to wield the double sword of spiritual and secular supremacy. See Pope Boniface VIIIth's "Unam Sanctam," in the Roman Canon Law (Extrav. Com. i. 8. l. p. 1159, ed. 1839): "Dicentibus Apostolis ecce gladii duo, in Ecclesiâ scilicet, quum Apostoli loquerentur, non respondit Dominus nimis esse, sed satis. Certè, qui in potestate Petri temporalem gladium esse negat, malè verbum attendit Domini proferentis 'Converte gladium tuum in vaginam' (Matt. xxvi. 52). Uterque ergo in potestate est Ecclesiæ, spiritualis scilicet gladius et materialis."

— στήριξον] A, B, K, L, M, Q, X have στήρισον.

34. Πέτρε] Peter. The only place in the Gospels where Christ is said to have addressed Simon by his name Πέτρος. (Burgon.)

Doubtless there is a reference to his good confession (Matt. xvi. 18). Thou, when uttering the revelation from My Father, and confessing Me to be the Christ, the Son of the Living God, wast a true Petros or Stone, built on Me, the Living Rock; but now thou wilt deny Me thrice, because thou speakest thine own words and reliest on thine own strength, instead of on Me,—the true Rock.

35. ἄτερ βαλλαντίου] See notes on Matt. x. 10.

36. μάχαιραν] a sword. A proverbial expression, intimating that they would now be reduced to a condition, in which the men of this world would resort to such means of defence. See Theophyl., Euthym., and Glass. Phil. p. 705, and above on Matt. xxiv. 20.

38. ἰδοὺ μάχαιραι δύο] behold, two swords. A sentence recorded by the Holy Spirit here, in order, perhaps, to show, how narrow-minded and enslaved by the letter (cp. Matt. xvi. 6—12, on ζύμη) the Apostles of our Lord as yet were, even to the time of His Passion; and in order also to show, how gentle, considerate, and tolerant our Blessed Lord was in His dealings with them even to the end; and how incompetent they were to do any thing of themselves to propagate the Gospel, and to build up the Church; and how gracious and powerful was the gift of the Holy Ghost, Who wrought so great a change in them, by enabling them, such as they were, to speak and write, to do and suffer, to live and die, as they did.

— Ἰκανόν ἐστι] It is enough. Even two swords, in weak hands, are enough to defend Christ's disciples, and to defeat all the powers of this World and even of Hell itself,—if they are wielded by Faith, in obedience to His Word, and in reliance on His might. See Cyril here. Cp. Deut. xxxii. 30.

40. ἐπὶ τοῦ τόπου] at the place. St. Luke never uses the word Gethsemane, which had been specified by Matt. xxvi. 36, and Mark xiv. 32, and would be little known to his own readers.

41. λίθου βολήν] a stone's cast. He was apart, and yet near, so that He might be heard; and His agony was visible in the clear light of the Paschal Moon.

43, 44. ὥφθη—γῆν] an angel from heaven appeared to Him, strengthening Him. And being in an agony He prayed more earnestly, and His sweat became as thick drops of blood falling down to the earth. It is remarkable that these two verses are omitted by the Alexandrine and Vatican MSS., a striking evidence that these two MSS. are not to be followed implicitly. Nor are they in the Nitrian Palimpsest in the British Museum, marked R by Tisch., nor were they originally in the Leicester MS.; but that MS. has them in Matt. xxvi., between vv. 39 and 40. See Scrivener, p. 380. Cp. below, xxiii. 17 and 34.

But they are found in D, F, G, H, K, L, M, Q, U, X, Γ, Δ. They are marked with asterisks in E, S, V, Δ, and in some few Cursives.

Perhaps they were deemed by some timid readers and transcribers to involve a disparagement on the Divine Power and Dignity of Christ. But Faith will accept them with thankfulness as a divine testimony to the truth of the Humanity of Christ, suffering as Man for the sins of all Mankind; and also as exemplary to all in those sufferings which He endured for all.

The Holy Ghost in St. Luke's Gospel is particularly careful to describe the victory gained by Christ, the Seed of the Woman, over Satan and evil angels (see on v. 3). He also dwells frequently on the visible ministrations of Good Angels to the Son of Man;

The Angel Gabriel appears in the Temple to announce His Forerunner's birth (Luke i. 11), and His conception (i. 26). Angels appear to the Shepherds at the Nativity (ii. 9—15). "There is joy in the presence of the Angels of God over one sinner that repenteth" (xv. 10); the soul of Lazarus is carried by Angels into Abraham's bosom (xvi. 22). And now an Angel appears from heaven strengthening Christ, the second Adam, in His Agony. Cp. xxiv. 23. Acts i. 10; x. 3. 30; xii. 7—11. 15, and Introduction above, p. 158.

44. προσηύχετο] He was praying. See on v. 16. — ἰδρὼς] sweat. Although it was a cold night, and He was kneeling on the cold ground. (Bp. Andrewes.)

— ὥσει θρόμβοι αἵματος] as thick drops of blood. ὥσει is to be joined with θρόμβοι, not with αἵματος. θρόμβος is interpreted by Hesych. αἷμα παχὺν, πεπηγὸς, clotting. Blomf. Hesych. Chocph. 526.

The Fathers, for the most part, understand this literally as a

'sudor sanguineus.' So Hilary, Athanasius, Jerome, Augustine, Bernard, who says, Serm. 3, in Domin. Palmar., that He, as it were, wept with His whole body. "Non solis oculis, sed quasi membris flevisse videtur." Christ thus gave some external evidence of His inexpressible inward agony (S. Jerome, c. Pelag. ii.), and of the bitterness of that cup which He drained for our sake. He also foreshadowed a representation of the sufferings which His mystical Body, the Church, would have to endure in the world. (Aug.)

— ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν] to the ground, not only on His raiment. See Heb. xii. 24. As the voice of blood of the first Shepherd, Abel, cried unto God from the ground (Gen. iv. 10), so the blood of the Good Shepherd, Christ, cried from the ground, and brought down a malediction from heaven on the unbelieving Jewish Nation, His Brother according to the flesh, who slew Him, and who has now become a wanderer on the earth—a never-dying Cain of near twenty centuries.

We hear of Christ's blood being shed twice; and both times in a garden; first in Gethsemane, secondly in Calvary (John xix. 41). In a garden, Man fell in Adam, and rose again in Christ. The spiritual Eden of delight, the true Paradise, lost by the first Adam, was regained by the Second Adam for all true believers. Cp. xxiii. 43.

47. φιλήσαι] to kiss. St. Luke takes for granted that the reader has learnt from other sources (e.g. Matt. xxvi. 48. Mark xiv. 44) that this was the signal of the Traitor.

48. τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου] the Son of Man. "Filius enim Dei Filius hominis propter nos esse voluit. Quasi dicat, 'Propter te suscepi quod trahis.'" (Ambrose.)

51. Ἐὰτε ἕως τούτου] Suffer ye thus far. This is mentioned by St. Luke alone; and St. John, writing after St. Peter's death, adds, that he it was who cut off the servant's ear, and that the servant's name was Malchus. John xviii. 10.

52. Εἶπε δὲ κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxvi. 55—57. Mark xiv. 48—52.

— στρατηγούς τοῦ ἱεροῦ] Captains, not of the Roman Castle of Antonia, but the sacerdotal chiefs of the several sentries of Priests and Levites who kept watch and ward in the Temple by day and night. See above on xxii. 4. Cp. Acts iv. 1. Joseph. Ant. xx. 6. 2.

54. τὸν οἶκον τοῦ ἀρχιερέως] the house of the High Priest. We have seen that Annas is called the High Priest, ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς, by St. Luke, Acts iv. 6. See on Luke iii. 2.

Judas made his covenant with the Chief Priests to betray Christ, and our Lord was arrested by them, and not by the civil power of Rome; and He was taken to Annas first, as the chief of the Spiritual Power. Cp. John xviii. 13. 24.

b Matt. 27. 11.
Mark 15. 2.

Probably Annas, the father-in-law, and Caiaphas, the son-in-law, dwelt in the same official residence. It is observable, that in the history of the arrest and arraignment before the High Priest, St. Luke never mentions Caiaphas by name. The two earlier Evangelists say that the officers of the Chief Priests ἀπήγαγον τὸν Ἰησοῦν πρὸς τὸν ἀρχιερέα, or πρὸς Καϊάφαν τὸν ἀρχιερέα. (Matt. xxvi. 57. Mark xiv. 53.) But St. Luke says (xxii. 54) εἰσήγαγον αὐτὸν εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ ἀρχιερέως.

And in all the three, Peter is said to be in the court-yard (αὐλῇ) of the High Priest (Matt. xxvi. 58. Mark xiv. 54. Luke xxii. 55), beneath (Mark xiv. 66). These considerations may serve to remove the objections which have been raised by some (e.g. Meyer, p. 486) against the accounts of the Evangelists, in this portion of the sacred narrative, as if they were at variance with each other.

⁵⁶. Ἰδοῦσα κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxvi. 69—75. Mark xiv. 66—72. John xviii. 17. All the four Evangelists mention the maid, παιδίσκη.

⁵⁸. ἕτερος] another person saw him and said,—viz. at the same time as the παιδίσκη, maid, in Mark xiv. 69, and the ἄλλη, other woman, Matt. xxvi. 71. See on John xviii. 25, who reconciles the three accounts.

⁵⁹. ἄλλος] another. Perhaps the relative of Malchus, John xviii. 26; but doubtless many spoke at the same time. See Matt. xxvi. 73. Mark xiv. 70.

⁶⁰. ἀλέκτωρ] a cock crew. Elz. has the Article ὁ before ἀλέκτωρ, but the ὁ is not in A, B, D, E, G, H, K, L, M, S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Λ, Lr.; and it is doubtful whether there is any passage of the Gospels where the Article is prefixed to this word, which occurs twelve times. The Evangelists seem careful not to say that it was any one cock which crowed thrice.

⁶². καὶ ἐξελθὼν] and Peter went out and wept bitterly. On this text, see Bp. Sanderson, Sermons, iii. p. 353.

CH. XXIII. 1. Καὶ ἀναστὰν] See Matt. xxvii. 1, 2. Mark xv. 1. John xviii. 28.

². φόρους] tribute. See xx. 22. They accuse Him of doing what they themselves did, and what He forbade them to do.

⁷. οὔτα αὐτὸν] Herod Antipas, being then at Jerusalem for the Passover.

Mark 15. 21.

11. Ἐξουθενήσας] Having set Him at nought. He who had murdered the forerunner of Christ now mocks Christ. So one sin leads to another and greater. Because our Lord answered nothing, and did no miracle to gratify his curiosity, he too with his soldiers mocked Him at Jerusalem, the City of God, and arrayed Him in a shining robe—Him who will appear in a bright robe of glory in the heavenly Jerusalem, with His armies of Cherubim and Seraphim, as King of Kings and Judge of Herod and Pilate and of the World.

12. Πιλάτος καὶ ὁ Ἡρώδης] Herod is reconciled to Pilate; but all are against Christ. Cp. Ps. ii. 1—3. Acts iv. 27. Pharisees combine with Herodians against Him (Matt. xxii. 16). A prophetic intimation of the combination of hostile powers, adverse to one another, but leagued together in the latter days against Him and His Church. See Ps. lxxxiii. 5. Rev. xix. 19.

15. οὐδὲν ἄξιον θανάτου] and you see that nothing worthy of death has been done by Him (πεπραγμένον αὐτῷ). Not done to Him, but by Him; otherwise it would have appeared in evidence before Herod or before me.

Pilate and Herod, the two Representatives respectively of the Roman and Jewish World, unite in acquitting and in crucifying Christ. Both Jew and Gentile pronounce Him innocent, and yet both condemn Him as guilty. He is put to death by the World, and dies for it. Cp. Barrow's Sermons, vol. iv. p. 575. Sermon. xxvi. on the Creed.

16. παιδεύσας] An euphemism or λιτότης for φραγελλώσας. See Thom. Magist. in πολλάκις; the LXX in Deut. viii. 5. Cp. Matt. xxvii. 26. St. John says (xix. 1) ἔμαστιγώσε τὸν Ἰησοῦν. It appears that Pilate scourged Jesus in hopes that the Jews would be satisfied with this punishment. (See Mark xv. 15, and St. Luke here and v. 22, and on John xix. 1.) The Evangelists St. Matthew (xxvii. 26) and St. Mark (xv. 15) introduce the word φραγελλώσας just before the mention of our Lord's delivery to be crucified; not because, as it would seem, the scourging took place then, but to intimate that He was punished twice, first by scourging and then by crucifixion; and so His prophecy was fulfilled (Matt. xx. 19), παράδωσκουσιν αὐτὸν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν εἰς τὸ ἐμπαῖξαι καὶ μαστιγῶσαι καὶ σταυρῶσαι. Cp. Mark x. 34. Luke xviii. 33.

17. Ἀνάγκη εἶχεν κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxvii. 15. 22. This verse is not in A, B, K, L—but it is in the other Uncials, and most Versions and Cursive MSS.

21. Οἱ δὲ κ.τ.λ.] See Matt. xxvii. 22—26.

VOL. I.

26. Σίμωνός τινος Κυρηναίου] a certain Simon, a Cyrenian. It is observed by some of the Fathers (e.g. S. Ambrose) that it was not a Jew of Jerusalem, but a Cyrenian stranger, who was first chosen to carry Christ's cross after Him to Calvary, and that in so doing he was a type of the priority of the Gentile world in coming to Christ, and in bowing under the yoke of the cross. And now eighteen centuries have passed, and the Jews have not yet taken up the cross and followed Christ.

Simon came from the country—a paganus, from Cyrene, the land of Ham, to Jerusalem, and took up the cross and followed Christ. He had shown his piety and zeal by coming to Jerusalem, to the Passover,—even from Cyrene, the most western city of Africa that is mentioned in the New Testament (cp. Acts ii. 10), a city in the same latitude as the most western point of Greece: and he is rewarded for his pains. He is admitted to the privilege of being a companion of Christ, and of relieving Him of His burden in His way to Calvary to die for the World; and he seems to be pointed out as a predecessor of his fellow-countrymen, coming to Christ.

The pagans of Africa have preceded the Jews of the literal Jerusalem in coming to Christ, and in taking up the Cross; and so have become citizens of the "Jerusalem that is above" (Gal. iv. 26), while the children of the kingdom have been cast out.

—ἐρχομένου] coming. Elz. has τοῦ before ἐρχομένου, but τοῦ is not found in the Uncial MSS. It seems to have been introduced to identify him with the person who was well known as such from St. Mark xv. 21.

—ἐπέθηκαν αὐτῷ τὸν σταυρόν] they laid on Him the cross. Our Lord bare His own cross (John xix. 17), as Isaac did the wood (Gen. xxii. 6); and Simon also bare it. Christ bare one portion of the cross and Simon the other; or, when He was oppressed by the weight, He was relieved by Simon. Cp. Aug. de Consensu Evang. iii. 10.

Christ bare the cross on His shoulders as a burden, and also as a badge of the "government on His shoulder" (Isa. ix. 6), and a trophy of victory (Phil. ii. 9). And it is also laid on Simon; for Christ's disciples must take up the cross and follow Him to the shame of Calvary, in order that they may reign with Him in the glories of the heavenly Jerusalem. See Heb. xiii. 13. Cp. Ambrose and Cyril here.

30. Τότε ἄρξονται λέγειν τοῖς ὄρεσι] Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us. This prophecy had a primary and literal fulfilment in the flight of many (c. g. Josephus and his companions) to the caverns and rocks of Palestine for refuge (cp. Matt. xxiv. 16; and see Bede's note here); and for its wider application to the World at large in the latter Days, see Isa. ii. 10. Rev. vi. 16.

31. εἰ ἐν τῷ ὑγρῷ ξύλῳ] if such things as these are done with the green tree, what shall be done with the tree that is dry? Good men are compared in Scripture to green trees, and bad to barren and dry (Ps. i. 3. Ezek. xx. 47. Jude 12). And our Lord may be supposed to say, If such are the sufferings of One who is the Tree of Life, bringing forth all healthful fruits, what shall they endure, who inflict these sufferings, and are themselves like an unfruitful and barren fig-tree, dry and ready for the fire, and who will be withered by Me as such? Cp. on Matt. xxi. 19, 20. Mark xi. 13—22; and see Greg. Moral. xii. 4 and Cyril here, p. 717. Theophyl. and Glass. Philol. pp. 751, 752. Vorst. de Hebr. 819.

33. Κρανίον] A scull. St. Luke alone of the Evangelists does not mention its Hebrew name—Golgotha. St. Matthew and St. Mark add κρανίον as the interpretation of Golgotha. St. John mentions κρανίον first, and adds ὡς λέγεται Ἑβραϊστὶ Γολγοθᾶ. This may serve as one illustration, among many, of the modifying principles which guided the several Evangelists in the composition of their respective Gospels; see above, xx. 22.

—ἐσταύρωσαν] they crucified Him. Our Lord, when He gave Himself to die, chose to die by the painful and ignominious death of the Cross, and that publicly, at the great feast of the Passover. The Cross,—the instrument of shame,—was made by Him to be like a triumphal Car, in which He rides “conquering and to conquer,” by His Victory over Satan; and it also was like a royal Throne and Tribunal, on which Christ sits a King and Judge, and separates between the good and the wicked—represented by the two Malefactors—the one on one hand, the other on the other. “Crucem trophæum jam vidimus,” says Ambrose. “Curram suum triumphator ascendat; et patibulo triumphali suspendat captiva de sæculo spolia. Unus Dei triumphus fecit omnes prope jam homines triumphare, Crux Domini.”

Cp. Dr. Barrow's Sermons on the Creed, Sermon. xxvi. vol. iv. pp. 573—596, and ii. p. 206, and above, on Matt. xxvii. 22, and below, on John xix. 17, and on Coloss. ii. 14. Eph. ii. 16.

34. Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς] This prayer of Jesus for His murderers is mentioned only by St. Luke. See above, v. 16, and cp. Acts iii. 17. This verse is omitted by the Vatican MS. Cp. xxii. 43.

—οὐ γὰρ οἶδασιν] See on 1 Tim. i. 13.

This prayer of Christ was used also by St. James the first Bishop of Jerusalem, for his murderers at his martyrdom at the Passover, A.D. 62, ἔθηκε τὰ λόγια λέγων, Παρακαλῶ, Κύριε, Θεὲ πάτερ, ἄφες αὐτοῖς, οὐ γὰρ οἶδασιν τί ποιοῦσι. Hegesip. ap. Euseb. ii. 23.

38. ἐπιγραφὴ] superscription. See Matt. xxvii. 37. Mark xv. 26. Designed as a mark of ignominy. But Pilate's hand was guided from above; and while he crucified Jesus, he wrote His true title; and he, the Representative of Rome the mistress of the World, wrote it in the principal languages of the World, in token that “all kings shall bow down before Him, and all Nations shall do Him service.” (Ps. lxxii. 11.)

St. Luke alone and St. John (xix. 20) mention the three languages; St. Luke specifies the Greek first; St. John places the Hebrew first. St. Luke puts the Hebrew last, and the Roman second, which St. John puts last.

It is observable, that none of the Evangelists, who mention the superscription, put the Roman in the first place; although it is not probable that Pilate, the Roman Governor, who caused the Inscription, would have placed his own language,—the language of the Imperial Mistress of the World,—after that of the Conquered Greeks and despised Jews.

St. Luke places the Hebrew after the Roman, though he does not give the first place to the Roman, but to the Greek. This appears to be in accordance with the general tenour of his Gospel, and of St. Paul's preaching, viz. to show that the first should be last, and the last first; and that the Gentiles were to be preferred to the Jews; the younger son to the elder.

Perhaps also the Holy Spirit, by inverting the order, may have designed to show, that the language of human majesty and of worldly supremacy, is subordinate to that of conquered Nations—Hebrew and Greek—which is consecrated by Himself as the language of Inspiration in the Old and New Testament. The Roman language,—the language of the Imperial Mistress of the World,—that language, alone of the three, never holds the first place on the Cross.

As to the varieties in the Evangelical records of the superscription, see on John xix. 19, and Introduction to the Gospels.

39. ἐβλασφήμει] was blaspheming Him. Some of the Fathers (e. g. Origen, Tr. 35 in Matt., S. Jerome, Chrys., Cyril Hierosol. Cateches. 13, Theophyl., Euthym. in Matt. xxvii.) are of opinion, that at first both the malefactors rallied on Jesus. But S. August., Epiph., and others (see Suarez and à Lapide here), say that the plural is used by St. Matthew (xxvii. 44), St. Mark (xv. 32), for the singular. Cp. Glass. Phil. S. p. 286, and Matt. xxvi. 8, where Judas only is meant. See on Matt. xxvii. 44.

40. Οὐδὲ φοβῆ] Dost not thou even fear God? If thou hast no love and pity for thy fellow-man, in his agony, Dost thou not even fear Him, Whose creature man is, and Who is outraged, when suffering man is reviled and insulted in his anguish?

42, 43. Μνήσθητί μου κ.τ.λ.] Remember me, O Lord, when Thou comest into Thy Kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, To-day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise. The penitent thief prayed to be remembered at that future time, however distant, when Christ should come in His Kingdom. Christ rewarded his faith and good confession by a promise of immediate happiness. "To-day thou shalt be (i.e. thy human soul shall be with My human soul) in Paradise."

Paradise is a word of Persian origin, signifying a Park or Garden (see Xenophon, Cyr. i. 3. 12. Econ. iv. 13. Reland de Vestig. Ling. Pers. Miscell. ii. p. 210. Winer, Real-W. i. p. 244, v. Eden), and is used by the LXX for גֶּן-עֵדֶן (Gan-Eden), the Garden of Eden or Delight. Gen. ii. 8—10. 15, 16; iii. 1—3, &c. Thence it was employed figuratively by the Jewish writers (see Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1, and Wetstein here) to designate the Place of rest and peace to which the souls of the faithful are conveyed, immediately on their deliverance from the burden of the flesh, and in which they enjoy a sweet repose, and a delightful foretaste of the full and final fruition of a glorious immortality, and in which they will remain till the General Resurrection and Day of Judgment, when they will be reunited to their bodies, and be admitted to the infinite and everlasting glory of Heaven.

Paradise is therefore equivalent to Abraham's bosom. See above, Luke xvi. 23, and cp. Acts ii. 31. 1 Pet. iii. 18, 19.

This passage then is a divine declaration that the soul when separated from the body by death does not sleep. See on xii. 4. It is also a divine Protest against the erroneous doctrine of Purgatory, and of Prayers to the Saints; as if they were already reigning in heaven. See below on Rev. vi. 9.

Leo M., Bishop of Rome, Sermon. lxxi. de Ascens., says, "Hodie non solum Paradisi possessores formati sumus, sed etiam regni cœlorum in Christo superna penetravimus, ampliora adepti per ineffabilem Christi gratiam quam per diaboli amiseramus invidiā." Cp. Macar. p. 133, and Routh, who says (R. S. i. 10: cp. 15. 55. 66), "Paradisi distinguitur à Cœlo; et in eo loco, qui quidem iustis præparatus est, οἱ μεταρθεῖντες dicuntur manere, auspiciat incorruptelam." See also the Sermon of Bp. Bull, "On the middle state of Happiness and Misery," vol. i. pp. 49—82.

Veteres Christiani diu discernebant Paradisum à Cœlo; laudavit hanc in rem Wetstenius verba Tertulliani Apologet. si Paradisum nominemus, locum divinæ amicitias, recipiendis sanctorum spiritibus, non cœlum intelligimus. Sic et h. l. per παραδείσων, Judæorum cogitandi et loquendi consuetudini convenienter intelligi debet locus in quo piorum animæ post mortem commorantur, usque dum, cum corporibus iterum conjunctæ, in futurum sæculum recipiantur. (Kuin.)

On the case of the Penitent Thief, see S. Aug. Tract. in Joann. xlvii., and Sermon. xxiii. 3, "Latro pendens cum Domino credit in Christum quando de illo discipuli dubitaverunt. Contempserunt Judæi mortuos suscitantes, non contempsit latro secum in cruce pendente," and Sermon. cxxxiv. 2, "In cruce latro vos vocat. . . . Crux illi schola erat. Ibi docuit Magister latronem; lignum penditis cathedra factum est docentis."

Hence therefore his case affords no encouragement to any one to put off repentance to a death bed. Our faith cannot come up to that of this Penitent; for our condition is very different from his. We have seen Christ's glorious Resurrection and Ascension into heaven. We have received the Holy Ghost from heaven. He had none of these benefits. He saw Christ deserted by His disciples and dying on the cross, and yet he confessed Him as a King, and prayed to Him as his Lord.

⁴⁴. Ἐν δὲ ὥσει ὥρα ἕκτη] It was about the sixth hour. See Matt. xxvii. 45. Mark xv. 33.

⁴⁵. ἐσχίσθη τὸ καταπέτασμα] the inner veil of the sanctuary was rent in twain. See Matt. xxvii. 51. Mark xv. 38.

⁴⁶. παρατίθεμαι] I commend. So A, B, C, K, M, P, Q, X, and others.—Elz. has παραθήσομαι, the reading of some MSS., derived perhaps from LXX version of Ps. xxxi. 6.

On some incidents of our Lord's death, compared with that of the first Martyr, St. Stephen, see St. Luke's account, Acts vii. 59, 60.

⁴⁷. δίκαιος ἦν] was righteous. St. Matthew (xxvii. 54) and St. Mark (xv. 39) say υἱὸς ἦν Θεοῦ. Perhaps St. Luke explains by δίκαιος ἦν the sense in which the centurion used the words υἱὸς ἦν Θεοῦ. S. Aug. de Consens. Evang. iii. c. 20.

⁵³. οὗ οὐκ ἦν οὐδέπω οὐδεὶς κείμενος] where no one had ever yet lain. See John xix. 41.

Our Lord took human nature in the womb of the Blessed Virgin; to which the prophecy has been applied, "This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened; and no man shall enter in by it, because the Lord the God of Israel hath entered in by it" (Ezek. xliv. 2). Cp. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii. And from the secret darkness of that bridal chamber, in which He espoused our nature, He went forth to redeem the world.

His human body is now laid in a new Tomb, where none other was ever laid; and thence He comes forth, that all who are in the graves may rise by Him. In the former case, Joseph of Bethlehem is the guardian of His sacred body; in the latter, Joseph of Arimathea; one Joseph, from the city of David, the greatest of Kings; the other Joseph from the city of Samuel, the greatest of Prophets, who anointed David to be king. Cp. Bede here, and see note on Matt. xxvii. 57.

56. τὸ μὲν σάββατον] they rested on the Seventh Day or Sabbath according to the fourth commandment. They had prepared some spices before the sunset of the sixth day, and brought more after sunset of the seventh day. See on Mark xv. 46; xvi. 1.

They rested on the Sabbath; such was their reverence for the Law, which was now fulfilled in Christ (Col. ii. 17), resting on the Sabbath, in the Grave. He is the true Sabbath in Whom the Father rests and is well pleased, and Who is the Rest of the Soul and the Body. For He says, "Come unto Me—and I will give you rest" (Matt. xi. 28), and "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, for they rest from their labours" (Rev. xiv. 13).

The Seventh-Day Sabbath itself died and was buried with Christ, and rose again with Him to new life and beauty on the First Day of the week, hence called (Rev. i. 10) κυριακῇ, 'dies dominicus,' or the Lord's Day; and the command to rest was transferred from the Seventh day of the week to the First Day.

It is observable, that our Lord, the second Adam, the Author of our life, died on the sixth day of the week, the day on which the first Adam—the author of our death—was born.

This was very appropriate; for we derive our spiritual life from His death. He died in order that we might be born anew, and live for evermore.

"Sextā Sabbatī," says S. Aug. in Joan. Tract. xvii., "inclinato capite, reddidit spiritum, et in sepulchro Sabbato requievit de omnibus operibus suis." Thus the first Sabbath on which God rested from His works was a type of the last Sabbath, on which Christ rested from His works in the grave. And yet, be it remembered, His Rest was a Rest of Mercy, a Rest of Beneficence. (See on John v. 17.) For on that day "He went and preached to the Spirits in prison" (1 Pet. iii. 18, 19). What a Sabbath day's Journey was that!

See further the notes on John v. 17, and on Matt. xxviii. 1.

CH. XXIV. 1. Τῇ μιᾷ] Matt. xxviii. 1. The first day of the week is the day after the Sabbath, or Seventh Day, and is therefore the Eighth Day; and therefore it is observed by the Fathers that our Lord arose on the Eighth Day. See the passage of S. Barnabas, c. 16, quoted below on v. 50 of this Chapter. Indeed, as the number Seven is the Sabbatical number, or number of Rest, in Holy Scripture, so Eight may be called the Dominical. Seven is expressive of rest in Christ; Eight is expressive of Resurrection to new life and glory in Him.

In accordance with this principle, the Eighth Day was the Day of Circumcision (cp. Luke i. 59. Phil. iii. 5),—the type of Christian Baptism,—the Sacrament of Resurrection,—in which we rise from the death of sin to newness of Life in Him.

Our Lord received the name JESUS on the eightth day (Luke ii. 21); He as our Jesus, Joshua, Saviour, brings us to the heavenly Canaan,—to the glory of the Resurrection.

The Name JESUS, Saviour, given to Him on the Eighth Day, makes in the universal language (ΙΗΣΟΥΣ) the Number eight in hundreds, tens, and units,—888. See Irenæus adv. Hær. i. 14. 6, and ii. 24. 2. Cp. Rev. xiii. 18.

The great Day of the Feast of Tabernacles—the type of His Incarnation—was the Eighth. See on John vii. 37. And in His Sermon on the Mount He pronounces eight Beatitudes describing the way that leads to the fruition of heavenly glory. See on Matt. v. 3.

Hence also we find, that the Transfiguration—which was a figure and a glimpse of the future glory of the bodies of the Saints after the Resurrection—is mentioned as having taken place eight days after our Lord had said, "There be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God." (Luke ix. 27.) As S. Ambrose says there, "Quid est quod ait, In diebus octo? Quia is qui verba Christi audit, et credit, Resurrectionis tempore gloriam Christi videbit. Octavā enim die facta est Resurrectio. Unde et plerique Psalmi in Octavam inscribuntur."

2. τὸν λίθον] the stone. St. Luke takes for granted that his readers are aware from the other Gospels (see Matt. xxvii. 60. Mark xv. 46), that there was a stone on the mouth of the tomb. So also St. John xx. 1.

5. τὸν ζῶντα] the living one—and the Cause of Life; for He said, "I am the Resurrection and the Life" (John xi. 25).

6. μνήσθητε ὡς ἐλάλησεν ὑμῖν] remember how He said to you. Hence it would seem that Angels of heaven had been invisible hearers and spectators of Christ's intercourse with His disciples during His earthly Ministry.

This Angelical speech therefore opens to us many considerations of deep and mysterious interest as to the communion between the angelic inhabitants of heaven and the dwellers on earth. See above on i. 11 and xxii. 43, and on Acts xii. 15.

10. Μαρία ἡ Ἰακώβου] Mary the (mother) of James. The article ἡ, omitted by Elz., is prefixed to Ἰακώβου in A, B, D, K, S, V, Z, and so Winer, p. 120.

—αἱ λοιπαὶ] the rest, i. e. the other women, mentioned with those in viii. 2, 3; xxiii. 49. 55, who had come up with Him from Galilee to the Passover. Cp. Acts i. 14.

12. πρὸς ἑαυτὸν] to his home. Cp. John xx. 10.

13. Ἑμμαοῦς] Emmaus. According to local tradition, Kubeibeh, n.w. of Jerusalem. Cp. Lightfoot, ii. 42. But see Robinson, iii. 65. Winer in v., i. p. 325.

The true position seems to have been lost before the times of Jerome and Eusebius. (See Robinson, iii. 66.) It is called 'Αμαύως by Josephus, B. J. vii. 6. 6.

14. ὁμίλουν] were talking. 'Ομιλέω is used in this sense by LXX, and in N. T. only by St. Luke. See Acts xx. 11; xxiv. 26. It is the word now in common use in Greece for λαλῶ. See above, Introduction, p. 166.

16. οἱ δὲ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν ἐκρατοῦντο] but their eyes were holden that they should not know Him. He seems to have appeared to them like a stranger. See on v. 18, and Mark xvi. 12.

18. Κλεόπας] Cleopas. Supposed by Routh (R. S. i. p. 281) to be the same as the Κλωπᾶς of St. John (xix. 25) and the Alphaeus of St. Matthew and St. Mark, who never mention Cleopas, the father of St. James and St. Jude. (See on Matt. x. 3.) St. John never has Ἀλφαῖος. Others suppose Κλεόπας here to be a different word altogether, viz. an abbreviation of Κλεόπατρος. Cp. Mill, pp. 236, 237. Some suppose that the other disciple, whose name St. Luke does not mention, was called Simon, one of the Seventy Disciples (Origen in Joann. init. and Cyril here); others, that it was St. Luke himself. (Theophyl.)

— Σὺ μόνος παροικεῖς] Art Thou alone a sojourner at Jerusalem, and dost not know what things have happened there? i. e. all others who sojourn there do know. Have we met in thee the only person who does not know?

The expression is stronger, because παροικεῖν describes the persons who were temporary residents for the Passover. The LXX use the word παροικεῖν for γῆς (gur), peregrinus fuit. Cp. Acts vii. 6. 29; xiii. 17. Eph. ii. 19. Heb. xi. 9. There is an emphasis, therefore, on παροικεῖς,—"Art thou alone a sojourner, or stranger, staying merely for a few days at Jerusalem, and yet dost not know?" i. e. so wonderful are they, that not only the Jews there resident, but even all the strangers who have flocked thither from other lands, do know them.

The use of καὶ here is similar to that of the Hebrew Vau. See Schroeder, Synt. Hebr. p. 328. Gesen. ad Is. v. 4: "What could have been done more to My Vineyard and I have not done in it?" And so καὶ in John iii. 10, σὺ εἰ ὁ διδάσκαλος τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, καὶ ταῦτα οὐ γινώσκεις; vii. 4, οὐδεὶς ἐν κρυπτῷ τι ποιεῖ καὶ ἡγεῖται αὐτὸς ἐν παρρησίᾳ εἶναι. Cp. Winer, p. 554.

He who Himself was the principal Agent in these wonderful events, is said by them to be the only person who did not know these things. He who was Himself the true Passover was taken by them for a stranger who had come up to be a spectator at the Passover. For their eyes were then holden that they should not know Him, but they were opened when they received Him as the guest of their hearts in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

21. ἄγει] impersonaliter: 'tertia dies est hodie.' (Vulg.) Cp. Acts xix. 38, ἀγόραιοι (sc. ἡμέραι) ἄγονται.

22. ὀρθρῖναι] early. On this form in -ινος, authorized here by A, B, D, K*, L, Δ, see Lobeck, Phryn. p. 51.—Elz. has ὀρθραι.

25, 26.] On these verses see Iren. iii. 16. 5, Athanas. (adv. Arian.) ii. 15, p. 381, and below on Acts ii. 36.

27. Μωϋσέως κ.τ.λ.] Moses and the Prophets, i. e. the Scriptures of the Old Testament. See above, xvi. 19, and on John x. 34.

28. προσεποιεῖτο] He Himself was making overtures to go further. He was like one going further. The Evangelist does not use the aorist προσεποιήσατο, but imperfect προσεποιεῖτο. The Vulgate finxit is liable to a double objection,—first as to sense, next as to tense. Finxit suggests the idea of pretending to do what is not intended to be done; and the aorist intimates a single act.

Probably He acted thus, as well as appeared "in another form" (Mark xvi. 12), in order to try the faith of the disciples; and to teach, by their example, that if we desire to have Christ with us, we must use some effort for that purpose; and that if we endeavour to detain Him with us, He will abide with us and sup with us. (Rev. iii. 20.)

This trial of the disciples was similar to that of the woman of Canaan (Matt. xv. 22). At first He treated her with seeming indifference and severity; but it was to bring out more clearly her faith and love, and to teach the world by her example, that patience and perseverance in prayer are necessary, and that He is prevailed upon by holy violence and untiring importunity.

There was nothing but truth in this. He was making as if He would have gone further; and doubtless He would have gone further, if the disciples had not detained Him. Cp. the similar phrase Mark vi. 48.

God, Who sees and hears all things, often seems to us not to see us, and not to hear us; and, doubtless, He will hide His face from us, and be deaf to our prayers, unless we look stedfastly and cry earnestly to Him. God tries our strength by seeming to partake in our weakness. He exercises our faith in His knowledge and love, by seeming to be ignorant and unmerciful. So Christ tested and proved the desire of the disciples to keep Him, by showing an intention to leave them.

All the acts of this period of our Lord's sojourn on earth appear to have had a profound spiritual meaning. It was now Evening. He was making as though He would go further. He was like one about to go further. But at their desire He consented to abide with them. He was made manifest to them in the breaking of bread. Our Lord had said on the cross, "It is finished" (John xix. 30). The day of His earthly ministry was now over. The Evening was come. He was no longer to be with His disciples in bodily presence on earth; He was going further—to heaven. Every thing now betokened this departure. And yet, at their prayer He would not leave them; He would remain with them even to the end (Matt. xxviii. 20), and He would specially manifest Himself to the eyes of the faithful in the breaking of bread (v. 35), by which they communicate with Him, and "show the Lord's death till He come." (1 Cor. xi. 26.)

See the interesting discussion of S. Aug. Serm. lxxxix. 4, and de Consensu Evang. ii. 51; iii. 25 (which has suggested in part what is said above), and ad Consentium vi. p. 779, where he says, "Longius namque postea profectus super cœlos, non tamen deseruit discipulos suos," and compare our Lord's questions, Who touched me? (Luke viii. 45.) Where have ye laid him? (John xi. 34.) "Sic quippe interrogavit, quasi nesciens quod utique sciebat." Augustine is here refuting the Priscillianists, who from these actions of our Lord derived a plea for mental reserve and equivocation.

³⁰ λαβὼν τὸν ἄρτον—καὶ κλάσας] He took the bread. Hence, and from v. 35, some would justify the celebration of the Holy Eucharist in one kind only. But by saying that He blessed and brake the Bread, the Holy Spirit does not say, that He did not also bless and deliver the Cup. Rather we may say, that the Evangelist, having so lately recorded the institution of the Holy Eucharist by Christ with the words "in like manner the Cup also" (xxii. 20), could hardly suppose it necessary to speak of the Cup here as well as the Bread, or imagine it possible that any one should believe that our Lord had forgotten His own words, and was inconsistent with Himself.

It may be remembered also, that bread, ἄρτος, ἰσὴν (lehem), was to the Jews a general name for food, including drink as well as meat; and that ἄρτον ἐσθιεν, to eat bread, and κλάσαι ἄρτον, distribuere cibum, are general terms for taking refreshment. Thus Bread became spiritually an expressive term for all the blessings received from communion in Christ's body and blood; and the κλάσις ἄρτου, or "breaking of bread," was suggestive of the source from which those blessings flow, (viz.) Christ's body, κλάμενον, or broken. (1 Cor. xi. 24.) Hence κλάσις ἄρτου, in Acts ii. 42, is a general term for the Holy Eucharist.

They who derive the inference above specified from this passage, prove the weakness of that inference by their own practice. For, even suppose it were probable (which it is not), that our Lord on this occasion did not administer the cup; yet the most that could be thence inferred is, that in certain cases it may not be necessary for the people to receive it; whereas the Church of Rome in her practice makes it necessary not to receive it in all cases; which is a very different thing.

Let her listen to the words of one of the greatest Bishops of Rome, who thus speaks of Half-Communion (Leo M. Serm. xli.): "Resiliunt à sacramento salutis humanæ, et Christum Dominum nostrum in verâ naturæ nostræ carne verè natum, verè passum, verè sepultum, et verè suscitatum esse non credunt. Cùmque ad tegendum infidelitatem suam nostris audeant interesse mysteriis, ita in sacramentorum communione se temperant, ut interdum, ne penitus latere non possint, ore indigno Christi Corpus accipiant, Sanguinem autem redemptionis nostræ haurire omninò declinant. Quod ideò vestræ notum facimus sanctitati, ut vobis hujuscemodi homines et his manifestentur indicis, et quorum deprehensa fuerit sacrilega simulatio à Sanctorum societate Sacerdotali autoritate pellantur."

On the subject of Half-Communion see further on 1 Cor. x. 16; & 27.

³³ συνηθροισμένους] assembled together; probably in the upper room where the Passover had been instituted. See on Acts i. 13, and Mede's Discourse, i. book ii., on Churches in the first century.

Our Lord gives evidence here of His own Resurrection, and of the nature of the bodies of the Saints after the Resurrection. See S. Ambrose here, and S. Gregory (Moral. in Evang. xvi. c. 55).

2. The Prophets נביאִים (Nebiym), greater and lesser.

3. The Hagiographa קְתוּבִים (Kethubim), or Writings, of which last class "the Psalms" standing first in order, is here the representative. See Bp. Cosin on the Canon, ch. ii., and Weststein here, p. 829, and the authorities cited in the Editor's Lectures on that subject (Lect. ii. and Appendix, pp. 389. 398. 403, 2nd ed.), where the importance of this passage is shown in reference to the Integrity and Inspiration of the Canonical Books of the Old Testament, as received by the ancient people of God and by CHRIST Himself, and through Him by the primitive Church Universal, and by the Church of England. (Art. VI.)

46. παθεῖν τὸν Χριστὸν] that Christ should suffer. On the legal and prophetic foreshadowings of Christ's suffering and Resurrection on the third day, see on Acts xxvi. 23, and Mede, Discourses, Book i. Disc. xiii. Works, p. 49.

47. ἀρξάμενον] beginning. The participle is in the neuter gender put absolutely, and refers to the substance of the things preached, viz. μετάνοιαν καὶ ἄφεσιν. See Kuhner, § 670. Winer, p. 550, and Meyer, p. 512. This is the reading of A, C, F, H, K, M, U, V, Γ, Δ, Δ, Λ, R.

50. Ἐξήγαγεν αὐτούς] He led them out of the city and crossed over the brook Kedron, by Gethsemane, to the Mount of Olives. He had suffered in the city. But He was glorified in a sequestered spot, and thus taught a lesson of meekness. Besides, He would not display the glory of His Ascension to the City of Jerusalem, whose time of probation was past; He would not show it openly "to all the people, but to chosen witnesses, who did eat and drink with Him after He rose from the dead." (Acts x. 41.)

He led them out at the end of forty days (see Acts i. 3). Here is another instance of St. Luke's manner; passing over some things as well known, in order to bring out others in bolder relief. Cp. iii. 19.

He thus also affords a refutation of the allegation, that St. Mark did not know that our Lord was forty days on earth after His Resurrection; or, as the objection is now sometimes framed (e. g. by Meyer here, p. 516), that the sojourn for forty days was a later tradition! See on Mark xvi. 19.

St. Luke certainly did know that our Blessed Lord was forty days on earth after His resurrection; for he himself relates the fact in the second part of his work, viz. in Acts i. 3. And yet, in his Gospel, the transition from the Resurrection to the Ascension, —without any mention of the intervening Forty Days,—is quite as rapid as in St. Mark.

No argument can be drawn from the silence of any single Evangelist, as to his knowledge of events. St. John was present at the Ascension of Christ, yet he does not describe it. But in two other places of his Gospel he alludes to it. See John vi. 22; xx. 17. He supposes the reader to know it from the other Gospels. (See on Mark xvi. 19. Luke xxiv. 51.) It cannot be too carefully borne in mind,—that All the Four Gospels make One Gospel.

There is a passage in the Epistle of Barnabas (c. 15), which has been cited in modern times as an argument that Our Lord's Ascension did not take place after an interval of forty days from His Resurrection, but on a Sunday. Ἀγομεν τὴν ἡμέραν τὴν ὀγδόην εἰς εὐφροσύνην, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀνέστη ἐκ νεκρῶν, καὶ φανερωθεὶς ἀνέβη εἰς τοὺς οὐρανοὺς. But there φανερωθεὶς is to be construed with ἐν ᾗ, and not with ἀνέβη. See the notes in the edition of Cotelierius, i. p. 48. The Author of this Epistle passes immediately, in this passage, from the Resurrection to the Ascension. And so do all the Creeds of all Churches of Christendom, with the Acts of the Apostles (i. 3) in their hands. Barnabas was present at, and concerned in, a speech, in which it is said that our Lord remained on earth many days after His Resurrection. (Acts xiii. 31.)

— ἕως εἰς Βηθανίαν] as far as Bethany; viz. as far as the district so called; which touched the district of Bethphage, near the summit of the Mount of Olives, whence our Lord ascended into heaven, as St. Cyril of Jerusalem says, Cateches. 14, p. 217, ἐκ τοῦ ὄρους τῶν Ἑλαιῶν εἰς οὐρανοὺς ἀνελήλυθεν. See note below on Acts i. 12.

St. Luke ends his Gospel with this brief notice of the ASCENSION; and he begins his second treatise, the Acts of the Apostles, with a description of it. (Acts i. 1—12.) Thus he connects the one—the Acts of the Apostles—with his Gospel; and prepares us for the main scope of the other treatise, in which he displays CHRIST reigning in heavenly glory, and guiding, governing, and protecting His Church on earth by His Spirit and His Power,—and, as her great High Priest, in the heavenly sanctuary, "ever living to make intercession" for her. (Heb. vii. 25.) On this characteristic of St. Luke's Gospel see above on Mark xvi. 19, and Introduction, pp. 163, 164.

51. ἐν τῷ εὐλογεῖν] in the act of blessing them. As Elias left his mantle with Elisha, by whom he was seen when taken up, so Christ at His Ascension left a blessing with His Apostles and His Church. See 2 Kings ii. 9—11.

52. προσκυνήσαντες] having worshipped Him. The Adoration of Christ no longer visible, began at His Ascension, and will continue till His Second Coming. "Prayer shall be made ever unto Him, and daily shall He be praised." Ps. lxxii. 15.

53. διαπαντός] continually. See above, πάντοτε (xviii. 1). John xviii. 20. Acts x. 2. Glass. Phil. S. p. 444. "Semper orat," says Aug. Epist. 130, "qui per intervalla certa temporum orat." Cp. Dr. Barrow's Sermon on 1 Thess. v. 17, "Pray without ceasing."

— ἀμήν] Amen. This word is found in A, B, C, F, K, M, S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Δ, and is not to be cancelled; it is a solemn acclamation at the close of the Gospel, in which the writer and the hearers all unite together with one heart and voice, Amen. Cp. John xxi. 24, 25.

INTRODUCTION

TO

ST. JOHN'S GOSPEL.

1. ABOUT half a century, it is probable, intervened between the publication of St. Luke's Gospel¹ and that of St. John.

In this interval of time, the Apostles had gone forth into all the world preaching the Gospel, and they had all fallen asleep except St. John. Jerusalem had been taken by the armies of Rome; the Jewish Polity had been overthrown; the Jewish Temple had been destroyed, its Sacrifices and its Sacred Ritual had been abolished. The Church of Christ had risen in its room, and was extending itself into all lands.

In passing from the Gospel of St. Luke to that of St. John, we must bear in mind these circumstances.

2. It must also be remembered, that St. John in writing his Gospel enjoyed the advantage of addressing a generation of Christians who had been baptized, at an early age, into the Name of the Blessed Trinity, and had been familiarized with the historical truths of the Gospel recorded by the former Evangelists; and had been schooled by the doctrinal teaching of the Apostolic Epistles of St. Paul, St. Peter, St. James, St. Jude, and perhaps also of St. John's own Epistles and Apocalypse. They had in their hands the Books of the Old and New Testament, now nearly completed, and heard them read on the Lord's Day in Christian Assemblies, and partook habitually of the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Thus the Holy Evangelist St. John stood on the vantage-ground of Evangelical and Apostolical Teaching, and Christian Worship, of nearly seventy years. He wrote for men who had come to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ².

He was therefore enabled to speak in a loftier tone than his predecessors: he could justly take for granted, that with minds exercised and hearts spiritualized by long familiarity with holy things, and sanctified by the Holy Ghost, they, to whom he wrote, would readily discern and understand things which could not have been addressed with the same propriety to an earlier age of believers. He could speak to them of incidents in the Evangelical History, and of Christian Doctrines, as already well known to them from the other writings of the New Testament, and from the Christian Creeds, in which they had professed their Faith at their Baptism, and which they heard expounded in Homilies; and he could be sure that allusions to the Christian Sacraments would readily be apprehended by those who had been nourished with them as their daily bread from their earliest years.

The Evangelist St. John stood on another vantage-ground—that of events. He alone of the Evangelists and Apostles wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem³. He wrote to a generation strengthened in the Faith, by seeing the punctual fulfilment of Christ's prophecies foretelling that awful catastrophe in the former Gospels. He wrote to those who had learnt to look up to Christ reigning in Heaven, and had seen Him coming in the armies of the Cæsars to execute the righteous retribution which He had denounced on the guilty City which rejected Him. He wrote to those who beheld Christ triumphing over them that crucified Him. He wrote to those who saw with their own eyes the accomplishment of those prophetic warnings which had been uttered by Christ, and had been reiterated by St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, in his Epistle¹, and by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews². He wrote to those who were no longer fascinated, as their fathers had been, by the dazzling splendour of the Levitical Ritual, celebrated with the august pomp and mysterious glory of ancient traditions in the magnificent Temple of Mount Moriah, but had heard the voice of God pronouncing Ichabod upon it; and saw that sentence executed in the scattering of the Jewish people to the four winds of heaven; and had learnt to recognize in the Gospel the substantial realities prefigured by the typical shadows of the Levitical Law, such as the Ark, the Mercy-seat, and the Passover; and had rejoiced in beholding the Church of God no longer riveted in a local centre at Jerusalem, but fulfilling the predictions of Christ and of the old Prophets, and expanding itself with living energy, breathed into it by the Holy Ghost, and covering the earth with the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea³.

"Thou hast kept the good wine until now." So said the Master of the entertainment to the Bridegroom at Cana of Galilee, at the end of the Marriage Feast⁴; and the same words may be addressed to the Divine Bridegroom Jesus Christ, refreshing His friends with the good wine in the last Gospel by the ministry of St. John.

3. We may here recognize with thankfulness, clear evidence of divine forethought and providential love. We may perceive signs of the work of the Holy Ghost operating on the minds of the preceding Evangelists, not only in what He inspired them to write, but also in what they were restrained by Him from writing. We may see proofs of superhuman design in what the Divine Author of Holy Scripture directed them to reserve as a sacred deposit and precious inheritance for St. John. We may see Inspiration in their silence, which left free room for his eloquence.

Some persons in modern times have ventured to call in question the veracity of St. John's narrative, in which he describes the raising of Lazarus. It is not possible, they allege, that if such a wonderful work as this had been wrought by Christ, it should have been left unnoticed by the other Evangelists; and, as far as we know, should not have been recorded till the publication of St. John's Gospel, about seventy years after the death of Christ⁵.

But, if such a theory as this be admitted, we must also consent to abandon the history of our Lord's first miracle; which is not mentioned in any Gospel but that of St. John.

Such criticism as this, too common in our age, will however find no acceptance with those who receive the Gospels as "given by inspiration of God⁶." They will remember, that He does every thing in its proper season, and that His ways are not as our ways; and they will see proofs of Divine Wisdom in what He hides, no less than in what He reveals.

Bethsaida and Chorazin are specified in the Gospels as the places in which most of Christ's mighty works were wrought⁷. And yet none of the Evangelists has described a single miracle of Christ wrought at Chorazin; and we only know of one miracle, perhaps, done in Bethsaida⁸. But no description, however ample, of Christ's miracles, could have impressed the reflecting mind with a stronger sense of the prodigious abundance of these marvellous manifestations than this Evangelical silence. And in like manner we are filled with the largest sense of Christ's Omnipotence, when we remember that two such Miracles, as the changing of Water into Wine at Cana, and the Raising of Lazarus at Bethany, were not recorded in any Gospel for threescore years; and were first described by the pen of the last Evangelist.

We recognize here a striking proof of the truth of St. John's own declaration, that "many other signs did Jesus in the presence of His disciples, which are not written in this book; the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written⁹."

4. A similar remark may be applied in some degree to the method in which the doctrines of the Gospel are taught in the New Testament.

When we read the Epistles of St. Paul in their proper chronological order, we perceive that the Holy Apostle proceeds in a gradual course of systematic instruction, from "the first principles of the doctrine of Christ," as laid down in his earlier Epistles¹, till he arrives at the loftiest elevation and fullest consummation of Evangelical teaching, concerning the Divine Pre-existence of Christ, the Mystery of the Incarnation, and on the instrumental means of our Incorporation in Christ, and the mutual indwelling of His members knit together and compacted in His Mystical Body, and His love to His Spouse the Church, and her Marriage Union with Him.

St. Paul loves to dwell on these high Mysteries in his latest Epistles, especially in those to the Asiatic Churches², particularly in his Epistles to the Ephesians³, and to Timothy, the Bishop of Ephesus—the Church which the Apostle himself had edified during a longer period than any other by his personal presence and ministry.

Blessed be God, these glorious revelations are not peculiar to St. Paul. Had this been the case, it might perhaps have been alleged by some, that these sublime Verities are not a part of the unadulterated doctrine preached by Christ Himself; that they were private imaginations of St. Paul, who had not seen the Lord upon earth; and that they could not be received with confidence as genuine emanations from the pure well-spring of Evangelical Truth.

Happily for the Church of Christ, the life of St. JOHN was prolonged to the end of the first century. Christ at His death committed His Mother to St. John's care, and He consigned His Spouse the Church to the guardianship of the same Beloved Disciple. St. John had been with our Lord Himself from the beginning of His Ministry to the end. He was admitted by Him to His most secret retirements, at the Transfiguration, at the Agony: He leaned on His breast at Supper; he alone stood by Him at the Cross. He was the Disciple whom Jesus loved. Therefore, it was a signal proof of Christ's love to the Church, that He lengthened St. John's life, and preserved him in the freshness of bodily and intellectual vigour to the age of an hundred years: and then commissioned him to write his Gospel, and to seal up the Volume of Holy Writ.

Why do we say this? Because in the Gospel of the Beloved Disciple we have a complete confirmation of all that had been related by the other Evangelists in their Gospels, and of all that had been taught by the other Apostles in their Epistles, especially by St. Paul, concerning those highest Mysteries of the Christian Faith, to which we have referred, the Eternal Godhead of Christ; His Incarnation, and Humanity; our mystical Union with Him; our consequent reception of His fulness by the operation of the Holy Ghost; our reconciliation to God, and our filial adoption in Christ; the exaltation of our Nature in Him to the Right Hand of God; our hopes of a glorious Resurrection to eternal life, and of a blessed Immortality in body and soul through Him.

In the last Gospel, the Gospel of the Beloved Disciple, CHRIST Himself, the Incarnate WORD, sets His divine seal on these heavenly truths, and avouches them with His own testimony. Christ in His own discourses, which St. John recites, assures us of them. He, the Everlasting God, the Light of the World, the Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End of all Revelation, bears witness to them. He does this in the Gospel of the Beloved Disciple, who leaned on His bosom at Supper, and drank in heavenly wisdom from His mouth. He does this in the Gospel written at *Ephesus*⁴, the Capital of Asia. He does it by St. John, who governed the Churches of Asia, and who lived and died at Ephesus, and who has given to Ephesus the name it bears to this day⁵. He does it in this Gospel written there, as if to mark in a significant manner His own divine approval of that doctrine which His faithful Apostle St. Paul has taught in his Epistles to the Asiatic Churches, and especially in his Epistles to the Church and to the Bishop of Ephesus.

We have in this Gospel a declaration of those truths expounded in a systematic order.

5. Let us open the Gospel and examine the evidence of this statement.

One preliminary remark seems to be requisite;—

It is not possible to understand the Gospel of St. John aright, unless, in reading it, we habitually bear in mind when it was written, and that it abounds, from the beginning to the end, with prophetical sayings of Christ, which could not be fully understood by those to whom they were first spoken; but were afterwards explained by events familiar to those persons who lived at the time when this Gospel was written, and well known to the Christian Church from that age to this. As has been well said⁶, "Christ's speeches are expounded by Christ's deeds." They are expounded by all that the Church is commanded to do in Christ's name.

⁵ Ayo-suluk, from ἄγιος θεολόγος, the title of St. John.

⁶ By Hooker, V. lix. 5.

"In the beginning was the WORD." In this and the following sentences, the Holy Ghost asserts the Eternal Godhead of Christ; the Creator, the Life, and Light of the World.

This is the first proposition. It is next followed by another statement; that He who is the Creator of all things has given power to us men, to become children of God by heavenly generation, namely, to those who believe in His Name. And how has He done this? By His Incarnation. "The Word became flesh, and dwelt in us;" that is, He pitched His tabernacle in our Nature. And He who is full of Grace and Truth, "manifested His Glory, the Glory as of the only-begotten of the Father. And of His fulness have we all received, and grace for grace."

6. But by what means are these divine blessings dispensed and applied personally to us? How is that supernatural life, which consists in our union with God, communicated to us?

This question is answered by the Baptist, who was preannounced by the Prophet Isaiah, and who is the Voice crying in the wilderness, and preparing the Way of the Word. He points to Christ as "the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world;" He salutes Him as the Lamb—and thus he delivers a prophecy which was explained by the event. He foretells that Christ by His own sacrifice would be the True Passover, and pay the penalty of the world's sin, and the price of the world's ransom, and reconcile Mankind to God. The Baptist also declares, that the Holy Ghost has come upon Him, and abideth in Him, and that Christ, and He alone, is able to give the Holy Ghost.

The Baptist then utters another prophecy, which was also explained by the sequel; He declares that Christ would give the Holy Ghost by means of the Sacrament of Baptism, "He it is who baptizeth with the *Holy Ghost*¹."

The Jews, it would seem, were disposed to receive the Baptist as the Christ, and would have tempted him to become a rival of Jesus; but the Baptist proclaims himself His servant, and sends his own disciples to be taught by Jesus; and they being sent by the Baptist, say, "We have found the Messiah," "we have found Him of whom Moses and the Prophets wrote²," and the Evangelist records the saying of Jesus with which He refuted by anticipation the notions of some in later days, and declared that the Angels are His Ministers. "Henceforth ye shall see heaven opened, and the Angels of God descending upon the Son of Man³."

7. The Evangelist next proceeds in regular order to describe the Manifestation of Christ's Divinity in His first Miracle at Cana of Galilee. He, the Divine Bridegroom, who has espoused our Nature, and joined it in holy wedlock to the Nature of God, comes to a Marriage Feast, in Galilee of the Gentiles. He works His first miracle there, intimating thereby that it concerns all Nations. He displays more clearly the present glory of His Divinity, by contrasting it with the future sufferings of His Humanity. "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come⁴." The wine fails. By His command the six waterpots of stone are first filled with water up to the brim, and then by the silent fiat of His will, all that Water is changed into Wine. Here He displayed a representation of His own Divine operations.

"By Him all things had been made." "By the Word of the Lord were the Heavens made, and all the Host of them by the breath of His mouth⁵." And He who had made all things at the beginning, now made all things *new*⁶. This He did by His Incarnation. He who by His Word had filled the waterpots with Water, has, as it were, changed it into Wine by the infusion of His Spirit. He who made us by Creation has changed us by Regeneration. This He has done in the last days. Thus the Divine Bridegroom has kept the best wine until now⁷.

8. By what means is this change in our Nature wrought? This question again presents itself. And it receives its solution in the conversation which now arises with the ruler of the Jews; Nicodemus.

He, the teacher of Israel, is taught by Christ, "Except a man be born again, and from above, he cannot see the Kingdom of God⁸."

This is the first proposition; a declaration of the absolute and universal need of a new and heavenly Birth. And by what instrumentality is this New Birth effected? The answer follows immediately, "Except a man be born of Water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the Kingdom of God."

This saying, like that in the same conversation concerning the "lifting up of the Son of Man⁹," was doubtless obscure to Nicodemus at the first, but was made plain by the event. He "came at the first to Jesus by night," as it were, in a spiritual sense. But, in course of time, the darkness of night was cleared away, and he afterwards saw the meaning of Christ's words revealed in the light of day.

Those words had already received some illumination from the prophetic announcement of the Baptist concerning Christ and Christ's Baptism. "This is He Who baptizeth with the *Holy Ghost*¹." They were soon afterwards made more clear by the fact which the Evangelist next proceeds to relate—"Jesus was baptizing²: howbeit Jesus Himself was not baptizing, but His disciples were³." And the words spoken to Nicodemus were further explained by the conversation concerning the difference of John's baptism, administered only by his own hands, and Christ's Baptism, not administered by His own hands, but by the hands of His disciples; and by the explicit avowal of the Baptist himself, deterring his disciples from any feelings of jealousy on his own behalf; "Ye yourselves bear me witness that I said, I am not the Christ, but I am sent before Him. He that hath the Bride is the Bridegroom." Christ is the Divine Bridegroom, and He is now espousing to Himself His Bride, the Church. He is espousing her to Himself by that Baptism which He is now administering by the hands of His disciples⁴. And I, who am the friend of the Bridegroom, rejoice to hear His Voice. "Now my joy is fulfilled. He who is from above is above all;" and is giving the new birth from above⁵. For "the Father hath given all things into His hand." And those sayings of our Lord to Nicodemus, in which He connects the efficacy of Baptism with His own lifting up on the Cross⁶ as the object of faith to the world, for the attainment of everlasting salvation, were made still more clear by the events of Calvary, and by the issuing forth of Water and Blood from the pierced *side*⁷, and by the Commission given by Christ to His Apostles, "Go and make disciples of all Nations, baptizing them⁸;" and by the teaching and practice of the Apostles; and by the administration of Baptism in the Church; so that every reader of St. John's Gospel, when it was first published, would immediately recognize our Lord's meaning, and would see in His conversation with Nicodemus a signal proof of His divine prescience, and a prophetic intimation of the future; and a Divine Sermon on the necessity and efficacy of the Sacrament of Holy Baptism⁹, as the appointed instrument in the hands of the Holy Spirit for the espousal of the soul to Christ in spiritual wedlock, and for communicating to it the blessings of the new heavenly birth flowing from the Father of all by the Eternal Generation of the Son, condescending in His infinite love to join the Divine Nature to ours, by becoming our Emmanuel, God manifest in the Flesh, and to be lifted up on the Cross, and to shed from His precious *side Water and Blood*¹⁰ to create us anew, and to wash us from sin, and to pay the price of our Redemption, and to give us a pledge of a glorious Resurrection by the raising up of the Temple of His Body, and to purchase an eternal inheritance for us, who are incorporated in His Mystical body, and cleave to Him as living members by faith and love.

9. The announcement of these supernatural truths is made to Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews. The Gospel was to be preached first to the Jewish Nation¹¹. But it was to be revealed in course of time to all. And the first step of this gradual process of Evangelical revelation was to be by its extension to the *Samaritans*¹². They held a middle place spiritually between the Jews and the Gentile World; just as locally they dwelt in the region between Judæa and Galilee of the Gentiles.

Accordingly, as we proceed in the course of St. John's narrative we find that our Lord comes to Samaria. He is weary with His journey, and thus shows the reality of His human Nature. He sits at Jacob's Well, and takes occasion from the place to speak of the living water which He Himself will give. He reveals Himself as the Messiah¹³ to the woman of Samaria, the type of the Church¹⁴. This He does at Sychar, the very same place as that in which Almighty God had first revealed Himself in Canaan to Abraham, the Father of the Faithful¹⁵; He declares that the hour is coming when the true worship of God will be extended to all the World¹; and that the season of this spiritual harvest, for which the ancient Prophets had laboured, is now near at hand². He makes many disciples at Samaria, and thence He proceeds to Galilee, typifying the extension of the Gospel; and the Galilæans receive Him; and the Nobleman of Capernaum believes, "and his whole house³."

10. At the well of Sychar in Samaria, Christ had contrasted the living water of the Spirit which He Himself gives, with the natural element of water⁴. We next find Him at the Pool of Bethesda, at Jerusalem. He shows that He can heal the impotent folk without the instrumentality of the water. "Arise," He says to the infirm man there, "take up thy bed and walk⁵." Thus, although He had said, "Except a man be born again of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God," yet He guards us against the notion, that there is any inherent virtue in the element of water itself for the conveyance of supernatural grace. Sacraments are not sources, but channels of grace, which we receive through them, and from Him who is their Author; and the grace which is given by Him is derived through them unto every member of His Church; but it flows down from the one fountain of His fulness. The regenerative virtue is not in the water, but in Him Who is pleased to act by the water, and Who gives the Spirit thereby; and "it is the Spirit which quickeneth" in the work of regeneration. In that act Christ vouchsafes to work by Water, and we are bound to use the means which He appoints for our Regeneration. He thus tries our faith and obedience. He sends us to the pool of Siloam to wash⁶; and if we believe and obey, we who are "born blind" receive our sight: and, unless we believe, and obey, and wash, we have no promise of spiritual illumination. But the light which we receive by "the laver of Regeneration"⁷ is not from any supernatural quality inherent in the means, but from the Divine Power of Him Who instituted them, and Who gives them the force they possess. It is not from the Siloam itself, but from Him who is the Christ, "the Sent"—the anointed of God, who has taken our Nature, and has anointed its clay by the effusion of His grace, and illuminates us by His own unction, and Who sends us to Siloam, and imparts to the spiritual Siloam the virtue of Regeneration, and makes it effectual to perform that work for which He appointed it.

Thus, at the former Pool, that of Bethesda, Christ has taught us that He is the source of all spiritual health in the spiritual Jerusalem, which is the Church of God; and that He can work without means, by the independent agency of His Omnipotence. And at the other Pool of Jerusalem—the Pool of Siloam—we learn that He is able to endue water with supernatural power, and that, if He appoints it as the instrument of Regeneration, it is not for us to stand and parley with Him, and ask Christ—what hast thou done? but thankfully to use the means which He has appointed, and religiously to fear the evil that will ensue from the neglect thereof.

In His outward visible acts on the bodies of the impotent man at Bethesda, and on the blind man at Siloam, He gave visible tokens of His inner work on the souls of all Mankind, which by Nature is infirm and blind.

11. The sick man at Bethesda had been thirty-eight years in his infirmity, and Christ raised him in a moment, by a word, and enabled him to carry the couch on which he had lain⁸. "And that day was the Sabbath." Let us observe that it was also a Sabbath when Jesus "made the clay" and sent the man who was born blind to the Pool of Siloam to wash, and gave him sight⁹. The "Jews therefore sought to kill Him, because," as they imagined, "He had broken the Sabbath¹⁰."

But CHRIST is the true Sabbath. In Him the weary find rest. After His Passion, His human body rested on the seventh-day Sabbath in the Grave, and He thus fulfilled the type of the seventh-day Sabbath¹¹.

He who is our Head raised Himself, and in raising Himself He raised His members. "Christ is risen from the dead, the firstfruits of them that slept¹²," and "has brought life and immortality to light in the Gospel¹³."

Christ, the Second Adam, Who is to us "a quickening Spirit¹⁴," raises us from the death of sin, and enlightens the inner eye, which is naturally blind; and He also will raise our mortal bodies from the Grave to everlasting life and glory¹.

Well, therefore, might He take occasion from the two works of mercy done by Him on the Sabbath-day, to speak of the two Resurrections of Mankind, wrought by His Spirit;

"We are buried with Christ in Baptism²;" and are raised by a spiritual Resurrection from the death of sin to newness of life, through faith in the operation of God. We, like the impotent man at Bethesda, were once bedridden in sin, but we have been raised by Christ, and have been enabled to carry that on which we once lay. This is our first Resurrection.

We are also like the blind man at Siloam, we are of the earth earthy; but Christ has taken our flesh, He has made clay, and anointed us therewith, and by virtue of that divine unction we shall be hereafter quickened in our mortal bodies, and emerge from the darkness of the Grave to heavenly light and everlasting glory. This will be our second Resurrection.

Both these works of mercy are done for us by Him who died and was buried for us.

Fitly, therefore, on that Sabbath when He raised the impotent man at Bethesda did He proclaim this twofold Resurrection, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, that the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead"—they who are dead in sin—"shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live³." This is the *first Resurrection*⁴. And then He adds; "Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming in which all who are in their graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the Resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the Resurrection of damnation⁵." This is the second Resurrection. Both these Resurrections are wrought by Him who is "the Resurrection and the Life⁶."

Well also might He take occasion from that other work done on the Sabbath, the illumination of the man born blind, to say that He came "for judgment into the world, that they who see not may see, and they who see may become blind⁷."

The Church, taught by St. John, rightly celebrates the Great Sabbath, on which Christ lay in the grave, by joining together the mention of these two Resurrections in her prayer on that day⁸. "Grant, O Lord, that as we are baptized into the death of Thy blessed Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, so by continually mortifying our corrupt affections, we may be buried with Him, and that through the grave and gate of death we may pass to our joyful Resurrection."

12. After the miracle at Bethesda, our Lord went again into Galilee, and crossed over to the Eastern side of the Lake. On a mountain there He multiplied the five barley loaves, and fed the five thousand men by the ministry of His disciples, a little before the Passover preceding that at which He instituted the Holy Eucharist, and suffered death upon the Cross.

In this miracle He gave a prophetic and symbolical representation of what He has ever since been doing, and will continue unto the end to do, by the dispensation of the Word and Sacraments, especially in the Holy Eucharist, ministered by an Apostolic Priesthood to His People, even to the end of the world.

It was surely not without significance, in relation to this subject, that when He had wrought this miracle, He came to His Apostles in a mysterious manner, walking on the sea, in the darkness of the night and the storm; at first they imagined that they saw a spirit and cried out for fear; but being re-assured by His well-known voice they gladly "received Him into the Ship, and immediately the Ship was at the land whither they went⁹."

Christ comes to the faithful, in the Christian Sacraments, in a marvellous and inscrutable way, and they who are truly His, do not inquire with vain and irreverent curiosity as to the mode of His coming, but they thankfully receive Him into their hearts¹⁰.

These events aptly prepared the way for Christ's discourse on the morrow in the Synagogue at Capernaum, concerning the need of heavenly food, and the source from which it comes, and on the means by which it is applied.

He had spoken to Nicodemus on the need of the new birth, and of its actual communication by the Holy Spirit in the Sacrament of Baptism deriving its virtue from God, by the Incarnation and Passion of His dear Son, "Verily, Verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of Water and of the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God¹¹."

¹¹ iii. 5.

He had spoken first of Baptism, because that Sacrament is the Door of admission into the Church; and because we there receive Christ once for all, the Beginner of our life, Who gives Himself often to us afterward in the other Sacrament to nourish the life begun in Baptism.
